

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

"That form of writing which, in my judgment, is of all others most rich and precious, is positive divinity, collected upon particular texts of Scriptures in brief observations; not dilated into commonplaces, not chasing after controversies, not reduced into method of Art. . . . Explanation of two slight changes made in this volume.

1. In the closer ("solid") setting of the lines in portions of the Text and of the Comment. In the Text, this has been done to indicate such paragraphs as may be passed over where for any reason—as in the daily household worship—brevity is desirable; the subject-matter in these paragraphs containing less of vital instruction as well as of practical force. In the Comment, the purpose has been simply the abbreviation of space. As a general distinction, especially in the Epistles and Revelation, the introductory, historical, and strictly exegetical matter is set in the "solid" form; while the thoughtful exposition and spiritual suggestion, directly and vitally unfolding the truth, will be found in the open or "leaded" form, as exclusively used in the first volume.

2. In a variation, to some extent, from the initials of writers as found in the previous volume. This change is necessitated by the new and different sources from which the matter is drawn.

THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES.

Section 190.

I. RELATION OF THE ACTS AND EPISTLES TO THE GOSPELS.

The general effect of the manifestation which is made in the Gospels is such as almost necessitates further disclosures. One shining with the glory of the Only-Begotten of the Father, but clothed in the poverties and infirmities of man, has walked before us in power and weakness, in majesty and woe. He has come close to us, and drawn us close to him; has touched every chord of our hearts; has secured our implicit trust, and become the object of adoration and love: then he has hung upon a cross, has sunk into a grave, has risen, has ascended, and is gone. It was a brief dispensation, and is finished once for all. What did it mean? What has it done? What are our relations with him now? and in what way has this brief appearance affected our position before God and the state and destiny of the soul? What is the nature of the redemption which he has wrought, of the salvation which he has brought, of the kingdom of God which he has opened to all believers? These were questions left for the disciples when Jesus was gone; and, when the reader of the gospel story reaches its close, these questions remain for him. The doctrine delivered in the Gospels appears to need, and to promise, further explanations, combinations, and developments. It has not the appearance of being final, and it explicitly declares that it is not complete. When it was ended, it was to be followed by a new testimony from God, in order that many things might be spoken which had not been spoken then. The testimony came; the things were spoken; and in the apostolic writings we have their enduring record. In those writings we find the fulfillment of an expectation which the Gospels raised, and recognize the performance of a promise which the Gospels gave. T. D. B.

II. THE BOOK OF ACTS.

The difference between the historical books of the New Testament consists in this, that while the four Gospels record the history of the revelation of the kingdom of heaven, and of its foundation in the person and the work of the Lord Jesus, the Book of Acts describes the royal administration of Christ as manifested in planting his kingdom in and for the world, by the power of the Holy Ghost working through the apostles. Lange.

It is not the function of an historical record to work out expositions of doctrine, but such a book may be expected to present the general character which the doctrine bore, and to clear to our view the agencies and the stages by which it was matured. This is precisely what is done in the Book of Acts. It is the purpose of the book to do it; a purpose which ought to be more fully recognized than it is. T. D. B.

This "second treatise," or Book of Luke, records the descent of the Holy Ghost according to the promise of the Father, and the resulting diffusion of the gospel among Jews and Gentiles. It traces the founding, early training, and the expansion of the Christian Church from Jerusalem, the capital of Judea, to Rome, the metropolis of the world. It covers the whole period of transition from the old dispensation to the new, and details those providential measures by which the infant company of believers attained its independent organization, was gradually released from the shackles of the past, was brought to a consciousness of its true character and mission, and was fairly embarked upon its new career, equipped for its work, and secure of its destiny. It is in form a sequel to the gospel written by the same author, who thus intimates the close connection between what is here narrated and the personal ministry of Christ. And it stands in almost perpetual relation with the epistles, upon whose occasion and design it sheds much welcome light, while receiving from them incidental corroboration of many of its statements, and important aid for the more exact understanding of others. An.

This book describes what Christ, the invisible head of the Church, "does," or "makes," by the visible instrumentality, or "actings," of apostles, who are his chief ministers. The title is "Actings of the Apostles," and two of the apostles are selected as specimens of the rest, and certain acts of theirs are chosen as specimens of their operations. The one, Peter, was called by Christ on earth; the other,

Paul, was called by Christ from heaven. One had denied Christ; the other had persecuted Christ. One was an unlettered fisherman of Galilee; the other a learned Pharisee, brought up at Jerusalem. Therefore, in the choice of Peter and Paul as special instruments for propagating the gospel of Christ, his power is signally glorified. The plan, then, of this divine book is to enlarge our view of Christ's ministry; to prevent us from confining it to his brief bodily sojourn on earth; to reveal to us Christ sitting in heaven, not like one of the deities of the heathen world, indifferent to human affairs and controlled by destiny, but enthroned King of kings and Lord of lords, and ever ruling all things by his word, for the advancement of his gospel and the establishment of his kingdom. This book may be called the sum and substance of all Church History. In it we see the laws by which Christ, who is unchangeable, works; in it we see what he has done, and from it we may infer what he will continue to do, even to the end. Thus this divine history is also a divine prophecy. Thence we learn that all persecutions without, and all perils within, the Church, will be overruled by the power of Christ for the triumph of the gospel; that all things, however adverse, shall be made subservient to himself. Therefore, from reading this book, we may raise our eyes to heaven, and look for that blessed time when all things will be made subject to Christ, and then he will reign King of kings and Lord of lords. W.

The history of the Christian Church under the apostles runs in two streams, one Jewish, the other Gentile. The Jewish stream for the most part follows the track of the twelve apostles; the Gentile, mainly that of Paul. The earlier part of the Book of Acts presents chiefly the one; the latter, chiefly the other. Religion now becomes, much more prominently than before, a dispensation of the Holy Spirit. It is by a divine power sent from heaven—by a baptism of the Holy Ghost—that men are drawn to God. It had always been so, indeed, and the later prophets had dwelt much on this subject; but now the reality of spiritual agency becomes more obvious, and the third person of the Holy Trinity stands out more conspicuously before the Church, as the great agent in the conversion of men. W. G. B.

The Acts of the Apostles, in a narrative all alive with graphic details, and written in a style of animated simplicity and natural ease, carries us through a period of human history of incalculable interest and importance: one in which the effects of the manifestation of the Son of God were developed and tested; in which the life which he had introduced among men disclosed its nature and power, and the truth which he had left commenced its struggles and conquests; in which the Christian Church was constituted, gradually detached from its Jewish integuments, and brought to the consciousness of its freedom and catholicity; in which it verified its credentials, proved its arms, recognized its destinies, and commenced its victories; in which impulses were given which would never cease to vibrate and precedents were established to which distant ages would refer; in which solemn and exciting scenes, marvels and miracles, saintly and heroic characters, their labors, their conflicts, their sufferings, their journeyings, their collisions with all classes of men, seem to force upon the historian a confusing multiplicity of materials. Yet through all this he makes his way straight in one direction, as a man guided by that instinct of selection which belongs to the ruling presence of a definite purpose. It is just this definiteness of purpose which is apt to pass unobserved. It is nowhere announced, and the unconstrained freedom of manner and easy inartificial style suggest no thought of it.

But we know Luke's intelligent, inquiring mind, his opportunities of information, his "perfect understanding of all things from the very first," his personal intercourse with those "who from the beginning had been eye-witnesses and ministers of the Word." We can not for a moment suppose that his acquaintance with the "Acts of the Apostles" was limited to the facts recorded in the book; that he knew nothing of the proceedings of John or James, or of the manifold movements and events which were going on by the side of those which he has related. In fact, there is not a book upon earth in which the principle of intentional selection is more evident to a careful observer. There is indeed no reason given why one speech is reported and one event related at length, in preference to others which are passed over or slightly touched; yet when we reach the conclusion we see the reasons in the result. We find that by an undeviating course we have followed the development of the true idea of the Church of Christ, in its relations first to the Jewish system, out of which it emerges, and then to the great world, to which it opens itself. When the words and deeds of Philip or Stephen, of Peter or Paul, are implicated with this progress of things, we find ourselves in their company, but when we part from Peter without notice of his after-course, when we leave Paul abruptly at the commencement of his two years in Rome, we are given to understand that we have been reading, not their personal memoirs, but a higher history, which certain portions of their careers serve to embody or to illustrate. T. D. B.

The political condition of Palestine, at the time to which the New Testament narrative properly belongs, was one curiously complicated and anomalous; it underwent frequent changes, but retained through all of them certain peculiarities, which made the position of the country unique among the dependencies of Rome. The chief representative of the Roman power in the East—the President of Syria, the local governor, whether a Herod or a Roman procurator, and the High Priest, had each and all certain rights and a certain authority in the country. A double system of taxation, a double administration of justice, and even in some degree a double military command, were the natural consequence; while Jewish and Roman customs, Jewish and Roman words, were simultaneously in use, and a condition of things existed full of harsh contrasts, strange mixtures, and abrupt transitions. The New Testament narrative, however, falls into no error in treating of the period; it marks, incidentally and without effort or pretension, the various changes in the civil government: the sole kingdom of Herod the Great; the partition of his dominions among his sons; the reduction of Judea to the condition of a Roman province, while Galilee, Iturea, and Trachonitis continued under native princes; the restoration of the old kingdom of Palestine in the person of Agrippa the First, and the final reduction of the whole under Roman rule, and reestablishment of procurators as the civil heads. Again, the New Testament narrative exhibits in the most remarkable way the mixture in the government—the occasional power of the President of Syria, as shown in Cyrenius's "taxing"; the ordinary division of authority between the high priest and the procurator; the existence of two separate taxations—the civil and the ecclesiastical, the "census" and the "didrachm"; of two tribunals, two modes of capital punishment, two military forces, two methods of marking time; at every turn it shows, even in such little matters as verbal expressions, the coexistence of Jewish with Roman ideas and practices in the country—a coexistence which (it must be remembered) came to an end within forty years of our Lord's crucifixion. G. R.

The oldest known division of the Greek text of the Acts, by Euthalius, who lived in the sixth century, was into forty chapters. The present division into twenty-eight was made by Cardinal Hugo, in the thirteenth century, to facilitate the use of his Concordance to the Latin Vulgate, and was not adopted in the copies of the Greek text till the fifteenth century. The division into verses first appears in the margin of Stephens's edition (1551), and is said to have been made by him during a journey between Paris and Lyons. The actual separation of the verses, by printing them in paragraphs, appears for the first time in Beza's edition (1565), and although discontinued in the latest publications of the Greek text, still prevails in most editions of the English Bible and of other modern versions. The history of these divisions should be clearly understood, not only to prevent their being thought original, or even ancient, but also to deprive them of an undue influence upon the exposition of the text itself. The distinction of the chapters in this book is often injudicious and unskillful, and at best these conventional divisions are mere matters of mechanical convenience, like the paragraphs and pages of a modern book. J. A. A.

The Book of Acts embraces the period from A. D. 31 to A. D. 64, in which there reigned as Roman emperors: (1) Tiberius (from 19th August, 14), until 16th March, 37; (2) Caligula, until 24th January, 41; (3) Claudius, until 15th October, 54; (4) Nero, until 9th June, 68. The great conflagration of Rome under Nero broke out on 19th July, 64 (Tac. Ann. 15, 41), whereupon commenced the persecution of the Christians. Meyer.

It seems most probable that the book was written in Rome during the latter part of the imprisonment of Paul, narrated in the closing chapter. B.

Acts i. 1-12.

1 THE former treatise have I made, O Theophilus, of all that Jesus began both to do and 2 teach, until the day in which he was taken up, after that he through the Holy Ghost had 3 given commandments unto the apostles whom he had chosen: to whom also he shewed himself alive after his passion by many infallible proofs, being seen of them forty days, and 4 speaking of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God: and, being assembled together with them, commanded them that they should not depart from Jerusalem, but wait for the 5 promise of the Father, which, saieth he, ye have heard of me. For John truly baptized with 6 water; but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost not many days hence. When they therefore were come together, they asked of him, saying, Lord, wilt thou at this time re-7 store again the kingdom to Israel? And he said unto them, It is not for you to know the 8 times or the seasons, which the Father hath put in his own power. But ye shall receive power, after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you: and ye shall be witnesses unto me both in Jerusalem, and in all Judæa, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the earth.

9 And when he had spoken these things, while they beheld, he was taken up; and a cloud 10 received him out of their sight. And while they looked steadfastly toward heaven as he 11 went up, behold, two men stood by them in white apparel; which also said, Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven.

12 Then returned they unto Jerusalem from the mount called Olivet, which is from Jerusalem a sabbath day's journey.

THE ascension of Christ is the great pledge and proof of our eternal state; that our nature is for ever identified with his, so that as long as he is Man we must be happy, as one with Him; that the great value of this transcendent fact is, not merely that it is an example of our future ascension, but that it is our ascension begun—we in him having risen to heaven, we in him being at this time present before God, we in him being united with the eternal plans and procedures of heaven, so that we are for ever blended with Christ—his property—his purchased possession—the very members of his body; insomuch that they who succor his suffering disciples in this world shall be pronounced to succor himself. And if this be so —if Christ Jesus has thus borne with him our nature into the inmost sanctuary of heaven, if he has not hesitated to wear the form that Adam wore, in that Holy of Holies where angels tremble as they gaze—what ought to be our feelings, as we reflect upon this astonishing transit? How ought we to be animated, as we remember that a body spiritual indeed, but yet tangible and visible—a nature immaculate indeed, but yet human and ours—has been uplifted by the energy of indwelling Godhead, and set in the center of the Paradise of God! To know that it has happened mainly with a view to our own future exaltation; that it is but the prologue of a drama which is to take in the whole blessed company of the redeemed; that it is a preparatory measure which is to introduce an endless procession of future entrances like itself—saint after saint rising into the glory thus secured by this Captain of Salvation, and each met at the threshold by him who thus has scaled the skies that he might be there before us!—to know this, and to believe it, is to awake to emotions that annihilate earth and open heaven already to the exulting soul!

W. A. B.

1. With these words we enter on a new stage of history and of doctrine, and they are words which connect it with the past. The links of Scripture uniting one part to another, and assisting our sense of the continuity of the whole, are worthy of especial notice. Thus does the Book of Acts at its opening attach itself to the preceding record; throwing back our thoughts on "the former treatise of all that Jesus began both to do and teach," and then passing rapidly in review the last circumstances which connect the apostles with their Lord, as the instruments which he had chosen and prepared for the work which he had yet to do. Thus the history which follows is linked to, or welded with, the past; and the founding of the Church in the earth is presented as one continuous work, begun by the Lord in person, and perfected by the same Lord through the ministry of men. "The former treatise" delivered to us, not all that Jesus did and taught, but "all that Jesus began both to do and teach, until the day when he was taken up." The following writings appear intended to give us, and do in fact profess to give us, that which Jesus continued to do and teach after the day in which he was taken up. T. D. B.—From the arrangement of these words in the original Greek, two things are plain which escape the English reader: First, there is an emphasis on the verb "began"; secondly, there is none on the word "Jesus." The contrast is not that the former treatise related what Jesus began, and this relates what some other person or persons continued; but it is that the former treatise related what Jesus began to do and to teach; and this relates what he, the same Jesus, continued to do and to teach. A.—There was nothing then on the lips of the preachers of the gospel, but what had been "begun to be spoken" by its first preacher; and in following to their utmost the words of the apostles we are still within the compass of the words of the Lord Jesus. T. D. B.

Mark expands and explains this statement to refer to Christ's ministry, by the Spirit, through his witnessing disciples: "They went forth and preached everywhere, the Lord working with them, and confirming the word with signs following." B.—The Lord working with them. Yes! in all his rest he is full of work, in all their toils he shares, in all their journeys his presence goes beside them. Whatever they do is his deed, and the help that is done upon the earth he doeth it all himself. This blessed conviction of Christ's continuous operation in and for his Church underlies the language of this introduction. The Gospel records the beginning; the Book of the Acts the continuance; it is one biography in two volumes. Everywhere "the Lord" is the true actor, the source of all the life which is in the Church, the arranger of all the providences which affect its progress. The Lord adds to the Church daily. His name works miracles. To the Lord believers are added. The Gentiles turn to the Lord because the hand of the Lord is with the preachers. The Lord calls Paul to carry the gospel to Macedonia. The Lord opens the heart of Lydia, and so throughout. Not the Acts of the Apostles, but the Acts of the Lord in and by his servants, is the accurate title of this book. A. M.

The kingdom of God was indeed first to be exhibited as a communion of men bound together by the same spirit, inspired by the same consciousness of God; and this communion was to find its central point in Christ, its Redeemer and King. As he himself ordered and directed all things in the first congregation of his disciples, so he was subsequently to inspire, rule, and cultivate this community of men by his law and by his Spirit. The revelation of the Spirit, shared by all its members, was all that was to distinguish it from the world, so called in the New Testament, that is, the common mass of mankind, as alienated from God. And Christ was gradually, through this community, his organ and his royal dwelling-place, to establish his kingdom as a real one, more and more widely among men, and subdue the world to his dominion. N.

2. Through the Holy Ghost. A remarkable statement, as showing how, to the very end, it was through the Spirit that he did and said everything; and this even after his resurrection. It was not as "God over all" that he instructed his aposbles, but as the man Christ Jesus, full of the Holy Ghost. As Prophet, Priest, and King, he was anointed by the Spirit; and it was as one full of the Spirit, and on whom the Spirit rested (Isa. 11: 2), that he came to discharge these his offices. As our Moses, our Aaron, our David, our Melchizedek, he was filled with the Holy Spirit. Thus we see him full of the Spirit for us, dispensing that Spirit to us according to our need, that we may come behind in no gift, but receive from him grace according to the measure of the gift of Christ. Bonar.

3. He shewed himself alive by many infallible proofs. The resurrection of Christ was the great fact in proof of his divinity that the apostles were to preach. And the proof was ample to them. During forty days Jesus appeared ten or eleven times to one or many disciples, in various circumstances, for brief periods of time, when they could judge without excitement; by words and acts simple and significant establishing in their minds such an absolute conviction of the fact, that it controlled their after-life, and led them through persecution to death. B.—This period of the forty days was full of the future. During it, his discourses were concerning the kingdom of God—that is, the Church of the future—her constitution and her fortunes. During it were uttered by him those commandments by which their future course was to be guided. A.

4. He commands them to tarry in Jerusalem for the Promised Spirit.—They were to remain in order that the miracle of the descent of the Holy Ghost upon them might be more striking and convincing, as wrought in the capital of Judæa, and at the next great festival after the crucifixion, when strangers from all parts of the world would be gathered at Jerusalem, who would carry back the tidings of that manifestation into all lands; and also that the Christian Law might go forth from Mount Zion (Isa. 2: 3; Mic. 4: 2) and so show its harmony with the Levitical dispensation. W.—The promise of the Father. Because it is the one sum and substance of all the Old Testament promises, in that dispensation which was especially declaratory of the Father's purpose and will: it is "the promise of the Father," as embracing in one all other promises, and as the inclusive blessing of the covenant, being no less than the entire renewal of man by the indwelling Spirit: a blessing unknown to the earlier dispensation, and by virtue of which the least under the latter covenant is greater than the greatest under the former one. This baptism by the Holy Ghost was to be the fulfillment of that which the baptism of John only foreshadowed.

5. Not many days hence. Why was this especially the time for this indwelling of the Holy Ghost in our nature to begin? John furnishes us with the answer, when he tells us (7: 39), "the Holy Ghost was not yet, because Jesus was not yet glorified." On him, the inclusive head of our humanity, the Holy Spirit alighted in his baptism. To him the Spirit was given without measure. But the fullness of the outpouring of this Spirit from him over all flesh summed up in him, awaited the full acceptance of all our flesh in him, when he had by himself purged our sins and sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on High. It is this which so closely binds on the narrative of the Ascension to all that is to follow. It is this which makes the "not many days hence" so pregnant with deep meaning, as assigning to the greatest event in the Church's history its proper and only place. A.—The time is indefinite of purpose. "Not many days," says Chrysostom, "that they may hope, but he does not say how few, in order that they may watch." The interval was ten days.

6. The apostles' question about the kingdom was a strange one, yet it had a grand measure of faith in him in it. He was the Restorer! They called him Lord, the same word used in the Greek Old Testament for Jehovah. But the question was all wrong in its meaning and spirit. It is at once the most affecting and conclusive proof of their "slowness of heart to comprehend" the essential truths Christ had been gradually disclosing all the way to his betrayal. B.—In spite of all that our Lord said and did during his lifetime, and even with the advantage of his second ministry, "speaking to them of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God," the apostles never advanced till after the ascension to the understanding and apprehension of Christ's peculiar redemptive work. Even after having followed the finger of the Master from scroll to scroll, and from page to page, as he showed to them what was written in the law, the psalms, and the prophets concerning himself, they do not seem to have retained the meaning of the exposition. Their understandings though "opened" got closed again; and, instead of rising to the height of the great argument and learning to preach "repentance and remission of sin to all nations," they sank down into mere expectants of secular glory and national deliverance. This is evident from the fact that, on the very morning of the ascension, they actually proposed the question, "Lord, wilt thou at this time restore the kingdom to Israel?"—thus still dreaming about mere political ascendancy and national advantage, when such pains had been taken, by his opening to them the meaning of the law and the prophets, to make them understand that which had been said, "I, if I be lifted up from the earth" (signifying by what death he should die), "will draw all men unto me." T. B.

7. One department of knowledge, our Lord here teaches us, is kept by God within his own power, or, in other words, is reserved to himself, and not laid open before the eyes of mortals. The coming history of the world, the future life of every individual man lies beyond conjecture. Even the events which are to affect his own kingdom of grace God has kept in his own power. He has disclosed a little, he has made the final winding up sure, but this is a region of knowledge where he reigns alone, and shares the particulars of the boundless plan with no other. T. D. W.

If, from a prophetic text or two, we were able to count on our fingers how many years the world will last, such knowledge would puff up, and lead us to talk and speculate, instead of doing with our might what our hand finds to do. It is not enough that we submit to leave the ages and epochs in the Father's hand, because we can not wrench them out of it; we should be glad and grateful that he spares us such sights into the future as we should not be able to bear. It is the part of a dear child to read eagerly all that the Father reveals, and to trust implicitly wherever the Father indicates a design to conceal. "Blessed are those servants whom the Lord, when he cometh, shall find"—not predicting, but—"watching." In removing the speculative inquiry, he placed a great practical work in their hands. Arnot.

He did not reveal to them plainly the fall of the Mosaic dispensation, accompanied with the destruction of the Jewish state, and scattering of the nation over the world for so many centuries. This was the breaking up of all that they clung to as patriots and Jewish believers. The whole foundation of their faith would be convulsed by the thought of it. It was only the unfolding of Christianity in its spiritual power, the fulfillment of types and sacrifices in more glorious realities, the transference of their affections to a higher fatherland, and the view of the heavenly beauty of the Jerusalem above, that could enable them to bear the loss of their gorgeous ritual, and the dispersion of their race. Ker.

8. How wisely kind is his answer! No rebuke now for dullness. Our Lord intimates that there shall indeed be a restoration, though not in the way, nor with the results, they imagined. The final results are in the Father's ordering. But, he says, turning to indicate the very way by which ultimately his kingdom should be established, and really answering their question in an affirmative spirit, ye shall receive power from the Holy Ghost and shall be witnesses unto me in the whole earth. "Strike in upon the work, and leave the issue with God" (Arnot). You shall be qualified for the work. Power shall be imparted to you by the Holy Ghost. Of that "all power given unto me," shall He bestow upon you, matching the gift always to your needs. Use the gifts bestowed in toiling to establish my kingdom in human hearts. And we know how, when Christ had ascended and the Holy Ghost had descended, they dropped out of thought for ever their old conceptions about rich rewards and lordly places in Israel's kingdom; how, taught by the Holy Spirit, they linked together in a beautiful completeness all that Christ had taught about humiliation, serving, and suffering, as the way to the kingdom, and faith in Christ with the inward joy and peace of God the Holy Ghost, as itself the kingdom. B.—Ye shall be witnesses unto me in Jerusalem, and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the earth. In these words we have a brief table of contents of the whole book. The testimony in Jerusalem occupies the history as far as the end of chapter 7; in chapter 8 it spreads to all Judea and Samaria; in chapter 9 we have the preparation, by the conversion of the apostle to the Gentiles, for its being carried over all the world; in chapter 11 we pass from Jerusalem to Antioch, thence over Asia Minor and into Greece, thence, finally, to the world's great capital, Rome. A.—Mark the exactness with which he indicates the lines in which they should go on their journey of witness-bearing and service—the same which in their spirit bind all Christian sympathy and activity to the end of time. First, Jerusalem, their own city; next, Judea, their own country; then Samaria, their next neighbor, an enemy at that; and finally, the whole earth. B.—The charity that will convert the world is a charity that begins at home—begins, but does not end there. Unless our love be of such a kind as greatly to disturb a godless neighborhood at home, it will not set on fire a distant continent. We must go out to the uttermost parts with our message, but must let the men beside us feel the glow of our zeal as it passes by. The command of the Lord is still the rule for his people—beginning at Jerusalem, but not ending till we reach the uttermost part of the earth. Arnot.

There is for all of us also a "Jerusalem," a "Judea," a "Samaria," if not an "uttermost part of the earth"—some well-dressed city with its ragged fringe of want and wickedness, some country district with its neglected and untrained families, some sophisticated brain that has gone astray from the old standards and home of the faith and set up its Gerizim rivalry—some that you can minister to by your charity and win back by your witnessing, if that witnessing is only as zealous as Peter's, and as patient as Paul's, and as loving as John's. F. D. H.

9-11. The Ascension and the Angel's Message.—His last words, "ye are my witnesses," spoken—and what intense significance this fact carries to all disciples!—He lifts his hands in blessing, and in the act of blessing rises. Of all that is sublime and tender in this beautiful and attractive life, nothing surpasses in power over a true human heart this spectacle, upon which we still are looking. The last act, an abiding memory to us of blessing; hands—once outstretched in cruel agony, shame, and death—now for ever outstretched with a benediction, from the living, risen, reigning Christ, of joy, of promised glory, and of everlasting life to every uplooking, fervid, trusting, hoping soul! And we know that the bright cloud that has taken will restore him, in that blessed day when we shall rise with all believers to meet him in the air. This is the message to us of the angels who spake from the hallowed spot on Olivet upon that bright day of Christ's ascension. B.

9. Our Lord after his resurrection seems to have done nothing like a common man. Whatever was natural to him before seems now miraculous; what was before miraculous is now natural. On earth he had no longer any local residence; his body required neither food for its subsistence, nor a lodging for its shelter and repose; he was become the inhabitant of another region, from which he came occasionally to converse with his disciples; his visible ascension, at the end of forty days, being not the necessary means of his removal, but a token to his disciples that this was the last visit—an evidence to them that "the heavens had now received him," and that he was to be seen no more on earth "till the restitution of all things." Horsley.

Taken up. They saw with them, as Master, Comforter, Consoler, and Protector, a man, such as they saw themselves. If they saw not something of this kind, they were fain to think him absent; whereas he is everywhere present by his majesty. And it was needful that they should now begin to have spiritual views of him, as the Word of the Father, God with God, by whom all things were made; and these the flesh, which they saw, suffered them not to have. It was therefore expedient for them to be confirmed in faith by his converse with them during forty days; but it was more expedient for them that he should withdraw himself from their eyes, and that whereas upon earth he had been conversant with them as a brother, he should succor them from heaven as God, and they should learn to think of him as God. They would not think of the God, until the man were removed from them and from their sight; so that, when the familiar intercourse which they had had with the flesh was cut off, they might learn, even in the absence of the flesh, to think of his Godhead. Aug.—If faith and spiritual affection are the life of the Church, it was for the advantage of the Church that Jesus, instead of remaining in the midst of her, should go away. Before the departure of Jesus Christ there is no Church, but there is one immediately after. Those men who, after a long residence with their Master, put questions to him, and start doubts which almost make us blush for them, are after his departure enlightened, intelligent, resolute men. This Church, in which he leaves only his remembrance, and in which the visible signs of his power lasted only a very short time, still subsists, and even now, amid the decline of all belief and the overthrow of all systems, is the only thing which has strength, life, and a future. A. V.—Inasmuch as a cloud received him out of their sight, it was declared to them that the human form of the Lord which thus departed from among them has not disappeared into the air, but has entered heaven, the abode of God, and is there working and acting. But how? Entering heaven as the glorified King, it is concerning his kingdom that he is acting and working; but inasmuch as he is withdrawn from them, and no longer personally among them, it is not outwardly and visibly that he is thus working; not concerning a visible earthly kingdom, but only by that outpouring of the Spirit which he is gone up to receive, and concerning an inward and Spirit kingdom. A.—There is among us, ever since that wondrous day, a power beyond all powers, a strength to nerve the feeble heart, an unction to appoint the sightless eye, an energy to revivify the spiritually dead. There is a secret, subtile, unseen power—mightier than all that fabling romance ever dreamed of its magic—it is near us if we will but know it, within us if we will but call it—this is the heritage of the believing world ever since that day of Olivet. W. A. B.

What tongue of the highest archangel of heaven can express the welcome of the King of Glory into those blessed regions of immortality? Surely, the empyreal heaven never resounded with so much joy: "God ascended with jubilation, and the Lord with the sound of the trumpet." It is not for us, weak and finite creatures, to conceive those incomprehensible, spiritual, divine gratulations that the glorious Trinity gave to the victorious and now glorified human nature. Certainly, if, "when he brought his Only-Begotten Son into the world, he said, Let all the angels worship him"; much more now that he "ascends on high and hath led captivity captive, hath he given him a name above all names, that at the name of JESUS all knees should bow." And, if the holy angels did so carol at his birth, in the very entrance into that estate of humiliation and infirmity, with what triumph did they receive him now, returning from the perfect achievement of man's redemption! Bp. H.

We see humanity glorified when the Son of man thus mounts his Father's throne; and not too high, assuredly, sounded the ancient vaunt of faith,

“that our flesh is in the heaven.” “To-day,” so spoke the famed Chrysostom, in the most ancient ascension sermon of the Christian Church which has been preserved for us—“to-day are we, who do not seem worthy of earth, taken up into heaven: we win the royal throne; and the human race, who were driven by cherubim from paradise, take even a place above the cherubim.” Van O.

10. It is said that the apostles “looked steadfastly toward heaven as he went up”; methinks it is so that we also, as we read or hear this wondrous event, should fix eye and heart upon that heaven which he, the first-born, has preoccupied; that we should feel that in him a portion of ourselves has departed thither, a sinless type of humanity, which keeps its place for the rest; and that our heart, in Christ, being already there, all else should struggle, with holy impatience, to follow. W. A. B.

The final demonstration of his Messiahship is complete. Henceforth the Redemption of Jesus, his incarnation, his life, his redeeming death, his resurrection and ascension, enter as living truths, the most vital and grandest truths, into human history. Roman falsehood, Jewish malice, Grecian skepticism, can never crush them out of human thought, or palsy their ennobling power over human hearts. From soul to soul these eternal realities pass into possession; men feed upon them and grow pure and strong. The sphere of faith enlarges from generation to generation, and as it enlarges, new power, new joy, new hope exalts and strengthens man. S. W. F.

Read in the gospels, repeated in sermons, faintly reflected in Christians, that matchless life is every day humanizing, stimulating, rebuking, consoling thousands; impelling to deeds of generous self-sacrifice and difficult self-conquest, which he was himself the first to exhibit, and inspiring with hope those lovers of their race who would otherwise despair of mankind. The perfection of beauty, a full-orbed Sun of Righteousness, there he stands and will ever stand, history's great miracle and the world's great hope, a sign that is still spoken against, but a name which is continually making progress, and daily working miracles. And ever since over Bethany he spread forth his hands and blessed the men of Galilee, a balm has lingered in earth's atmosphere, which was not there before; and we all feel that earth will never again be so bleak since Jesus has been here, nor the grave again so dark since Jesus has been there; just as we feel that goodness has new charms since he showed us what it is, and that heaven has most nearness since he said, “I go to my Father,” and “Lo, I am with you always.” Hamilton.

11. He will come again; but times and seasons which man can not number will intervene. These are times of witnessing for all the disciples of Christ. They must receive the Spirit; they must be witnesses for Christ; they must begin at Jerusalem; they must reach the ends of the earth. After that shall the end be. The time seems long; and yet it is approaching quickly. That fixed star seems fixed indeed to our eyes; there it has stood in the deep of heaven, and glittered down on the upturned eyes of longing disciples these eighteen hundred years—the bright promise of his coming; but though it seems to stand still, it is moving; it is approaching. Be of good cheer, disciples, your redemption is nearer than when those Galileans first left their nets to follow Jesus. Arnot.—The return of Christ is that ultimate and yet most proximate point to which the believer constantly looks, toward which is all his hope, and from which he receives constantly the deepest impulses and motives for purification and diligent labor. The grace of God, bringing salvation, hath appeared—this is our sunrise—teaching us to wait for the appearing of our great God and Saviour—this is our perfect, never-ending day. A. S.

This question, “Why stand ye gazing up?” is the first thing in the order of events, and in the Bible narrative, after the closing of Christ's earthly ministry. Only a little breathing space was to be given them first to gather up their energies, and even that was not to be an interval of idleness. They were to go at once to Jerusalem, as the chosen headquarters of the great warfare for the world's conversion, and their waiting there was to be like the waiting of the still midsummer elements, before the mountain winds sweep down and the tongues of fire leap out—a busy waiting—a preparation for this long campaign of many ages. They were to occupy the ten days from Ascension to Pentecost, with its mighty wind and flame, in making ready incessantly for the coming of the Holy Spirit to inaugurate their work. They were to be earnest and constant in prayer and praise. They were to cease wasting their time on the empty cloud through which the Saviour's form had gone, that they rather might find and follow and possess for ever the living Saviour himself, in doing by faith the substantial service of his love, for his sake. F. D. H.

Acts i. 13-26.

13 AND when they were come in, they went up into an upper room, where abode both Peter, and James, and John, and Andrew, Philip, and Thomas, Bartholomew, and Matthew, 14 James the son of Alphæus, and Simon Zelotes, and Judas the brother of James. These all continued with one accord in prayer and supplication, with the women, and Mary the mother of Jesus, and with his brethren.

15 And in those days Peter stood up in the midst of the disciples, and said, (the number of 16 names together were about an hundred and twenty,) Men and brethren, this scripture must needs have been fulfilled, which the Holy Ghost by the mouth of David spake before concerning Judas, which was guide to them that took Jesus. For he was numbered with us, 18 and had obtained part of this ministry. Now this man purchased a field with the reward of iniquity; and falling headlong, he burst asunder in the midst, and all his bowels gushed 19 out. And it was known unto all the dwellers at Jerusalem; insomuch as that field is called 20 in their proper tongue, Aceldama, that is to say, The field of blood. For it is written in the book of Psalms, Let his habitation be desolate, and let no man dwell therein: and his 21 bishoprick let another take. Wherefore of these men which have companied with us all 22 the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out among us, beginning from the baptism of John, unto that same day that he was taken up from us, must one be ordained to be a wit- 23 ness with us of his resurrection. And they appointed two, Joseph called Barsabas, who 24 was surnamed Justus, and Matthias. And they prayed, and said, Thou, Lord, which knowest the hearts of all men, shew whether of these two thou hast chosen, that he may take 25 part of this ministry and apostleship, from which Judas by transgression fell, that he might 26 go to his own place. And they gave forth their lots; and the lot fell upon Matthias; and he was numbered with the eleven apostles.

WHAT an epoch of prayer was that! So elevated are these ardent and consecrated souls toward heaven, so open toward God's spirit, so conscious that they have only to ask to receive, that devotion seems to have become an instinct, and they pray as they breathe. And what followed? The Church grew before men's eyes with such swiftness that a thousand converts were gathered in the time that it takes us to gather ten: in the short lifetime of a single generation the worship of Christ raised itself to power in the chief cities of three continents; the swords of all the Herods and Cæsars and their legions could not strike fast enough to cut down one Christian where twenty sprang up; hundreds were baptized in a day; the times of refreshing had come; the prediction was literally accomplished; the windows of heaven were opened, and the blessing was so poured out that there was not room enough to receive it. These were the fruits. How can we fail to connect together the fruit with the seed—the glorious movement and the motive power—the Church pure in doctrine and victorious in converting the world with the multitude of her members not only standing full-clad in all the panoply of the Christian warfare, but praying always, with all prayer and supplication in the Spirit? All along since the last of the twelve laid down his life, this rule has never had an exception—the Church has been both strong and pure, victorious abroad and peaceful with itself, just according to its spirit of supplication, according to its devotional nearness to Christ. F. D. H.

12-26. From the parting with their ascended Lord, with the vision still in thought of those hands outstretched in blessing, the apostles returned to Jerusalem. In a large chamber in the upper story of a certain house, probably the room already hallowed by their last intercourse with the Master, they gather together, and many other disciples with them. For ten days this first assembly of the Christian Church remained in almost continuous prayer, and in perfect unison of feeling, calmly expecting the fulfillment of the Lord's many promises respecting the Holy Ghost. Luke's Gospel tells us that "they went to the Temple daily," at the usual hour of prayer. The whole number was one hundred and twenty, and they are distinguished into four groups: the apostles, the women who had followed Jesus, his mother Mary, and his brethren—Mary seen for the last time in the beautiful attitude of prayer with the other believers, sharing their spiritual aspirations and sympathizing in their trust and hope, and equally looking for and depending upon the Holy Spirit; and his brethren, now also believing, rejoicing, expectant; and, lastly, the larger assemblage of disciples.

Peter now proposes that the vacancy in the apostleship be filled. After consideration as well as prayer, resort was had to the lot to determine the choice of Christ. This was their last conformity to a usage of the old dispensation, for they were to have from henceforth a better guide to the will of God. Matthias was chosen and numbered with the apostles. Concerning him, as concerning several other apostles, we have no further definite information. This we know, they all fulfilled the ministry appointed them. Each had a history and performed a life-work whose record of fruitfulness and blessing shall be gratefully traced in the studies of the redeemed.

With singleness of expectation and absolute assurance of faith, every heart in perfect oneness with every other, asking, as He had bidden, in his name, they quietly awaited the time appointed for the advent of the Comforter. B.

14. There was perseverance in the prayer of the primitive Church—"they continued." There was unity in those early prayer-meetings—they prayed "with one accord." The prayers were not soon broken off, and were not hindered by disagreements among the suppliants. They ascended straight to heaven in a pillar of pure incense, and descended soon in showers of blessing—a great refreshing from the presence of the Lord. Arnot.

Mary. The Holy Spirit takes leave of her here, associated with the apostolic company of worshippers in the upper room at Jerusalem. She is one of those who there continue steadfast in prayer. How unlike the spirit and language of the Holy Ghost is that will-worship which takes her out of that holy fellowship and makes her an object of adoration! W.

We see her to have been a devout Jewish maiden, a faithful wife, a loving mother, illustrating in her life a true womanhood. Her faith, her study of the Scriptures, her humility, her modesty, her fidelity—all commend her as an example of the character produced by the grace of God. Not a single hint is given of her sinlessness, or that she differed in her nature from Elizabeth or Anna, or any of those devout and loving women who followed Christ to the cross and early visited his sepulchre. Her honor, her peculiar blessedness consisted in this, that she was chosen to be the mother of Jesus. As woman in Eve bore her part in the fall, so woman in Mary bore her part in giving birth to him who is the Redeemer of the world. To the Church

she sustains no official relation whatever. Christ himself expressly disclaims all such human relationship in his kingdom. The moment he appears she retires. A few allusions, and she vanishes from the scene. The apostles never once allude to her. She is put as entirely aside as if she never had existed.

To those inspired men she is utterly unknown in any other relation to the Church than that of a simple believer, saved by the blood of Jesus Christ. There is nothing in the early records, nothing in the early fathers of the Church for the first five centuries, which indicates that Mary was anything more than an honored member of the Church. S. W. F.

John has nothing to say of her, or to report from her. If he had her with him even for years, speaking freely of what she knew, how many things could she have told him that we so much long to hear! And yet the apostle, beginning his gospel far back in the solemn arcana of the Eternal Word, and passing directly over Mary to speak, fourteen verses after, of "the Word made flesh," gives not so much as a trace of mention concerning her maternal place and office in the story. Making no report of her conversations, he is equally silent as regards her death; telling never when she died, or how she died, or in what place she was buried. And it is well; for there was even a much higher necessity in her case, than in that of Moses, that her burial-place should be hidden from mortal knowledge. Otherwise it would be the center of a vast idolatry than the world has ever known. The divine wisdom somehow took her aside, with a set purpose not to let her mix her human-story products, beautiful and graceful as they were, with Christ's immortal life-word from above. H. B.

15. It is the commencement of God's kingdom on which we gaze with quiet admiration, and it may be to us as though we stood beside the hidden source of a stream which thence speeds along to water regions vast beyond belief. These hundred and twenty persons, what a small beginning compared with the vigorous progress and the fair destiny! Still the spiritual kingdom of God stands toward the unbelieving world as for ten days the humble upper chamber stood toward the powerful and magnificent Jerusalem; yet it appears here, too, that the great question is not on what side is the majority to be found, but on what side is the truth. Van O.

18. It is natural to suppose that Judas hanged himself on some tree growing out of a precipice; and that the branch breaking, or whatever he hanged himself with, he fell down headlong, and dashed himself to pieces. M.—Supposing this part of Hinnom to have been the scene of the suicide, it fits in exactly to the narrative in the Acts. There are places with overhanging trees of various kinds, at which the rugged rock rises sheer up to forty or fifty feet; and supposing an individual to be suspended by the neck from a branch of one of those trees, there is nothing improbable in the branch breaking, in his falling body being torn by some jagged projecting stone as he descended, and in his being dashed to pieces by the hard rock at the bottom. The potter's field, which was purchased with the thirty pieces of silver, is shown on the same eminence. We found its soil to be clayey as we walked over it; and if you ask almost any potter in Jerusalem where he finds his material, he will direct you to this very Acedama. A. Thomson.—I felt, as I stood in the valley and looked up to the rocky terraces which overhang it, that the proposed explanation was a perfectly natural one. I was more than ever satisfied with it. Trees still flourish on the margin of these precipices, and in ancient times must have been more numerous. A rocky pavement exists, also, at the bottom of the ledges, and on that account, too, a person falling from above would be liable to be crushed and mangled, as well as killed. Hackett.

19. This verse should be included in a parenthesis, and thus considered as conveying not the words of Peter but of the historian: which effectually answers the objection from the fact having happened but a few days before the speech was delivered. This also accounts for his calling the Syriac, which was spoken by the Jews at that time, their language. D.

24. Lord. This word, equivalent to the ΚΕΝΟΥΝ of the Old Testament, and correspondent to it in the Septuagint version, is constantly applied to CHRIST in the Acts, where it is found nearly a hundred times, and is like a sacred key-note of the whole ever sounding forth his divine Lordship in the ear of the world. It is "the LORD JESUS" who is said by Peter to have come in and gone out among them. It is he who chooses Matthias; he who sends the Holy Ghost; he who adds believers daily to the Church; he who works miracles by the hands of his apostles. To the Lord Jesus, Stephen, the first martyr, looks up and prays at the hour of death. It is he who calls to the persecuting Saul from heaven; he sends Ananias to baptize; he sends Peter to Cornelius. He (says Peter) is Lord of all. Thus the mind is elevated from earth to heaven, and from the acts of envoys to the majesty and glory of the universal Lord and King, sitting on his heavenly throne. W.—It is not said, "Show whom thou will choose," but "whom thou hast chosen." There exists no more decisive proof of the absolute recognition of the divinity of our blessed Lord than this first prayer of his Church. That the prayer is made to him is undeniable. The very word in which he says (John 6: 70), "Have not I chosen you twelve?" is also used here: if he chose the twelve, his it was to choose the new apostle. And, the prayer being thus made to him, there is in it attributed to him knowledge of the hearts of all men, and that divine foreknowledge which, before all secondary agents, determines the destiny of men. A.—25. The style of the gospel is admirable in a thousand different views; and in this, among others, that we meet there with no invectives on the part of the historians against Judas or Pilate, nor against any of the enemies, or the very murderers of their Lord. Pascal.—To his own place. In the eternal world every man has his place, and it is his own. No other can make it, and no other can occupy it, for him. Whatever may be in it outwardly, its essence lies in his own soul and in the condition to which he has brought it. Here in the last issue consists his misery or joy, for only through his soul can his share be measured in the universe of God and in God himself. And God has made the man's own soul witness and judge over itself. This difference only shall exist between the present and the future, that then—confronted with the eternal laws of truth and justice—the witness shall have no power of false testimony, and the judge be unable to use favor or sophistry. Men shall take their own place in the spiritual universe as bodies take their place in the natural—by the power of gravitation which is in them—nearer God or farther from him, as they have impressed the character upon themselves, and in nearness will lie life and peace—in distance, death and misery. Ker.

Section 193.

Acts ii. 1-11.

- 1 AND when the day of Pentecost was fully come, they were all with one accord in one
- 2 place. And suddenly there came a sound from heaven as of a rushing mighty wind, and
- 3 it filled all the house where they were sitting. And there appeared unto them cloven
- 4 tongues like as of fire, and it sat upon each of them. And they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and began to speak with other tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance.
- 5 And there were dwelling at Jerusalem Jews, devout men, out of every nation under

6 heaven. Now when this was noised abroad, the multitude came together, and were con-7 founded, because that every man heard them speak in his own language. And they were all amazed and marvelled, saying one to another, Behold, are not all these which speak 8 Galileans? And how hear we every man in our own tongue, wherein we were born?
 9 Parthians, and Medes, and Elamites, and the dwellers in Mesopotamia, and in Judæa, and 10 Cappadocia, in Pontus, and Asia, Phrygia, and Pamphylia, in Egypt, and in the parts of 11 Libya about Cyrene, and strangers of Rome, Jews and proselytes, Cretes and Arabians, we do hear them speak in our tongues the wonderful works of God.

Jesus has ascended to his Father, but this other paraclete is to come and dwell in his people for ever. His office work is threefold: First, with reference to Christ's immediate disciples, he was the revealer—Jesus had instructed and opened truth to their minds; but their minds were weak, their memories treacherous. This Holy Spirit comes to bring to mind his words, to strengthen memory, to fill them with the truth thus spoken in all its vividness and power, and open the true meaning of what was obscure and dark. Nor is this all. There were many things Jesus had for them, which they could not bear, were not able to receive, before his departure. These the Spirit should make known to them; these things to come he should unfold to them. This promise is the foundation on which the whole New Testament rests as the inspired truth of God. They spake, they wrote the things pertaining to Christ and his kingdom, as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. The second office is that of the convictor and regenerator. He is to convince the world of sin, of righteousness, of judgment; and as he convinces and convicts he is to renew and lead them to Jesus. On the day of Pentecost he first demonstrated this divine power; thousands were pricked in their hearts; thousands believed in Jesus. Ever since that time his presence has been revealed in conviction and conversion. Religion advances; Jesus is received; the gospel is victorious only as he brings the truth home to dead hearts of men. The third office is that of quickener, guide, and comforter. To the soul once penitent and believing, this blessed Spirit comes and quickens it to see and feel the fullness, and richness, and power of the truth as it is in Jesus; stimulates it to sacrifice and labor, excites to prayer, strengthens against temptation, supports and comforts amid trial, sorrow, and death. Jesus sends this divine Spirit to work in his Church and through its members. This is his great promise, and this completes the cycle of redemption. The Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, each in their office ministering life and salvation to the world. S. W. F.

1. The day of Pentecost. Pentecost is a (Greek) New Testament term, meaning fiftieth, indicating the celebration of this feast on the fiftieth day from that of the Passover. This is called in the Old Testament the Feast of Harvest; and also the Feast of Weeks, because it was seven weeks, or "a week of weeks," from the Passover. The Jews also called it "The Feast of the joy of the Law," as occurring, according to their tradition, on the very day when the Law was given from Mount Sinai, the fiftieth of the Exodus, from the night of the first Passover. And so this Feast of Pentecost associates the old covenant of the Law with the new covenant of the Gospel, the organization of the Old Testament Church under Moses with a partial ministry of the Spirit, with its reorganization under the apostles with the fullness of the Holy Ghost. In this we see the vital connection of the new covenant with the old. B.—At the Feast of the Passover the lamb was slain—at the Feast of Pentecost the Law was given. Coincident with the slaying of the lamb was the death of Christ; coincident with the giving of the Law was the descent of the Spirit. On the first

Pentecost the Law was written on tables of stone; on the last came the Spirit to write the Law on the living tables of the heart. Arnot.

In the old dispensation there were three great annual festivals at which the sons of Abraham went up to Jerusalem—that of the Passover, which commemorated and renewed their gladness over their deliverance from the Egyptian house of bondage; that of the first fruits, when the earliest ripe sheaves gave joyous foretoken of the coming harvest; and that of Tabernacles, when for a season their tent-life was renewed, and they blessed God for their settled enjoyment of the promised land. But what was temporary and occasional in the former economy, is permanent under the gospel; and the gladness of all these three festivals is united in the Christian life. The Pascal joy of deliverance—the Pentecostal gladness of first fruits in the possession of the earnest of the Spirit—and the Tabernacle rejoicing in the contemplation, from out the frail booth of the flesh, of "the city which hath foundations whose builder and maker is God"—these all combine to make the experience of the believer a continuous feast, which is not the less real because it is internal and spiritual. W. M. T.

All in one place. It is not of the apostles only that the whole history is related. Throughout the latter part of chapter 1 we are in presence of the assembled believers, the hundred and twenty names of verse 15. In verse 23, it is "they" who "appoint two"; in verse 24, "they" who pray; in verse 26, "they" who give forth their lots; in chapter 2: 1, "they" who are "all with one accord in one place"; in verse 3, it is upon "each of them" that the fiery tongues rest. There is no change of subject throughout. And with this agree the words and acts of the twelve. A.

Our Saviour Christ, who is Lord of the Sabbath, fulfilling the work of our redemption by his resurrection upon the first day of the week, and by his mission of the Holy Ghost miraculously the first day of the week, and by the secret message of his Spirit to the apostles and the primitive Church, hath translated the observation of the seventh day of the week to the first day of the week, which is our Christian Sabbath; that as our Christian baptism succeeds the sacrament of circumcision, and as our Christian pascha, in the sacrament of the eucharist, succeeded the Jewish passover, so our Christian Sabbath, the first day of the week, succeeds the Sabbath of the seventh day of the week; and that morality which was, by Almighty God, under that covenant, confined to the seventh day, is, by the example of Christ and his apostles to us Gentiles, transferred to the first day of the week. Hale.

2, 3. Suddenly came the fulfillment for which the disciples now, and the devout of their preceding generations, had waited. And in this his Pentecostal gift we find further evidence that Christ came to fulfill the long promise of the prophets. Two signs preceded, and one followed the immediate advent of the Holy Ghost: First, a sound, as of a rushing mighty wind, without a breath of movement in the air, a sound sweeping down through the still sky from the upper heaven, a sound, heard in its downward course by many in the immediate vicinity, taking the direction and entering into the very chamber where the disciples were sitting, and there ceasing. This was an expressive intimation to those who understood the symbolic use of the term wind, or breath, or spirit, as applied to the divine Spirit; it was an advance sign from heaven of his coming. Next, in addition to the sound appealing to the ear, instantly followed a light, as of flame, appealing to the eye. An appearance it was, of a body of flame, dispersed and distributed in the form of tongues, one resting upon the head of each disciple. A brightness as of fire or flame, but like the bush at Horeb there was no burning. This miraculous light, with its peculiar form, also bore an expressive intimation, which we can as readily interpret. Spiritual light and spiritual energy, coming from the Holy Ghost into the heart, were the experience signified by the seeming flame. "The form of tongues signified that the tongue, the word, or speech, controlled by the Holy Spirit, should communicate all that is heavenly. That such a tongue of light and fire descended upon each individual present, was an emblem of that fullness of the Spirit imparted to each individual as a permanent gift." Thus these signs, audible and visible, impressively indicated the power and the mode of working of the Holy Spirit. More than this, they were specific pledges of the conquering might of the divine Spirit that should attend the preaching of Christ crucified and risen. B.

Tell it wherever there are ears to hear, tell it to the ends of the earth, God hath spoken; man has not been forgotten; there is a gospel, a "speech of God"; questions affecting salvation are settled; and our way to holy living and happy dying traced by the Hand which rules both worlds. In strict keeping with the spiritual stamp of Christianity was the symbol which, once for all, announced to the Church the advent of her conquering power. The symbol is a TONGUE, the only instrument of the grandest war ever waged: a tongue—man's speech to his fellow man; a message in human words to human faculties, from the understanding to the understanding, from the heart to the heart. A tongue of fire—man's voice, God's truth; man's speech, the Holy Spirit's inspiration; a human organ, a superhuman power. Arthur.—The truth revealed is the condition and the instrument of the Spirit's working. Hence, only when the revelation of God is complete by the message of his Son, his life, death, resurrection, and ascension, was the full permanent gift of the Spirit possible, not to make new revelations, but to unfold all that lay in the Word spoken once for all, in whom the whole name of God is contained. A. M.

4. Immediately succeeding these miraculous manifestations is the advent of the Holy Ghost. Of this the simple sublime record is, They were all filled with the Holy Ghost. As of old "God was not in" this seeming of the "wind and the fire," but entered invisibly and inaudibly into the hearts of the disciples to breathe into them the fullness of spiritual life and light, to speak thereafter to them in "the still small voice," and to abide in them and with them for ever. Fullness and permanence characterize the influence and communication of the Holy Spirit from henceforth. Hitherto prophets and apostles, and all believers, had only received in lesser measure partial and limited foretastes of the divine working. B.—As the Son was working in the world long before his incarnation, so did the Holy Ghost also act upon mankind long before his effusion; as it was at the incarnation of the Son that the fullness of his life first manifested itself, so it was not until the effusion which took place on the day of Pentecost that the Spirit poured forth all his power. Ols.

The normal guidance of the apostles by their Lord was not occasional, but habitual, not through separate interventions, but through the Holy Ghost dwelling in them. So the promise ran that it should be; and so in fact it was. The Day of Pentecost is the opening of the second period of the New Testament dispensation. It stands alone, as does the day which now we call Christmas: the one the birthday of the Lord, the other the birthday of his Church; the one proclaimed by praises sung by hosts in heaven, the other by praises uttered in the various tongues of earth. That change is significant: for now the Spirit conveys the true knowledge of the wonderful works of God into the recesses of the human heart. A dispensation is begun, in which the mind of God has entered into mysterious combination with the mind of man, and henceforth the revealing light shines, not from without, but from within. God at that time not only stirred, but taught, the hearts of his faithful people, and sent to them not only the warmth but the light of his Holy Spirit. T. D. B.

5. In Christ's time one might have spoken with truth of the omnipresent Jew. "The Jews had made themselves homes in every country, from the Tiber to the Euphrates, from the pines of the Caucasus to the spice-groves of happy Arabia." A mere catalogue of the cities where they had settled at that time—in the far East, in Egypt, in Syria, in Greece and her islands—is astonishing. With but few exceptions, they seem to have been everywhere a wealthy and, in general, an influential class. The decrees issued from time to time by the Roman Senate, favoring or honoring the Jews in the different cities of the empire, were very numerous, and throw much light upon their numbers, character, prosperity, and their civil and social relations and standing. Merrill.

6-11. Many of the more devout among these foreign Jews, under the then prevalent belief that the Messiah was about to appear, had fixed their abode at Jerusalem, permanently or for a time. These, with others who came up to this feast, were providentially prepared as witnesses of this great miracle. Subsequently, as the subjects of the renewing power and grace of the Holy Spirit, they were as providentially made bearers of the glad tidings to the nations among whom they dwelt, whose languages they had acquired from birth. Many of them were now gathered in the vicinity of the temple, and heard the strange sound that had fallen from the sky. Among this multitude came the disciples from the upper room, and, under the prompting and guidance of this new divine inspiration, one and another attaches himself to some group of foreigners, and accosts them in their own language with the wondrous message of the Holy Ghost concerning the crucified and risen Jesus. No wonder that "they were all amazed, and marveled" that Galilean peasants should "speak in their tongues the wonderful works of God"! Here were representatives of all nations: eastward, "the Parthians, Medes, Elamites, and dwellers in Mesopotamia," from the heart of Asia; northward, strangers from "Cappadocia, Pontus, Phrygia, and Pamphylia," and the rest of Asia Minor; southward, from "Egypt, Libya, and Arabia"; and westward, "Cretes and Romans." B.

Proselytes. After the captivity, the proselytes were for the most part willing adherents to the Jewish faith. With the conquests of Alexander, the wars between Egypt and Syria, the struggle under the Maccabees, the expansion of the Roman Empire, the Jews became more widely known, and their power to proselytize increased. The influence was sometimes obtained well, and exercised for good. In most of the great cities of the empire there were men who had been rescued from idolatry and its attendant debasements, and brought under the power of a higher moral law. The converts who were thus attracted joined, with varying strictness, in the worship of the Jews. They were present in their synagogues; they came up as pilgrims to the great feasts at Jerusalem. S.—These were the seed-vessels, now charged with precious seed, and then thrown back upon the countries whence they had come. Thus Christ was preached in many distant countries very soon after his own ministry was closed. A great harvest sprang in many lands from the seed that these worshippers found at Jerusalem—a great flame of spiritual life was kindled far and wide by these fiery tongues of the Pentecost revival. Arnot.

11. The miracle of tongues, what is it but a significant intimation of the appointment of Christianity to be the religion of the world? The gospel must speak all languages, and can and shall do so one day, because its deepest marrow and essence, really divine, is also human; not from man, nor according to man, but still for man, for all men without exception, adapted to the deepest, the unvarying cravings of humanity, and alone fitted fully to satisfy them. Van O.

The signs, and that which followed them—the speaking with tongues—were but indications of the deeper and greater event itself, the being filled with the Holy Ghost. The rushing wind and the tongues of flame passed away in a few minutes, the speaking with tongues in a few years : but the event of Pentecost remains in all its presence and all its power. The filling, teaching, indwelling Spirit is as much with us as he was with them. A.—The condition of the descent of the Holy Ghost with converting power in the Church is ever the same as at his first coming. Oneness of heart, and united, believing, persevering prayer on the part of Christ's banded disciples, will assuredly bring the largest blessing that is asked or desired. "For this I will be inquired of," is still the divine utterance, and the promise yet stands good, I will "increase with men like a flock." Prayers, unhindered by disagreements, by lukewarmness of desire, by diversion of interest and purpose, by wavering faith, or forgetfulness of the objects, will never be denied ; they will be, must be answered, as God is true. B.—Every accessory, every instrument of usefulness, the Church has now in such a degree and of such excellence as was never known in any other age ; and we want but a supreme and glorious baptism of fire to exhibit to the world such a spectacle as would raise ten thousand hallelujahs to the glory of our King. Let but this baptism descend, and thousands who have been but commonplace or weak ministers would then become mighty. Prayer earnest, prayer united, and prayer persevering, these are the conditions ; and, these being fulfilled, we shall assuredly be "endued with power from on high." Arthur.

Acts ii. 12-36.

12 AND they were all amazed, and were in doubt, saying one to another, What meaneth 13 this? Others mocking said, These men are full of new wine.
 14 But Peter, standing up with the eleven, lifted up his voice, and said unto them, Ye men of Judæa, and all ye that dwell at Jerusalem, be this known unto you, and hearken to my 15 words : for these are not drunken, as ye suppose, seeing it is but the third hour of the day.
 16 But this is that which was spoken by the prophet Joel ; and it shall come to pass in the last 17 days, saith God, I will pour out of my Spirit upon all flesh : and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, and your young men shall see visions, and your old men shall dream 18 dreams : and on my servants and on my handmaidens I will pour out in those days of my 19 Spirit ; and they shall prophesy : and I will shew wonders in heaven above, and signs in 20 the earth beneath ; blood, and fire, and vapour of smoke : the sun shall be turned into dark-
 21 ness, and the moon into blood, before that great and notable day of the Lord come : and it
 22 shall come to pass, that whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved. Ye men of Israel, hear these words ; Jesus of Nazareth, a man approved of God among you by miracles and wonders and signs, which God did by him in the midst of you, as ye your-23 selves also know : him, being delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of 24 God, ye have taken, and by wicked hands have crucified and slain : whom God hath raised up, having loosed the pains of death : because it was not possible that he should be holden 25 of it. For David speaketh concerning him, I foresaw the Lord always before my face, for 26 he is on my right hand, that I should not be moved : therefore did my heart rejoice, and 27 my tongue was glad ; moreover also my flesh shall rest in hope : because thou wilt not leave 28 my soul in hell, neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption. Thou hast made 29 known to me the ways of life ; thou shalt make me full of joy with thy countenance. Men and brethren, let me freely speak unto you of the patriarch David, that he is both dead and 30 buried, and his sepulchre is with us unto this day. Therefore being a prophet, and knowing that God had sworn with an oath to him, that of the fruit of his loins, according to the 31 flesh, he would raise up Christ to sit on his throne ; he seeing this before spake of the resurrection of Christ, that his soul was not left in hell, neither his flesh did see corruption.
 32 This Jesus hath God raised up, whereof we all are witnesses. Therefore being by the right 33 hand of God exalted, and having received of the Father the promise of the Holy Ghost, he 34 hath shed forth this, which ye now see and hear. For David is not ascended into the 35 heavens : but he saith himself, The LORD said unto my Lord, Sit thou on my right hand, until 36 I make thy foes thy footstool. Therefore let all the house of Israel know assuredly, that God hath made that same Jesus, whom ye have crucified, both Lord and Christ.

From the moment when the apostles saw their Lord ascend, they were in full possession of all the external facts of which they were appointed to bear witness. But they were not in possession of the spiritual meaning, relations, and consequences of those facts, and therefore the hour of their testimony was not come, and the interval was passed not in preaching but in prayer. As soon as the promise is fulfilled, they lift up their voice and speak. Never were men so changed. Who does not note the accession of boldness, faithfulness, and fervor! Their clear, firm testimony rises in a moment before the world, never hesitating or wavering, never to sink or change again, only manifesting more fully, as time advances, the largeness of its compass and the definiteness of its announcements. Ever after they speak as men would do who were conscious of a ground of certainty which could not be questioned, who could say that things "seemed good to the Holy Ghost and to them"; that their word was "not the word of man but the word of God"; that it was "the Spirit that bore witness"; that they "preached the gospel with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven"; that they "had the mind of Christ." It is enough. The three testimonies concur—the testimony of him who gave the Spirit, the testimony of those who received it, and the testimony of the facts which ensued on its reception. Are we then at a loss to know what was the nature of the gift which the Holy Spirit brought for the purposes of the apostolic work? Certainly it was vast and various—"a sevenfold gift"; but its most essential part lay not in tongues and powers which witnessed to the gospel, not in the fervor and boldness which preached it, rather it was the Gospel itself. T. D. B.

The First Preaching of Christ.—Peter's address is bold and aggressive, not defensive, but his boldness is tempered with the "meekness of wisdom." And, alike in his courage, his gentleness, and his wisdom, we discern the clearest, surest proofs of the power of the Holy Ghost. Nothing less than divine energy could have enabled these timid fugitives of six weeks before to face a multitude of the very men from whom they had fled—nay, more, intrepidly to confess the Master whom they had deserted.

For Peter, the change is marvelous indeed! Not merely in the extreme of daring so soon succeeding to cowardice, nor in the confession of Christ again after his craven denial, but in the subjection of that rough, impetuous, indiscreet temper to the quietness of spirit and admirable judgment manifest in this whole discourse. He is still foremost, indeed—he would not be natural otherwise—but he is not forward. He refutes the rude charge of drunkenness at the outset, but with what mildness of manner and modesty of argument! And nothing can be wiser, no form of argument can be conceived as combining a more excellent judgment and temper, than the whole course of this introductory preaching of a completed redemption.

There is here no direct assault upon Judaism, no reference to its lapse from spiritual truth and life into the barrenness of superstitious form. On the contrary, the Jewish Scriptures furnish his starting-point, his constant resting-place and reference. There is a clear implication running through this sermon (and through all other discourses of the Acts) that the old dispensation was the foundation of the new, the Jewish of the Christian; that the teachings, ceremonies, and events of the Jewish Church all bore with an intense significance upon the development of Christianity. And now, under the express inspiration of the Holy Ghost, Peter traces (and after him Stephen and Paul) these events which had wrought their wonder to the previous prophecies, and then conclusively shows that Christ himself is the Messiah of these Scriptures. But in the midst and at the close of his reasoning he tells them, with perfect quietness and simplicity of utterance, that they have delivered up and crucified this Jesus.

12, 13. A large number were simply astonished at these marvels, and in utter perplexity that they could not account for them. Another class scoffed and sneeringly said, These men are frenzied with strong drink. (Sicet wine is referred to, not new, made by soaking dried grapes in old wine and pressing them a second time.) We see here, what was so often seen in Christ's own history, of how little avail are miracles in affecting a hardened will and an unbelieving heart.

14, 15. Peter affirms, for his companions and himself, that they are not drunken; and only refers to the improbability of any one being intoxicated at so early an hour (before nine o'clock). For all knew it was a universal rule among the Jews, bad and good, not to eat or drink before morning prayer, which was at this hour.

16-18. He has said, This is not intoxication; now he asserts that it is inspiration. What you see and hear is nothing else than the fulfillment of the prophecy of Joel; and then he cites the prophet's words. One well remarks here, "Even the illumination of the Spirit can never render the written word superfluous. The apostle, when filled with the Spirit, seeks a firm foundation in the word of prophecy" (2 Pet. 1 : 19). "The last days," referred to here, include the whole period of the Spirit's working—the entire Christian dispensation now far advanced. In this new dispensation, the prophecy notes as one point of advance that there shall be perfect equality in spiritual privileges. Not only shall the Spirit be poured out, far more largely and abundantly imparted, but in this outpouring of the Spirit all classes shall equally partake, without distinction of sex, of age, of condition, or of race. There shall be no longer a Court of the Women, or of the Gentiles, or even of the Priests, but all partition walls shall be broken down, and the very Holy of Holies opened for evermore to "Jew and Greek," to "bond and free," to "male and female," since henceforth, inhabited by the same Spirit, "all are one in Christ Jesus." These predictions may have manifold applications throughout these "last days." Primarily, they refer to the near destruction of the Jewish state and nation. But they also apply to other nations, that serve not Christ and that hinder the progress of his gospel. And the symbols have in all cases the same meaning. The wonders and signs, of darkness and blood and fire and smoke, are portents of calamities that are familiar in the history of the past, and will be repeated yet more signally until the "great and notable day of the Lord shall come."

But while the predictions of judgment are general and spoken of the mass, the promise of salvation is individual and personal, and, like all the promises of the Old Testament and New, it is without limitation or exception. One condition only, calling on the Lord, implying a conviction of fearful personal peril, a belief that the Lord can and will save, a simple trust in him, and reliance upon his faithfulness to his own voluntary promise. With this condition as a permanent inward experience, Christians of this day, and of the very latest days, like those who were saved (every one) from the awful slaughter in Jerusalem, shall be surely delivered, and rejoice in the salvation of God.

22, 23. Peter has accounted for the miraculous sound and gift of tongues. Now he turns to the main point of his discourse, that Jesus of Nazareth, the man they had known and crucified, now risen and exalted into heaven, had "shed forth this which" they had seen and heard (verse 33), and that the same Jesus is Lord and Messiah (verse 36). In introducing this central theme of the gospel, the apostle elevates correspondingly the style of his address. Including all foreign and native Jews, under their highest title, Israel, he respectfully solicits their attention, and lends dignity to the charge he lays plainly upon them. "Ye yourselves know," he said, "that Jesus was sufficiently accredited to you by the miracles he did, and the wonderful events that attended him." Precisely this had Christ himself said to them again and again, when claiming perfect unity with the Father in the power of working miracles. Then in the simplest but most explicit words, forbearing all irritating epithet, he declares that they, knowing these things, had apprehended and crucified him by heathen hands. They had done it, but God had determined the result, as Christ himself had affirmed, "The Son of man goeth as it was determined." So we learn, signally, how man is guiltily free, because without compulsion save of his own evil passions, and yet God is holily sovereign. For we see in Christ's death, on the one hand, the free acting of voluntary human guilt, and on the other, a fulfilled decree of God for human redemption. But neither divine decree in the interest of mercy, nor Christ's willingness to suffer, changed their relation to their own murderous act, or relieved their consciences from the burdening guilt. B.—The act is declared to be wicked, yet it is equally declared to be by the "determinate counsel of God"; therefore, acts which are evil may be included in the plan of Providence. J. W. A.

24-28. Affirming of his own knowledge that God had raised this Jesus of Nazareth from death, he first assigns the essential reason, that the Lord of life could not be holden of death. So the predictions of the Old Testament assured them. And in proof he cites from the 16th Psalm, and expounds the words cited. David is speaking, not of himself—for in no sense could the words be fulfilled in his experience—but of Christ. B.—It may be conceived that in David the dread of corruption and of the dark valley of death awakened the longing desire of victory over it; and this the prophetic Spirit led him to see realized in the person of the Messiah. Now, in Psalm 16, death is contemplated, first, in relation to the body, and secondly, to the soul. The body is represented as guarded against the last effect of death, viz., corruption, and the soul is described as beholding indeed the dark place of shades ("hell," or better, hades), but as speedily delivered from it and restored to the kingdom of light. The exactness with which these points were realized in the development of Christ's life makes the prediction one of the most remarkable in holy writ. Hackett.

29-31. To insure their conviction that David is here predicting the Messiah's resurrection, the apostle reasons further, simply but conclusively from the death and burial of David, and from his faith in the covenant God had made concerning Christ. Thus the threefold conclusion is reached, the glorious substance of this first proclamation of the gospel: This Jesus hath God raised up; having received of the Father the promise of the Holy Ghost, He hath shed forth this, which ye see and hear; therefore let all the house of Israel know assuredly that God hath made this Jesus whom ye have crucified both Lord and Christ! (Verses 32, 33, 36.) B.

One of the blessed fruits of the day of Pentecost was that the Holy Spirit, who had spoken of old by the prophets and in the Psalms, now interprets their words by the apostles. On that day he founded in the Church a school of Scriptural hermeneutics. He declared on his own divine authority that certain Scriptures which he expounded by the mouth of Peter, inspired by the divine Teacher the Comforter, refer to Christ. He teaches us how they apply to Christ, and has given us a key for unlocking other prophecies of like import. W.—Here, too, we may see how the Old Testament, or Judaism in its purity, underlies Christianity, furnishing its foundation facts and proofs. Both are equally from God, and, of course, in harmony with each other. Each interprets the other. The new or Christian dispensation is the natural expansion of the old or Jewish. The principle of membership, faith, and the spirit of service and worship, are alike in both. The only difference is in the forms of obedience and devotion, and the extent of knowledge. B.

32. Witnesses. They knew that which they affirm. At first, in their anticipations of a visible kingdom, they would not believe that Christ would die. But they were compelled to believe the fact when it transpired. They did not believe that he would rise again; they even doubted the first report of it; they yielded at last to the direct, positive, visible fact, and, when thus convinced, they believed fully. Then it was they became witnesses of what their eyes had seen and their hands had handled; and assured of its truth, as a living confirmation of the divine gospel, they devoted themselves to the proclamation of this truth among the nations. S. W. F.

33. The great gift of the Spirit at this eventful hour came before the universe as the Father's endorsement of the scheme of salvation to which the Son was fully committed. It testified that henceforth the whole Deity—every perfection and power of the Triune God, Father, Son, and Spirit—are at one in working for this sublime consummation, the redemption of the world to Christ. II. C.

THIS view of the operation of the Spirit, as the medium through which the Lord Jesus wrought and taught, is carried through the whole course of the history which follows. As in the promise, so in the history, "The Comforter will come unto you"—"I will come unto you"—are but two sides of one and the same fact. On critical occasions and at each onward step the hand of the Master is made distinctly visible. The first martyr dies for a testimony, which is felt to be an advance on what had been given before, being understood to imply that "this Jesus of Nazareth shall destroy this place, and change the customs which Moses delivered us"; and his words are sealed by the vision of his Lord in glory. The consignment of the gospel to the Ethiopian proselyte was another step in advance, and for this "the angel of the Lord spake unto Philip." The preaching of the Word to Gentiles, and their admission into the Church, was a greater step; and for this the Lord intervenes by the mission of an angel to Cornelius, by a vision and a voice of the Spirit to Peter, and by a kind of second Pentecost to the converts themselves. But when the greatest step of all is to be taken in the onward course of the gospel, then most visibly does the great Head of the Church make manifest his personal administration. A new apostle appears, not like him who was added before Pentecost, completing the number of the original college, and losing his individuality in its ranks, but one standing apart and in advance, under whose hand both the doctrines and the destinies of the gospel receive a development so extensive and so distinct that it seemed almost another gospel to many who witnessed it, and to some who study it seems so still. Thus does he, who at the commencement of the history was seen to pass into the heavens, continue to appear in person on the scene. His apostles act, not only on his past commission, but under his present direction. He is not wholly concealed by the cloud which had received him out of their sight. Now his voice is heard, now his hand put forth, and now through a sudden rift the brightness of his presence shines. And these appearances, voices, and visions are not merely incidental favors; they are, as we have seen, apportioned to the moments when they are wanted, moments which determine the course which the gospel takes, and in which a manifestation of divine guidance proves the divine guidance of the whole. Section 195.

Acts ii. 37-47.

87 Now when they heard this, they were pricked in their heart, and said unto Peter and 88 to the rest of the apostles, Men and brethren, what shall we do? Then Peter said unto them, Repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remis- 89 sion of sins and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost. For the promise is unto you, and to your children, and to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall 40 call. And with many other words did he testify and exhort, saying, Save yourselves from 41 this untoward generation. Then they that gladly received his word were baptized: and the same day there were added unto them about three thousand souls.

42 And they continued stedfastly in the apostles' doctrine and fellowship, and in breaking 43 of bread, and in prayers. And fear came upon every soul: and many wonders and signs 44 were done by the apostles. And all that believed were together, and had all things com-45 mon; and sold their possessions and goods, and parted them to all men, as every man had 46 need. And they, continuing daily with one accord in the temple, and breaking bread from 47 house to house, did eat their meat with gladness and singleness of heart, praising God, and having favour with all the people. And the Lord added to the church daily such as should be saved.

THE Christian faith is shown to us, in the Acts of the Apostles, working out its first simple developments in human society. In that plain picture, we see how this new force, this divine idea, acted on the world of living men and women; how it took possession of them, and organized them into a peculiar institution, which has lived on ever since—the Church. Christ's visible presence is withdrawn out of the world at his resurrection; but thenceforth he appears to mankind in the living body of his Church, which, holding in its heart and its hand his Spirit and his Word, takes the place of his physical form. F. D. H.

Doubtless the form in which spiritual life now appears, differs in many respects from what it was at first; but in essence and principle it is the same, and all who are now gathered into the Church of the redeemed are really akin to the first confessors of the gospel. It is a church consisting of such as shall be saved; it is the spiritual body of Christ born of the Holy Ghost. It is wholly our own fault if we are not members of it; it is wholly the grace of the Lord if we are in truth brought into it. Van O.— Daily, ever since men were multiplied on the earth, have the saved streamed through the strait gate into life, and now a multitude whom no man can number inhabit the mansions of the Father's house. He added the saved to the Church: added them in the act of saving, saved in the act of adding. He does not add a withered branch to the vine; but in the act of inserting it, makes the withered branch live.
“Daily” some are added: every day some; but only while it is day this process goes on. The night cometh wherein no man can work—not even the Son of man, Son of God. He is now about his Father's business: he is finishing the work given him to do. “To-day, if ye will hear his voice, harden not your hearts,” for the day is wearing away, the day of grace. The night cometh, cometh—how stealthily it is creeping on!—the night wherein not even this Great Worker can work any more. Arnot.

37. Effect of the First Preaching of Christ crucified, with the Power of the Holy Ghost.—Peter has proved to them, according to the clear statements of their own Scriptures, that Jesus was their long-looked-for Messiah; that they had rejected and slain him; but that he had risen, ascended, and from the throne of heaven had sent forth the Holy Ghost to teach, to convince, and to quicken. And the proof of the Spirit's convincing power we behold in this his first work upon multitudes of the guiltiest among the then living—of those to whom pertained the guilt of crucifying their own Messiah. Pierced in the heart, their understandings convinced, their feelings deeply stirred, and their wills mightily influenced by the combined force of the truth and the Spirit, they ask the one question of conscious guilt, What shall we do? Utterly self-condemned, their consciences demanding relief from the tremendous pressure of such guilt, they turn to these very Galileans whom they had despised, and with an awakened gentleness of penitence, answer back the address of Peter, Men, brethren! tell us, what shall we do to be saved? B.

The divine Spirit may, and, for aught that appears to the contrary, must use the instrument of Truth in this, his first act, as well as in any and in every further operation. And when he speaks, he makes the deaf to hear, as well as the hearing to understand. “When they heard this, they were pricked in their heart,” was the experience of the three thousand to whom Peter preached the gospel on the day of Pentecost, and whose hard hearts the Spirit pierced by what they heard. J. S. S.

38. The One Counsel and Promise of the Gospel to those convinced of Unbelief and Guilt.—The counsel is twofold: Repent and be baptized: likewise the promise, the remission of sins and the gift of the Holy Ghost. Christ, on the eve of his ascension, had instructed them to preach repentance and remission of sins in his name, and Peter now uses, so far, his very words. The word “repentance” means simply “change of mind,” the reversal of a man's controlling thoughts, feelings, and aims of life. Sorrow forms no part of the meaning, but sorrow is involved in and precedes it. More than this, “godly sorrow,” sorrow toward God, “work-eth repentance," leads to a radical change of sentiment, feeling, and purpose, with respect to man's relation and duty toward God. Repentance, then, is the turning of the whole soul from self to God, and involves the breaking off from a selfish, sinful course of life, and the entrance upon a life of obedience, trust, and supreme devotion to God. And this repentance, while it is man's own act, is not simply of his own unaided and spontaneous doing, and so meritorious; but it is performed under the prompting and with the help of God himself. And so in this, as in all else, salvation is wholly of grace. The cases before us admirably illustrate and impress this meaning of the familiar gospel term.

The additional outward requirement of baptism was designed as an expression of their faith in Jesus as Messiah and Saviour, and of their open consecration to his service. On God's part, it is his seal of acceptance and of his fulfillment of all the promises included in the covenant of grace. As Christ had commanded, baptism was administered in the name of the Three Divine Persons. Hence the expression here, in the name of Jesus Christ, signifies the recognition of his authority and the acceptance of his doctrine, his mediatorship, and his service.

Of the twofold promise, enforcing the counsel or exhortation, the remission or forgiveness of sins stands foremost. So it stands first in David's enunciation of mercies in that life-psalm of the grateful heart, the one hundred and third. It is first, not merely as it ministers quiet to conscience and heart, but as it changes the standing of the pardoned soul with reference to the law of God, and makes the further gifts of God consistent and meet. The gift of the Holy Ghost, next promised, refers not to any miraculous tokens such as they had heard that day, but to that indwelling and in-working of the divine Spirit which is given to every penitent believer in Jesus.

39. "The promise" is that of which he has been speaking (verses 17, 21), the quickening power of the Holy Ghost, and the "being saved" by Christ. To you and to your children this promise is given. To you, though you have crucified your Saviour. To your children, meaning, in the passage from Joel, and in similar passages in Isaiah and elsewhere, to your descendants or posterity. But the implication is clear, that children as children are also included. For from the first day of the covenant with Abraham, the children of every covenanting parent were distinctly recognized, and the recognition sealed by divine ordinance, as members of the Church and people of God. B.—We are expressly told that under Christ, in the New Testament, the same covenant is renewed, only expanded and deepened. Throughout, the law of descent is carefully respected. The hereditary tie is recognized. Offspring, at birth, are supposed to be bound up in the same bond of Christian privileges and helps which encircles their believing progenitors. F. D. H.—And to all afar off, is the simple widening of the hope and promise of the gospel to include Gentile with Jew. It is the plain intimation that the divine forgiveness and indwelling are in purpose designed, and in measure adequate, for the race of guilty men.

40. The Discourse prolonged but not reported, save in its Substance and Conclusion.—In keeping with the great essential truths already stated, he continued to testify and exhort. The order of these words, especially the dependence of exhortation upon testimony or instruction, is worthy of note. It intimates that what is called "exhortation" is Scriptural and useful, when it follows and is strictly based upon Scripture truth. Peter's concluding exhortation is brief and to the point—"Save yourselves," or be saved, by separating yourselves from this perverse and gainsaying generation, and so escaping its doom.

41. The Result of that Day's Ministry of the Gospel with the Holy Spirit.—"Greater works than mine shall ye do," said Christ, "because I go to the Father, and send upon you the Spirit." And now, at the very outset, closely following his ascension to the Father, three thousand souls gladly receive the glad tidings, are baptized, and enrolled as members of the infant Church of Christ. An amazing fulfillment, too, of the word of Christ to the fisherman Peter, "From henceforth thou shalt catch men."

42. Four Essential Elements in the Christian Life of these First Believers.—First, as most important, they received needed instruction from the twelve, and perhaps from others. This was as the Master had directed. After making disciples, and baptizing, then teaching more fully all things I have commanded—so ran the commission. And this is still the only wise, true method. After receiving and enrolling disciples, then instruct fully. Steadfast heed to instruction in God's Word was and is needed, not only for personal growth in the Christian life, but for the great life-duty of every believer, of bearing witness concerning Christ. How well these early believers learned the spirit of Christ, we see from their continuance in fellowship. This means communication, not communion, and refers particularly to that self-sacrificing spirit of love to our neighbor and fellow which prompts to deeds of helpfulness, the actual communication of good in supply of his need. The idea is actualized in the facts stated in verses 44 and 45. The third particular, the breaking of bread, refers to the Lord's Supper, which was naturally a divine means of deep and tender impression, as well as of confirming other instruction. Such is still its purpose, and may be, if rightly partaken, its increasingly happy effect. The last element of Christian life in the practice of which these first believers continued steadfast, was prayer. All other means and evidences of life or growth are vain where prayer, fervent, continuous, and expectant, is wanting. "Behold, he prayeth!" was the offered and accepted proof of Saul's conversion. And it is the surest, safest test of continued Christian life.

43. The Impression made upon the Multitude of Unbelievers.—"Fear came upon every soul!" This shows how broad and deep was the impression wrought by the miracles and the preaching of those wonderful days. The great body of the people were subdued and awed. No voice of mocking was heard, no thought of persecution was cherished among them. Not till the instigators and leading actors in the Crucifixion, the chief priests and rulers, were aroused by hearing of these wonderful effects, did persecution begin. B.

44. All things common. There was a special reason for this at Jerusalem, where converts to Christianity would be regarded by the Jews as renegades, and be cut off from domestic intercourse and from former means of subsistence. The need to be met was instant and special, and such as did not exist afterward among the churches formed among the heathen. K.

45. The Mutual Abounding Helpfulness of these First Christians.—In this sharing and distribution of goods there was no surrender of personal rights of property, as Peter's words to Ananias clearly show. There was no "community of goods," as each proprietor himself sold and distributed such portion as he pleased. But as each one having possessions saw the needs of others, and felt the call and obligation to aid, he sold so much as his judgment prescribed, and "parted," distributed to them relief. That is, a conscientious judgment was exercised in connection with charitable feeling. There was no compulsion of apostolic commandment, nor any improper self-improvement. What heart conscience and judgment together dictated, they gave, according to the gospel principle of stewardship and trust (so thoroughly taught to and by the apostles). Alike in their worship, their helpfulness, their active ministry for Christ and for men, and in receiving their daily food, gladness and singleness of heart prompted them to blend, with all, the praises of God. How beautiful, yet natural, this conclusion of the briefly told story! And how natural, too, the recorded result of this harmonious, praying, self-denying, praising, happy fellowship! The accordant daily prayers and praises are heard and accepted. The single-hearted love to God and man, evinced in faithful word and helpful deed, deepens grateful devotion to the Lord of all grace. And as the blessed effect of answered prayer, accepted praise, and helpful word and deed, Christ, the Lord, adds to their number daily of the saved! And ever since, through the same instrumentality of human prayer and praise, of faithful, self-denying word and deed, the saved have been daily added to the blessed family of which Christ is the head! B.

46. In the temple. The apostles and primitive disciples would not separate themselves from the Temple, but resorted habitually to it, that it might not be supposed that the gospel which they preached was at variance with the law of Moses, and that they might give a practical confirmation to their argument that Christ has been foretold by Moses and the Prophets, whose office it was to prepare the way for him. W.

The first representatives of the Christian Church on earth were the disciples, of varied name and pursuit—men and women who first adhered to Christ with intelligent faith in him, as the Saviour of the world. The first local and particular church was that formed in Jerusalem. But there was in fact little of "forming" in the matter. It formed itself, as it were. It was a collection of believing men and women, who were baptized in testimony of their Christian belief. All the organization there was about it appears to have been as exigencies arose, necessities required, and proprieties prompted. What Christ enjoined was, that every creature should believe on him as the personal Redeemer; that all who believe on him should observe his ordinances, baptism, and the Lord's Supper. Nothing beyond this do we find in the record. Our Lord always individualizes men. Faith in the heart of the particular man is the essential thing. All those who believed on him after this manner, gravitating toward a common center, naturally and voluntarily associated together, and so particular churches were formed and organized, by the election of their own officials and the administration of their own rules. So simply lies the whole matter in the New Testament. W. A.

Section 196.

Acts iii. 1-26.

1 Now Peter and John went up together into the temple at the hour of prayer, being the 2 ninth hour. And a certain man lame from his mother's womb was carried, whom they laid
 3 daily at the gate of the temple which is called Beautiful, to ask alms of them that entered 4 into the temple; who seeing Peter and John about to go into the temple asked an alms.
 5 And Peter, fastening his eyes upon him with John, said, Look on us. And he gave heed 6 unto them, expecting to receive something of them. Then Peter said, Silver and gold have 7 I none; but such as I have give I thee: In the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth rise up 8 and walk. And he took him by the right hand, and lifted him up: and immediately his 9 feet and ankle bones received strength. And he leaping up stood, and walked, and entered 10 with them into the temple, walking, and leaping, and praising God. And all the people 11 saw him walking and praising God: and they knew that it was he which sat for alms at 12 the Beautiful gate of the temple: and they were filled with wonder and amazement at that 13 which had happened unto him. And as the lame man which was healed held Peter and 14 John, all the people ran together unto them in the porch that is called Solomon's, greatly 15 wondering.

16 And when Peter saw it, he answered unto the people, Ye men of Israel, why marvel ye 17 at this? or why look ye so earnestly on us, as though by our own power or holiness we 18 had made this man to walk? The God of Abraham, and of Isaac, and of Jacob, the God 19 of our fathers, hath glorified his Son Jesus; whom ye delivered up, and denied him in the 20 presence of Pilate, when he was determined to let him go. But ye denied the Holy One 21 and the Just, and desired a murderer to be granted unto you; and killed the Prince of life, 22 whom God hath raised from the dead; whereof we are witnesses. And his name through 23 faith in his name hath made this man strong, whom ye see and know: yea, the faith which 24 is by him hath given him this perfect soundness in the presence of you all. And now, 25 brethren, I wot that through ignorance ye did it, as did also your rulers. But those things, 26 which God before had shewed by the mouth of all his prophets, that Christ should suffer, he hath so fulfilled.

19 Repent ye therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out, when the 20 times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord; and he shall send Jesus 21 Christ, which before was preached unto you: whom the heaven must receive until the 22 times of restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy 23 prophets since the world began. For Moses truly said unto the fathers, A prophet shall 24 the Lord your God raise up unto you of your brethren, like unto me; him shall ye hear in 25 all things whatsoever he shall say unto you. And it shall come to pass, that every soul, 26 which will not hear that prophet, shall be destroyed from among the people. Yea, and all the prophets from Samuel and those that follow after, as many as have spoken, have likewise foretold of these days. Ye are the children of the prophets, and of the covenant which God made with our fathers, saying unto Abraham, And in thy seed shall all the kindreds of the earth be blessed. Unto you first God, having raised up his Son Jesus, sent him to bless you, in turning away every one of you from his iniquities.

THE apostle enforces his exhortation to repent by an appeal to the final coming of Christ, not because he would represent it as near in point of time, but because that event was always near to the feelings and consciousness of the first believers. It was the great consummation on which the strongest desires of their souls were fixed, to which their thoughts and hopes were habitually turned. They lived in expectation of it; they labored to be prepared for it; they were, in the expressive language of Peter, looking for and hasting unto it. It is then that Christ will reveal himself in glory, will raise the dead, invest the redeemed with an incorruptible body, and introduce them for the first time and for ever into the state of perfect holiness and happiness prepared for them in his kingdom. The apostles, the first

Christians in general, comprehended the grandeur of that occasion; it stood forth to their contemplations as the point of culminating interest in their own and the world's history, threw into comparative insignificance the present time, death, all intermediate events, and made them feel that the manifestation of Christ, with its consequences of indescribable moment to all true believers, was the grand object which they were to keep in view as the end of their toils, the commencement and perfection of their glorious immortality. In such a state of intimate sympathy with an event so habitually present to their thoughts, they derived their chief incentives to action from the prospect of that future glory; they hold it up to the people of God to encourage them to fidelity, zeal, and perseverance, and appeal to it to warn the wicked, and impress upon them the necessity of preparation for the revelations of that day. Hackett.

1. Strong as was the contrast in natural character and disposition between Peter and John, these were the two of all the twelve who finally drew closest together. The day of Pentecost wrought a great change upon them both, and by doing so linked them in still closer bonds. The grace was given them which enabled each to struggle successfully with his own original defects, and to find in the other that which he most wanted. It is truly singular, in reading the earlier chapters of the Acts of the Apostles, to notice how close the coalition between Peter and John became. W. H.—Now and for a considerable period, they are joint leaders of the apostolic band, Peter the speaker, John the counselor and inspirer.

While on their way to the afternoon service of daily worship in the temple, they are accosted. It should be borne in mind that the disciples had no command to withdraw at once from the Jewish worship. According to the universal law of God's acting, there were no sudden or extreme transitions directed by the Holy Spirit. Judaism was not to be overthrown and obliterated, but gradually transformed by the infusion into it of the spirit of Christianity. Sacrifice and incense were to them merely symbols of the death now accomplished for sin, and the intercession now availing in the heavens. For a time, therefore, and with the purpose of using these ceremonials to impress the realities they shadowed forth upon other minds, the disciples retained their relation to the Jewish church, and conformed to its pure temple worship. We shall find the illustration of this in the further history.

2, 3. A Lame Man asks Aid of Peter and John at the Temple Gate.—The parallel to this case is the impotent man at Bethesda (John 5). That man was thirty-eight years a wreck. This one had never walked, and for forty years had been recognized and known as a helpless dependent cripple. For a long time he had been carried every morning to the Beautiful Gate of the Temple, there to solicit help from the multitude of passers-by. As the name implies, this was the most magnificent and costly of the nine chief gates. Forming the eastern entrance to the Temple, it fronted the holy place or sanctuary, and was more frequented than any other. (Vol. I., p. 628.)

4-6. Peter's Double Reply.—First, concentrating his gaze, with that of John, upon the suppliant, he answers, "Look on us!" They had learned the Master's method, and were now practicing it. He, almost always, tarried to question, or to interpose some act which required delay. And his purpose was always the same; to excite or deepen expectation, faith, hope on the part of the helpless needy one. He always helped the spirit first; led it to trust, and then deepened the trust by rewarding it with healing. So the twain disciples stirred the man to expect some gift—how much, he knew not.

Then followed Peter's response to the man's entreaty: "Rise, walk, in the name of Jesus of Nazareth!" A stupendous, sublime faith in Christ's absolute Deity and Lordship stands out in these bold words! To these disciples he is indeed the living reigning God. His own spirit of mercy toward misery led them thus to invoke his willing might for deliverance of the wretched. And it is the title of the Cross by which they invoke his presence and favor, the name by which he was lifted up, by which he was already known, and by which he would draw all men unto him. Surely the poor sufferer had heard and knew full well this name, and the sound stirred his heart to more than expectation, even to faith. For there was no doubt or hesitation. He obeyed so far as he could, in his will and heart. And this was faith, a dawning feeble but real faith!

7, 8. The Restoration, and its Effects upon the Healed Man.—Not only by Peter's expression of utter dependence upon the power of Christ, but also by his act in taking the man's hand and lifting him up, do we distinguish the disciple's miracle-working from the Master's. Christ spoke, sometimes touched, but never used physical strength in connection with any miracle. This act of Peter has also significance, on one side, as proving his faith in his own bold command, to rise; and on the other, as indicating that faith to the man, and so helping to excite the corresponding faith and effort in his soul. The restoration which instantly followed, and the added miracle of instantaneous ability to walk and leap (for one who had never walked), proved and justified the word and deed and faith of Peter. And the restored man's exclusive praise to God, in entire disregard of the apostle for the time, as conclusively proved the reality of his faith, and of his recognition of Jesus Christ as Lord and God. So "his name, through faith in his name, made this man strong."

Like many miracles of healing, this may be regarded as a parable of redemption. It suggests these points: imperfection of a far deeper and more grievous kind as the universal birthright of the fallen soul; its helplessness and hopelessness of human cure; the limit of friendly interest and help, bringing the soul in the arms of faith, and pleading with God the prayer of faith; the sinner's responsive willingness, desire, and faith; and the consequent healing and forgiveness in the name and by the Spirit of Christ.

Obedience, willing submission to God is the first act of a returning soul. This man obeyed in his will and heart, and in this he did all that he could. So let every soul seeking life obey the first felt duty, obey it by prayer, or act of consecration, but obey it in will and heart. Then Christ's Spirit will give life. We may well believe that this man's soul was quickened to a peculiarly deep trust and consecration. In him, and in the many Christ had healed, apart from their natural joy and thankfulness for great restoration, there must have been wrought a depth and strength of conviction concerning his divine Messiahship that nothing could shake. "I, at least," each must have said and often repeated, "I, at least, know him to be my Saviour and my Lord!" And how large the ministry and effective the testimony for Christ, of this vast company of the physically and spiritually healed, none can adequately measure! B.

9-11. Effect upon the People.—For years he must have been one of the persons best known to all the inhabitants of Jerusalem; and this tended further to magnify the miracle when he appeared at the hour of public prayer in the Temple, "walking, and leaping, and praising God." K.—They saw him restored, heard him praising God for his restoration, and knew that it was the same whom they had long noticed lying helpless at the gate; and they were filled with wonder and amazement. Isaiah's prophecy had been literally fulfilled before their eyes, "The lame man shall leap as a hart." Other wonders had the apostles performed during the now considerable interval since the Pentecost, but none so marked as this by the clearest proof of divine power. It was designed, we afterward see, as an occasion of another great discourse, another immense ingathering of saved souls; and also proved the immediate cause of the first hostile movement of the priests and rulers. The tidings of the miracle rapidly spread through the city, and a multitude of people thronged into the Temple. They gathered in the wide space, beneath the lofty double-pillared portico on the eastern side, called Solomon's, because standing on a terrace which he had raised from the valley beneath. Here they found the healed man standing between Peter and John, holding a hand of each in token of his grateful affection to them, while still praising God for his restoring power. And with this visible, most affecting testimony before them, Peter, as a fisher of men, seizes his opportunity, and preaches again to the multitude Christ and him crucified. (Vol. I., p. 620.)

12. He answered, not to any uttered question, but as Christ so often is said to have answered, to the unspoken state or inquiry of the minds and hearts gathered around him. And as we have seen the power of Jesus' name in the healing of this one body and soul, so in the result of this second sermon we see it in the healing of thousands of souls.

13-15. Their God had glorified, but they had denied and killed Jesus, the Prince of Life.—It was no other than the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob, their only, proudly acknowledged God, whose Son this Jesus was, whom they had just before rejected, scorned, and murdered. This great crime is pressed upon them in its particular aggravations by sharp contrasts. Peter thus helps them to see themselves and their guilty deeds as the God of their fathers sees it. The Holy Spirit directs and uses the charge to convince of the sin of not believing in Christ—everywhere, in all generations, the sin of sins, set down as the only sin that brings condemnation. So the apostle tells them that when Pilate, an uncircumcised, untaught heathen, sought again and again to rescue and release this Son of their God, they, whose accepted Scriptures plainly revealed his divine Sonship, yet pushed their cruel murderous hate to the very end, and killed their own Prince and Saviour. Still more to press their consciences, he contrasts with this pure spotless being, whose death they had demanded, the murderer Barabbas, whom they in their madness of unbelief had preferred and released from deserved death. "You spared," he says, "the destroyer, and doomed to destruction the Saviour of life!" He concludes this clear, plain-spoken home-charge with the assertion, again, of the resurrection of Jesus, as a proof that he is the Prince of life. And he responds again to the Master's word, "We are witnesses!"

16. Christ's Name or Power, exerted in Response to Faith, had healed the Lame Man.—"Ye delivered him up, denied him, preferred a murderer, killed him, but he, the Prince of Life, risen again and ascended, hath wrought this soundness in the man before you, because of our faith, and his, in his divine willingness and might." B.—The old carnal thoughts of his mission had been left in his grave, and could never rise from it again. It was the "Prince of Life" who had risen from the dead; it was the "King of Glory" who had passed into the heavens. And no less did these facts declare the spiritual consequences of his manifestation, since they carried with them the implication of those three corresponding gifts, which we celebrate for evermore, saying with solemn joy, "I believe . . . the forgiveness of sins, the resurrection of the body, and the life everlasting." Toward these topics the preaching of Christ in the Acts of the Apostles continually turns. T. D. B.

17, 18. Peter has spoken plainly. The truth of his charge made it severe. He sees the effect, and then practices another lesson he had learned from the Master. With gentleness and an excusing spirit he seeks to heal after wounding. So Christ had excused the three unwatchful disciples (Peter among them) during his agony, "The flesh is weak." And so had he pleaded on the Cross for his slayers, "They know not what they do!" Now the disciple calls these murderers brethren, and repeats in substance that plea upon the Cross, "Through ignorance ye did it"; and still further goes his gentle, forgiving spirit (now so changed!), "as did your rulers."

And, as Joseph to his brethren, "Ye meant it for evil, but God for good." Peter comforts them with the fact that their guilty deed God had overruled for (it might be) even their own salvation. All their prophets had announced this very deed of theirs as God's way of showing mercy to transgressors. He means to assure them that Christ's blood, though shed by them, was also shed for them, for their forgiveness and cleansing.

19-24. Recall and fix the meaning of these words. Repent is to change the mind, to reverse the current of thought, feeling, will, from self to God; therefore the Scripture says repentance toward God. Be converted is to change the life, to correspond with the changed thought and feeling. One result of this double, entire change is the utter erasure of the sin that our past life has set down in the Book of Account. So God says, "I have blotted out thy transgressions, and will not remember them any more for ever."

The other result is figuratively intimated here. There are diversities of interpretation concerning the times here spoken of. It would seem that the "times of refreshing" referred to the fullness of blessings possessed under the dispensation of the Holy Ghost, until the "times of restitution," or restoration. These latter times, and their consummate blessings, avowedly attend and characterize the second coming of Christ. To all these blessings, promised by all the prophets, and especially by that prophet to whom Moses explicitly referred, by Christ himself, to all the blessings that he has introduced with his first coming, and all that he shall bring at his second coming, the repenting, returning, forgiving, believing soul has access now and hereafter. While from these "every soul who will not hear that prophet" shall be excluded. This is the substance of Peter's earnest plea. It is made more effective with them, as it is based upon the declarations of Moses and all their own prophets. Compare Gen. 17 : 14 and Deut. 18 : 15-19. And now, in conclusion, he gathers and emphasizes the entire truth he has spoken, his charge of guilt, his excuse, his counsel and encouragement to repentance and faith in Christ. In the way of concentrated promise and appeal, 25, 26. He declares Jesus to be the Promised Seed of Abraham, the Son of God, sent to bless them, every One.—"Children of the prophets and of the covenant," he calls them; those who have a hereditary interest and intimate connection with the prophecies and promises of God. Frankly Peter acknowledges their descent and their privileges, purposely classing himself among them to strengthen the force of his words that follow: "Unto you first," in the fulfillment of this long-continued covenant, God has sent this Jesus, his Son, to bless you. But plainly and faithfully he tells them, what as a people they had long been ignorant of, that the main blessing of this their old and long-trusted covenant first made with Abraham was the turning away every one from his iniquities. Not restored temporal power or national exaltation, which had been their dream for generations, but the cleansing of their souls through the blood of Christ. And he intimates as clearly that without this saving from sin, through personal repentance and conversion, all the covenants and promises, through patriarchs and prophets, would be only occasions of a deeper condemnation. The discourse was rudely interrupted at this point, but not till it was completed. The effect is narrated in the next chapter. Two thousand more believed—5,000 men in all.

SUMMARY OF LEADING THOUGHTS AND LESSONS.

WE discern a wonderful comprehensiveness and unity in the discourse. The substance of all revelation, the purpose of all the divine counsels and acts from the beginning, the subject of all divine predictions by the mouth of successive prophets, the theme of all divine promises, center in and upon the person, the suffering, the sacrifice of Christ, upon the incomparable spiritual and eternal blessings he has brought with his first coming, and will bring with his second appearing. John sums it all up in a single sentence at the close of the inspired canon: The testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy!

The one purpose of Christ's coming is to bless every one in turning him from his iniquities. Faith in his name, trust in his blood, with personal repentance and conversion, are the conditions of renewal by the Holy Ghost. And whatever period and blessedness are intended by the "times of refreshing and restitution," this is clear, that it is only the repentant and believing, the forgiven and sanctified of all nations, who shall know and experience all their meaning and reality. The Jew first—but the Jew as believer, not as Jew—and also the Gentile.

Both discourses of Peter, with their effect, admirably interpret and illustrate the Holy Spirit's office work as described by Christ (John 16 : 8-11). He convinces of the sin of sins, the not believing in Christ; of the justifying righteousness wrought by Christ through his substituted sacrifice; and of the judgment of God against the finally impenitent and unbelieving. B.

These successive witness-bearings of Peter are all framed on one model, all strike the same note. In every one there is—1st, a Scriptural argument, more or less full, identifying Jesus with the Messiah of the prophets; 2d, a plain, piercing charge, laying the guilt of crucifying Christ to the door of his audience and judges; and 3d, a tender and pressing offer of mercy, through the blood of Christ, to his murderers. Arnot.

The hearers of these discourses had been among the multitude who had answered Pilate, "His blood be upon us and our children!" That blood was upon all of them, upon the five thousand who believed and repented for their justification and eternal life, and upon the unrepentant and unbelieving for their condemnation and eternal death. So has it ever been, so is it now; in every individual case either the blood of forgiveness and blessing or of abiding wrath and curse.

Whatever view be taken of Christ's second coming, let it be seriously considered that almost every page of the New Testament refers to the sublime fact and its consequences, in the way of appeal and motive to Christian practice and life, side by side with the fact and results of his first coming! Section 197.

Acts iv. 1-31.

1 AND as they spake unto the people, the priests, and the captain of the temple, and the 2 Sadducees, came upon them, being grieved that they taught the people, and preached 3 through Jesus the resurrection from the dead. And they laid hands on them, and put 4 them in hold unto the next day: for it was now eventide. Howbeit many of them which heard the word believed; and the number of the men was about five thousand.

5 And it came to pass on the morrow, that their rulers, and elders, and scribes, and Annas
6 the high priest, and Caiaphas, and John, and Alexander, and as many as were of the kin-7 dred of the high priest, were gathered together at Jerusalem. And when they had set them in the midst, they asked, By what power, or by what name, have ye done this?

8 Then Peter, filled with the Holy Ghost, said unto them, Ye rulers of the people, and 9 elders of Israel, if we this day be examined of the good deed done to the impotent man, 10 by what means he is made whole; be it known unto you all, and to all the people of Israel, that by the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, whom ye crucified, whom God raised from 11 the dead, even by him doth this man stand here before you whole. This is the stone which 12 was set at nought of you builders, which is become the head of the corner. Neither is there salvation in any other: for there is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved.

13 Now when they saw the boldness of Peter and John, and perceived that they were un-learned and ignorant men, they marvelled; and they took knowledge of them, that they 14 had been with Jesus. And beholding the man which was healed standing with them, they 15 could say nothing against it. But when they had commanded them to go aside out of the 16 council, they conferred among themselves, saying, What shall we do to these men? for that indeed a notable miracle hath been done by them is manifest to all them that dwell in Jeru-17 salem; and we cannot deny it. But that it spread no further among the people, let us 18 straitly threaten them, that they speak henceforth to no man in this name. And they 19 called them, and commanded them not to speak at all nor teach in the name of Jesus. But Peter and John answered and said unto them, Whether it be right in the sight of God to

- 20 hearken unto you more than unto God, judge ye. For we cannot but speak the things 21 which we have seen and heard. So when they had further threatened them, they let them go, finding nothing how they might punish them, because of the people: for all men glori-22 fied God for that which was done. For the man was above forty years old, on whom this miracle of healing was shewed.
- 23 And being let go, they went to their own company, and reported all that the chief priests 24 and elders had said unto them. And when they heard that, they lifted up their voice to God with one accord, and said, Lord, thou art God, which hast made heaven, and earth, 25 and the sea, and all that in them is: who by the mouth of thy servant David hast said, 26 Why did the heathen rage, and the people imagine vain things? The kings of the earth stood up, and the rulers were gathered together against the Lord, and against his Christ.
 27 For of a truth against thy holy child Jesus, whom thou hast anointed, both Herod, and 28 Pontius Pilate, with the Gentiles, and the people of Israel, were gathered together, for to 29 do whatsoever thy hand and thy counsel determined before to be done. And now, Lord, behold their threatenings: and grant unto thy servants, that with all boldness they may 30 speak thy word, by stretching forth thine hand to heal; and that signs and wonders may be done by the name of thy holy child Jesus.
- 31 And when they had prayed, the place was shaken where they were assembled together;
 and they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and they spake the word of God with boldness.

THERE is no power but life-power. You can not move a dying world by speculation, by eloquence, by majestic thought, by argument, by persuasion, except it be kindled, inspired, and accompanied by the Holy Spirit, except it be set on fire of love. If we would speak of Jesus to others, we must have been with him ourselves. If we would speak of heaven to others, and of God, and of sin, and of hell, with the tone and power of reality, with the vividness and fire of one thoroughly in earnest, we must be much with Christ in secret. A Christian can no more be a fervent messenger for God, while running on his own errands, with heart and mind absorbed in the things of this world, than he can serve God and mammon. G. B. C.

There is no way under heaven to be interested in Christ, but by believing. He that believeth shall be saved, let his sins be ever so many or great; and he that believeth not shall be damned, let his sins be ever so little or few. Brooks.—If men need not go to heaven by the Cross, but by some other way, then the Cross may become an old, worn, unused way; no footfall of a traveler may cheer it, heaven may be filled through other avenues, and other songs than those of praise to the Lamb may echo through the arches of the upper Temple. If Christ is not the exclusive Saviour, then other Saviours could be made without the Cross, and the Cross is all an idle waste. We are lost men outside of God's kingdom. There is a way into it—Jesus Christ. There is a name, one name given whereby we can be saved. That name is Jesus. There has come from the sweet heavens over us no other. It is enough. We need no other. J. D.

PETER'S second address to the people, upon the miraculous restoration of the disabled man, was interrupted by the officials of the Temple, who arrested and imprisoned both apostles for the night. The next morning they were formally arraigned before the Sanhedrim, the supreme tribunal of the nation, consisting of the high priests Annas and Caiaphas and their kindred (of the same office), with the elders, or rulers, and scribes, to the number of seventy. These were the men who had tried and condemned Christ. The reference (verse 2) to the resurrection recalls the singular fact that we hear nothing of the Pharisees after Christ's apprehension, although up to that period they had been his leading opponents. At the trial and after it, the Sadducees assumed the chief direction and responbility of the opposition and condemnation of Christ and the apostles. For to this sect belonged the chief priests and the more prominent of the rulers and scribes. B.

1. The captain. The officer of the priests and Levites who kept guard at the Temple—not a Roman functionary. The Romans do not appear, in the Acts, as persecutors of the apostles. The Sadducees. They said that there was no resurrection. They foresaw that their own influence with the people would be impaired if the apostles succeeded in convincing them of the truth of the resurrection in Christ. Hence their activity against the gospel after the resurrection. The high priest and many of his assessors and associates were Sadducees. W.—We find the Sadducees established in the highest office of the priesthood, and possessed of the greatest powers in the Sanhedrim: and yet they did not believe in any future state, nor in any spiritual existence independent of the body. They do not appear to have held doctrines which are commonly called licentious or immoral. On the contrary, they adhered strictly to the moral tenets of the law, as opposed to its mere formal technicalities. They did not overload the sacred books with traditions, or encumber the duties of life with a multitude of minute observances. They were the disciples of reason without enthusiasm—they made few proselytes—their numbers were not great, and they were confined principally to the richer members of the nation. H.

6. Annas. Annas is here called the high priest, and placed before Caiaphas, who was the high priest. The reason seems to be, that though Caiaphas was high priest de facto, being intruded into the office by the civil power of Rome, yet Annas was high priest de jure, and was regarded as such ecclesiastically. Hence our Lord was taken to Annas first (John 18: 13). Annas was the head of the Jewish hierarchy. The nominee of Rome, Caiaphas, had, as such, a subordinate place. W.—Pontiffs and priests, scribes and Pharisees, Herod and Pilate, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, condemned the Truth; they crucified and buried it; but it rose from the tomb and conquered them all, sending forth in its stead twelve preachers of the Word. Huss.

8-12. Peter's Good Confession of Christ, and Daring Impeachment of the Chief Priests and Rulers.—This judicial investigation gave Peter the opportunity which he boldly and faithfully used, while standing in the very place of his Master, of proclaiming Christ crucified as the only Saviour of men. Mark these particulars: Christ's promise that the Spirit should speak in them when they were brought before councils, was here fulfilled. Peter was filled with the Holy Ghost. He speaks respectfully and with dignity, recognizes their rightful authority in the terms of his address. He answers directly to their question, declaring that by the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth—using again to them the title of the Cross—the man stood before them whole. More than this, standing where his Master had stood when he had denied Him, the now rock-like apostle fearlessly charges home upon the very murderers the crime of Christ's crucifixion, and reasserts the offensive doctrine of his resurrection by the God of Israel. And to both the charge and the assertion they were silent. The crucifixion they could not deny, and concerning the resurrection they dared not now repeat their own previous falsehood that the disciples had stolen the body of Jesus by night.

But the brave and faithful preacher of Christ

goes further still. He has asserted the facts of Christ's death and resurrection. Now he emphasizes the central truth of their own Scriptures, and asserts it to be the central truth of all divine revelation. This Christ, he tells them, the Son of God, whom they, the representatives of God himself in the nation and so the builders of God's spiritual house, had rejected, was himself the corner-stone of that spiritual fabric. So their own Scriptures declared. And then, plainly interpreting the figure as Jesus had done (Mat. 21), the apostle, under the inspiration of the Holy Ghost, declares to all the race of sinning men the one supreme disclosure of heaven, that there is salvation in Christ, and in none other!

The whole scene is deeply impressive—a reproduction in many points of the Master's trial! Arraigned before the same judges, the disciple also arraigns and by their own Scriptures convicts them of that crime of the deepest dye—the killing of the Son of God. Nay, he goes further, he preaches salvation through that very Cross to them by whom it had been raised, and, plainly as the Master, utters words of warning to the men before whose bar he stands! B.

10, 11. The way in which the apostles referred to Christ is precisely the way in which he referred to himself. They do not profess to teach simply what he taught; they do not confine themselves to ideas which he put into words. These were not, in their estimation—valuable as they might be in other respects—the one thing needful, the saving truth, the unspeakable gift, the source and means of immortal life. No; it was not what Jesus had said that they dwelt upon, but what he was—what he had done. They preached HIM—they spoke of what he had “accomplished,” and spoke of it in such a way as to show that he, personally, was the life of the world and the light of men, and not that he had simply taught or revealed it. T. B.

13. Better, “when they beheld the freedom of speech of Peter and John, having also previously known, etc.: and they recognized them, that they had been with Jesus.” A.

Effect of this Bold Address upon the Sanhedrim.—They wondered at the boldness of Peter and John, and well they might, for these unknown Galilean peasants, in the presence of the highest in the nation, had dared to turn defense into accusation. With no token of mere fanatics, but with respectful manner and manifest sincerity of conviction, they had spoken and acted. The council wondered too at the knowledge of the men, at their familiarity with and understanding of the Scriptures. And while thus marveling they remembered that this boldness and knowledge had been even more signal-ly evinced by him whom they had crucified, and this likeness of the disciples to the Master led to the further recollection that they had seen Peter and John with Jesus.

14. They could do no more than marvel. They could make no reply, for there stood the man they had so long noticed and known; his very posture a proof, his silent gratitude and eager interest a further confirmation of the miracle.

15-18. Confuted and silenced, they confer together, and seek to quench the Spirit with the Truth by silencing the Human Agents.—The people, to whom Peter had twice preached, convinced of their guilt in crucifying Christ, had asked of the disciples, What shall we do for ourselves? But these proud priests and rulers, untouched in heart and will however convinced in understanding, ask of each other, What shall we do with these men? Gladly would they have stoned them, as soon afterward, when grown a little bolder through increasing malignancy and passion, they stoned Stephen. But now they dared do no more than forbid to preach, or even speak, the name of Jesus. So they forbade Peter and John to continue their work of witnessing for Christ. Mark here, that they said nothing about the further working of miracles. It was not the effect of miracles so much as the word that was preached in explanation of the miracle, the facts of Christ's death and resurrection, attested as the Son of God and Saviour of men by the miracle. So it has been ever since. The word about Christ, convincing of sin and offering mercy, this is the only influence under heaven which leads to repentance and faith, or which hardens the hard soul and stimulates the malignancy of the determinedly malignant.

19, 20. The Brave and Noble Answer of the Two Apostles.—Instantly, tarrying for no conference, of one mind and soul, yet with all respect to the tribunal, they first appeal the question back for further consideration and judgment by asserting this prohibition to be contrary to God's command; and then calmly say that they must speak that which God hath bidden. And, with all their previous knowledge of Christ, with the power of his character and words, with the events of his agony, betrayal, death, resurrection, and ascension, impressed in all their vividness of reality and sublimity of meaning by the Holy Ghost, how could these first heralds of the Cross and ambassadors of the Crucified fail to stand, in this crisis, for God and for the gospel! B.—They had seen and heard such things of and from Christ, they had received such a commission to proclaim him to the world, that it was morally impossible for them to obey the commands of the Sadducees. The courage to obey God rather than man proceeded from what had come under their own experience, from Christ's words, from his works, his life, his resurrection. But this outward experience could have inspired them with no such boldness, if it had not aroused an inward experience; if it had not attached them to Christ as a Friend, a Master, a Saviour, and a King. The influences of things seen and heard within their souls and in their lives created their strength to endure, to resist, to hope on amid discouragements, to believe in the efficacy and the triumph of the gospel. T. D. W.

Here, at its outset, Christianity recognizes the full liberty of the individual conscience, and in so doing puts responsibility solely upon the individual. Thus it establishes the right and the duty of private judgment. B.—Bearing in mind the fact that a right to preach the gospel involved a right to organize churches, and through them carry on a systematic effort to change the religious life of the whole people, it is safe to conclude from these replies that neither civil nor ecclesiastical rulers are authorized to determine what forms of religion may be taught among the people. In obvious harmony with the apostles' language to the Jewish Sanhedrim was their conduct ever after. They acted on the assumption that religious truth should be laid before the mind of every man, in order that he might accept or reject it freely. Hovey.

21, 22. With Further Threats, the Sanhedrim direct the Release of Peter and John.—The manly appeal of the apostles is disregarded. It can not be answered or turned aside with reason. Afraid to go further with persecution, they resort to the persecutor's first and feeblest argument, threatening.

23-30. The First Recorded Prayer of the Christian Church.—Naturally, on their release, the two apostles sought their companions in the faith, the body of believers, and told their story. Then uprose from the hearts of the gathered disciples a simple Scriptural prayer, an appeal based upon what God had revealed of his own power and of his purposed redemption by Christ. All their preaching and prayer are confessedly based upon the very Word of God, apprehended and believed. Notice here, that it is to great truths rather than to special promises they refer. They rest their faith and appeal upon the sovereign might of God, and the certain accomplishment of his plan in the face of all opposition. (The quotations are from Psalm 146 and Psalm 2, and are made clearer by the whole context.) This prophecy of David concerning Christ had been first and most emphatically fulfilled by Herod, representing "the kings"; by Pilate, "the rulers"; by the Roman soldiers, "the heathen"; and the Jews, "the people." But it has had continuous fulfillment in the continuous conflict of Christianity with its foes.

The point upon which they rest in this portion of the prayer is the same Peter brought out in his discourses. They here believingly recognize that this combined agency of rulers and people against Jesus only accomplished the merciful purpose of God, and laid foundations for the establishment and spread of his gracious salvation in all the earth. And with this basis of faith in God's overruling power bringing to pass his purposed redemption, how simply unselfish and manly is the spirit and substance of their prayer! "Now, Lord, behold their threatenings!" No word or thought of vengeance against these malignant murderers and persecutors. Only, behold thou, and interpose as thou wilt, and when thou wilt! And for themselves, they ask no immunity from further persecution or danger, only that their faith and courage may not fail, that they may hold on in their work of testifying for Christ and preaching the Word. Not for the destruction of their enemies and the removal of obstacles, but for steadfastness to endure persecution, boldness to face and strength to surmount difficulties. They do indeed ask for God's miraculous interposition, but not for their help or comfort. Stretch forth thy hand in healing to give assurance that the Word is thine, and that Jesus is Lord and Christ. There is a wonderful simplicity and concentration of faith in God's Word and Christ's work embodied in this first prayer of the infant Church! And the faith was regarded in the instant answer. B.

We see here a Church that prays, and just by this gives incontestable evidence of awakened inward life. Here is, moreover, a Church that prays for her servants. Although we may pray for ourselves, who among us pray for others? Especially what amount of personal and social prayer ascends from us in behalf of the ministers of the Word, from whom so much is required, who are so severely criticised, so often with or without cause condemned, and who must first receive before they can impart to others? Van O.

31. The Sublime Effect wrought outwardly by Miracle and inwardly by the Holy Ghost, in Response to their Prayer.—They had appealed to the might of God, and that appeal was responded to by the palpable interposition of his power in the shaking of the place where they were gathered. They had besought help to obey Christ's last word of direction, faithfully to witness for him, and the Pentecostal power was communicated afresh to them: they were all filled with the Holy Ghost. Their one personal request was that they might, with steadfast, undaunted spirit, stand in the front of peril and declare the word given them to utter. And the answer is recorded in the very terms of their asking: "And they spake the Word of God with boldness." B.

A congregation shows itself here which unites fervent prayer with unanimous work. They do not leave the work entirely to the apostles, but cooperate with them; and, as though reanimated by this awakened life in the Church, these last soon with greater boldness bear witness to the resurrection of the Lord. What think ye? Should no greater blessing be expected on such unanimous prayer and labor and struggle, than on the endless lamentations over both the friends and foes of the Lord, in which so many appear inexhaustible? Van O.

Acts iv. 32-37; v. 1-11.

33 AND with great power gave the apostles witness of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus: 32 and great grace was upon them all. And the multitude of them that believed were of one heart and of one soul: neither said any of them that ought of the things which he possessed was his own; but they had all things common. Neither was there any among them that lacked: for as many as were possessors of lands or houses sold them, and brought the 35 prices of the things that were sold, and laid them down at the apostles' feet: and distribution was made unto every man according as he had need.

36 And Joses, who by the apostles was surnamed Barnabas, (which is, being interpreted, The 37 son of consolation,) a Levite, and of the country of Cyprus, having land, sold it, and 1 brought the money, and laid it at the apostles' feet. But a certain man named Ananias, 2 with Sapphira his wife, sold a possession, and kept back part of the price, his wife also being 3 privy to it, and brought a certain part, and laid it at the apostles' feet. But Peter said, 4 Ananias, why hath Satan filled thine heart to lie to the Holy Ghost, and to keep back part 4 of the price of the land? Whiles it remained, was it not thine own? and after it was sold, was it not in thine own power? why hast thou conceived this thing in thine heart? thou

5 hast not lied unto men, but unto God. And Ananias hearing these words fell down, and 6 gave up the ghost : and great fear came on all them that heard these things. And the 7 young men arose, wound him up, and carried him out, and buried him. And it was about 8 the space of three hours after, when his wife, not knowing what was done, came in. And 9 Peter answered unto her, Tell me whether ye sold the land for so much? And she said, 10 Yea, for so much. Then Peter said unto her, How is it that ye have agreed together to tempt the Spirit of the Lord? behold, the feet of them which have buried thy husband are 11 at the door, and shall carry thee out. Then fell she down straightway at his feet, and yielded up the ghost : and the young men came in, and found her dead, and, carrying her 11 forth, buried her by her husband. And great fear came upon all the church, and upon as many as heard these things.

THE same Peter, who in Christ's name had spoken so gently, and even excusingly, to the very crucifiers of Christ, here, in the same name, denounces the most fearful judgment of God against professed followers of Jesus. Thus the Gospel repeats the declaration of the Law, that God will by no means clear the guilty ; while the injunction is sharply emphasized, "Let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity." And the chief danger to the Church to-day arises not from outward assailants, but from inward corruption or unfaithfulness ; from the false vows of counterfeit members or hypocrites ; and from the incomplete vows or partial consecration of true members. Still Christ's word needs to be heeded by all, Take heed and beware of hypocrisy! Still the Holy Ghost exhorts, Pay unto the Lord thy vows, and Lift up holy hands! Without honest service, sincere, hearty giving as well as praying, let there be no guise of service, of charity or worship, for a Pharisaic show or reputation!

Nothing in human character is so valuable, so beautiful, so Christlike, and therefore so all-essential as truthfulness. Regarded from a merely human aspect, it is the cementing force and safeguard of society. Falsehood, of word or act, is destructive of the order and peace of human fellowship, vitiates the currents of intercourse in the family, in traffic, in social life, and undermines the very foundation of the Church. And God's hatred of hypocrisy and regard of truth, read upon every page of his revelation, may be summed up in two or three statements: Lying lips are an abomination to the Lord; but they that deal truly are his delight! Of the dweller in God's holy hill it is said with a singular emphasis, He speaketh the truth in his heart! And the girdle of the Christian armor, that which binds and holds together the entire panoply, is truth! Then let every disciple of Christ, and every partaker of human fellowship, by word and by life, unweariedly emphasize the supreme worth, and exemplify the inherent beauty of truthfulness! B.

"Jews and proselytes" had come up to the Festival of Pentecost from the banks of the Tigris and Euphrates, of the Nile and of the Tiber, from the provinces of Asia Minor, from the desert of Arabia, and from the islands of the Greek Sea; and when they returned to their homes, they carried with them news which prepared the way for the glad tidings about to issue from Mount Zion to "the uttermost parts of the earth." But as yet the gospel lingered on the holy hill. The first acts of the apostles were "prayer and supplication" in the "upper room"; breaking of bread "from house to house"; miracles in the Temple; gatherings of the people in Solomon's cloister, and the bearing of testimony in the council chamber of the Sanhedrim. H.

32-35. The Beautiful Picture reproduced, of the Unity, Mutual Sympathy, and Helpfulness of the First Christian Disciples.—We would read verse 33 first, and then 32, 34, 35 together. While all were filled with the Holy Ghost, and spake the word, the apostles, as ordained leaders and witnesses of the resurrection, were specially endued with power to impress the truth, and when necessary to work miracles in confirmation of the word.

But as in all faith was working actively by love, so great grace, the marked favor of God, was upon and with them all. Then, as a token and evidence of this grace, the story of their oneness of spirit, of their true sympathy one with another, evinced by acts of self-sacrifice, by the sharing of their means with those who had any need, is here told again. It is repeated, we infer, partly because it is inherently so beautiful and effective as an example for all coming ages, and partly to introduce the two persons, Josee and Ananias, and to contrast their spirit and actions respecting this practical matter of consecrating possessions. B.

This is a picture of what every Christian Church ought to be, and what every Christian Church will probably be, when the fullness of the Spirit shall be poured out in the last days. Here we meet with no factions or divisions on the part of the people, no jealousy, no party spirit. No desire of distinction disturbed the harmony of the primitive Church.

The first law of their divine Master was fulfilled: mutual and holy love was the sacred bond of their union, the ruling principle of their life and actions. G. T.—They regarded themselves as one family, with one heart and one soul, with common needs and common joys and common sufferings. This is the perfection of that unity in his Church for which Christ prayed, and it showed as in a pattern what all should aim to realize in spirit. W.

The elements of prosperity in a family or church of Christ are these: Christ preached, as God incarnate, crucified, risen and reigning; living in the Church and working through the Holy Ghost; and oneness of heart evinced in prayer and in mutual helpfulness. Where these are found, faith appropriates Christ's person and work, effectually pleads his power and promise, and "works by love." Thereby all essential conditions of life and prosperity are met. B.

33. With the apostles, especially in the Pentecostal period, the resurrection is the palmary proof, the invincible assertion of the truth of Christianity. That Jesus was literally risen was for the apostles a fact resting upon distinct evidence of their senses. Their first effort was to publish this fact, and so to let it do its proper work in the understandings and the consciences of men. When therefore the author of the Acts of the Apostles is describing the missionary action of the earliest Church, he tells us that "with great power gave the apostles witness of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus." H. P. L.—Everywhere they preach a "Christ that died, yea, rather, that is risen again." This event is presented by them not simply as the seal of his teaching, or more generally (to use the poor and shrunken phrase of later times) as the proof of his divine mission, but as itself the cause and the commencement of that eternal life which was consciously the hope of man. T. D. B.—As they looked with the eye of faith upon the interests of eternity, the relations and interests of time dwindled into insignificance, and with fearlessness, with simplicity, and with great power, gave they witness to the central and incontrovertible fact of the resurrection of Christ, and to the freeness and preciousness of the salvation that is in him, and left the event with God. Pursuing this course, Christianity was aggressive and triumphant. M. H.—This is our testimony still—a testimony concerning the risen Christ. This is the very core and kernel of our preaching. Our glad tidings are, "The Lord is risen." It is a risen Lord that we follow. It is to a risen Lord that we are conformed—a risen Prophet—a risen Priest—a risen King! Bonar.

34, 35. With reference to the sale and sharing of their possessions, all that can properly be inferred is that there was a voluntary disposing of a portion only by the rich, and a distribution in accordance with the actual need of the poor. There was no community of goods, no giving up of all he had by any one. Neither example nor precept of such fatuity have we in the Acts or Epistles. But the grand principle is inculcated here most impressively—a principle that should characterize the disciples of Christ and the spirit of church fellowship in all time—that the strong should aid the weak, "especially those who are of the household of faith." The spirit of the Master and of his gospel lays a tax, proportional and voluntary, upon the worldly goods, as well as the personal sympathies and counsels, of more gifted believers in the interest of those less endowed. No other subject is more fully unfolded by Christ and the apostles than this of consecrated earthly possessions, and the teaching has been but imperfectly learned thus far. The summing up we read in the words of the final award, "Inasmuch as ye did it, or did it not, to these!"

It is to be noted that the largeness of the gifts referred to here grew out of the peculiar circumstances of the case. Jewish prejudices would at once cast out the poorer believers from all customary employments, and so leave many entirely destitute. This was the case for many years, as we know from Paul's "gatherings for the poor saints at Jerusalem" in almost every foreign city. And the same circumstances produce like effects in heathen lands to-day.

36, 37. The True Spirit and the True Gift of Barnabas.—Jose, afterward called Barnabas, the first named convert from the priestly tribe of Levi (whose conversion was soon followed by that of "many priests," ch. 6), begins his long and useful career by the willing, glad consecration of a portion, it might have been all, of his possessions. His surname, "Son of Consolation," may have referred in part to this giving of his whole estate in help of the destitute, or to the special magnetism of his sympathy and wisdom of his comforting counsel. And, we remember, Barnabas it was who brought Paul to the apostles, and who was associated with him in his early missionary journey.

1-11. The beautiful picture of church fellowship is now to be sadly marred. The native evil of the heart shows itself even among the little band of Christ's proscribed followers. And, as throughout the Old Testament, the fact is shown, by way of contrast and comparison, in the history. We have had Barnabas with his attractive character and his true-hearted sacrifice. Now we have Ananias and Sapphira (with names only significant of "grace" and "beauty") illustrating falsehood in its most daring and impious form, a counterfeit offering to God himself. And the teaching by comparison goes further. It presents the two Personal Beings, the respective sources and inspirers of truth and falsehood, the Holy Ghost of God, and Satan, the unholy spirit of evil. The Holy Ghost fills the heart of the true disciples; Satan "fills the heart" of these two false professors.

The timing of Satan's appearance, at the outstart of the infant Christian Church upon its witnessing mission, was in exact accordance with his previous methods. As he came to Adam and Eve in the garden; to Cain, the first born man; to Nadab and Abihu at the commencement of Israel's national life, and afterward to Achan in the first establishment of Israel's power in Canaan; and above all, as without effect he came to Christ at the very outset of his personal ministry; so now and here, "when the sons of God came to present themselves before the Lord, Satan came also among them." He would fain use the time of inexperience and feeble faith to detach one and another, and so undermine the power and destroy the life of the Church of Christ.

Concerning this signal judgment of God, let two facts be borne in mind: 1. Many miracles of mercy had already been wrought, and many more were subsequently done during the ministry of the apostles. This is the one only miracle of judgment. So was it even under the Law of Moses as ministered by himself and the prophets. The many miracles were of mercy. Only at long intervals were single tokens of judgment. While in the personal ministry of Christ himself, we find none but miracles of mercy to men. His only direct judgment was against a fruitless, senseless tree. 2. The one manifest purpose of every direct judgment of God, in the Old and New Testament times, was to impart needful knowledge and warning when it was most needed, and so impressively that it would be heeded. Therefore it was in the critical time of inexperience and weakness, the very time when Satan was busiest, that the clear manifestation of God's authority and might were most necessary as a warning to counteract the temptations of Satan. For this reason, the first Sabbath-breaker was stoned (Num. 15 : 36); the first breach of a special commandment after Israel had taken possession of their inheritance, the concealed sacrilegious theft of Achan, was visited with death upon himself and his family; and now, the first impious deception and falsehood, under the guise of piety and worship, in the new-born Church, was thus decisively adjudged and punished. These and other cases of flagrant impiety demanded and received the open and palpable judgments of God, that his people might be warned, and the guilty taught, that he saw sin in the heart and would assuredly punish the sinner. No other means than those direct severe personal visitations could so well have wrought this necessary knowledge and conviction in their minds.

1-6. The Sin, the Judgment, and the Doom of Ananias.—His sin was not the bringing "a certain part of the price," for this he might rightly have done if he had done it avowedly. As Peter said, it was in his own power, subject to any disposition he pleased, after the money was received. But while—for selfish motives of some kind, we know—keeping back part of the money, he professed to have devoted all that he received. And this transaction was a public one, nay, was a part of worship in which all were associated, nay, further still, on his part it was an act of professed devotion to God himself. And he knew it was a lie. He was deliberately mocking God under pretense of worshipping him! Peter knew it too. By extraordinary gift of the Holy Ghost he saw into the very heart of Ananias, knew the whole transaction; and by the impulse of the same Spirit he opens the whole to the assembled body of disciples by these successive burning questions, ending with the terrible affirmation, "Thou hast not lied to men, but unto God."

Without a word Ananias fell to the ground dead. He was not prostrated by the shame of exposure, nor the sharpened sting of an aroused and terrified conscience, overwhelming as their force might be; but the direct fiat of God adjudged him to this instant doom. Not by any word or purpose of Peter, but solely by the act of God was the fiat executed. For this once, in the New Testament Christian history, "sentence against an evil work was executed speedily." And the lesson was heeded. Great fear, fear of God, an intelligent fear of his searching vision and unerring sure judgment, and a dread conviction of the deadliness of sin, "came upon all them that heard these things."

In an orderly manner, and in accordance with the usual custom of burial on the day of death, the younger men then bore the body of Ananias to the place of interment outside the city. During their absence, for three hours, it would seem that the body of disciples remained together. At their return it was that Sapphira, ignorant of what had occurred, and doubtless supposing that the fraud upon which they had agreed had been successfully achieved, came in to the assembly.

7-11. The Falsehood and the Doom of Sapphira.—Peter gave her no time or opportunity to learn what had transpired. Instantly he asks the plain direct question as to the sum received for the land. And as instantly, unhesitatingly, she reaffirms in words the acted falsehood of her now dead husband. To this, her last utterance, Peter responds by stating the aggravation of their guilt, in their deliberate agreement to deceive and defraud the Spirit of God, and then prophetically announces her like fearful doom and burial with her husband. Speechless, also, she falls and dies! By the same hands her body is laid beside her husband. The bodies lie together in the tomb—the spirits together in the realm of eternal doom.

Again the record declares, that great fear came upon all that heard as well as witnessed those things. Deep indeed would be the impression and long the memory of so awful a judgment of the manifest God! And thus was the infant Church taught and warned and guarded in her time of greatest weakness and need against corruption from within, especially against “that leaven of the Pharisees which is hypocrisy,” an evil always greater and more demoralizing than persecution from without!

Some Leading Truths.—While personal influence, even to the working in human hearts, is ascribed to Satan, yet his power is only that of temptation, and is resistible. It is the man that sins, by his own uncontrolled act of yielding to the temptation. Hence the helpful injunction, “Resist the devil, and he will flee.”

Every human heart is under the influence of the Holy Spirit or of Satan, but under compulsion of neither. What the Holy Ghost has aimed to do in the saving of all that have been saved, he still seeks to do in behalf of the lost and imperilled. And what Satan has done to destroy, what he succeeded in accomplishing by his influence with Saul, Abithophel, Judas, and now with Ananias and Sapphira, he seeks now, as earnestly, to do with every one.

In this fearful twofold judgment we have God’s protest and refutation respecting the false tenet or belief, that because he is infinitely merciful and long-suffering, he will clear the guilty and transform hell into heaven. The voice of this judgment is, Be not deceived, God is not mocked; whatsoever a man soweth that shall he reap: In no wise shall enter they who make a lie: For our God is a consuming fire. B.

No matter whether the miracle happens once or every day. It is simply the type of a law inevitable and universal. Whether the outer stroke should ever be repeated or not, it was only the visible sign of a thing that is always going on while the world stands—unrighteousness blasted, lying exposed, the cheating man and the cheating woman, in spite of their skill in concealment, sent down at last to misery. Section 199.

ACTS v. 12-42.

13 AND of the rest durst no man join himself to them: but the people magnified them.
12 And they were all with one accord in Solomon’s porch. And by the hands of the apostles 15 were many signs and wonders wrought among the people; insomuch that they brought forth the sick into the streets, and laid them on beds and couches, that at the least the 16 shadow of Peter passing by might overshadow some of them. There came also a multitude out of the cities round about unto Jerusalem, bringing sick folks, and them which were 14 vexed with unclean spirits: and they were healed every one. And believers were the more added to the Lord, multitudes both of men and women.

17 Then the high priest rose up, and all they that were with him, (which is the sect of the 18 Sadducees,) and were filled with indignation, and laid their hands on the apostles, and 19 put them in the common prison. But the angel of the Lord by night opened the prison
20 doors, and brought them forth, and said, Go, stand and speak in the temple to the people 21 all the words of this life. And when they heard that, they entered into the temple early in the morning, and taught. But the high priest came, and they that were with him, and called the council together, and all the senate of the children of Israel, and sent to the 22 prison to have them brought. But when the officers came, and found them not in the 23 prison, they returned, and told, saying, The prison truly found we shut with all safety, and the keepers standing without before the doors: but when we had opened, we found no man 24 within. Now when the high priest and the captain of the temple and the chief priests 25 heard these things, they doubted of them whereunto this would grow. Then came one and told them, saying, Behold, the men whom ye put in prison are standing in the temple, and 26 teaching the people. Then went the captain with the officers, and brought them without 27 violence: for they feared the people, lest they should have been stoned. And when they 28 had brought them, they set them before the council: and the high priest asked them, saying, Did not we straitly command you that ye should not teach in this name? and, behold, ye have filled Jerusalem with your doctrine, and intend to bring this man’s blood upon us.

29 Then Peter and the other apostles answered and said, We ought to obey God rather than 30 men. The God of our fathers raised up Jesus, whom ye slew and hanged on a tree. Him 31 hath God exalted with his right hand to be a Prince and a Saviour, for to give repentance to 32 Israel, and forgiveness of sins. And we are his witnesses of these things; and so is also the Holy Ghost, whom God hath given to them that obey him.

33 When they heard that, they were cut to the heart, and took counsel to slay them. Then 34 stood there up one in the council, a Pharisee, named Gamaliel, a doctor of the law, had in reputation among all the people, and commanded to put the apostles forth a little space; 35 and said unto them, Ye men of Israel, take heed to yourselves what ye intend to do as 36 touching these men. For before these days rose up Theudas, boasting himself to be somebody; to whom a number of men, about four hundred, joined themselves: who was slain; 37 and all, as many as obeyed him, were scattered, and brought to nought. After this man rose up Judas of Galilee in the days of the taxing, and drew away much people after him:
 38 he also perished; and all, even as many as obeyed him, were dispersed. And now I say un-39 to you, Refrain from these men, and let them alone: for if this counsel or this work be of 40 men, it will come to nought: but if it be of God, ye cannot overthrow it; lest haply ye be found even to fight against God. And to him they agreed: and when they had called the apostles, and beaten them, they commanded that they should not speak in the name of Jesus, and let them go.

41 And they departed from the presence of the council, rejoicing that they were counted 42 worthy to suffer shame for his name. And daily in the temple, and in every house, they ceased not to teach and preach Jesus Christ.

"THEY ceased not to teach and preach Jesus the Christ." Similar expressions continually recur in the Acts. No such announcements are heard in the Gospels. The preaching spoken of there is not of the person, but of the kingdom. In the Acts the two expressions are sometimes united, as when the Samaritans "believed Philip, preaching the things concerning the kingdom of God and the name of the Lord Jesus": and yet again, with more evident purpose, in the closing verse of the book, which describes the two years' continuous ministry by the words "preaching the kingdom of God, and teaching those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ." The two expressions are combined to show that the preaching of the kingdom and the preaching of Christ are one. All is founded upon the old Jewish expectation of a kingdom of God; but it is now explained how that expectation is fulfilled in the person of Jesus; and the account of its realization consists in the unfolding of the truth concerning him, "the things concerning Jesus." The manifestation of Christ being finished, the kingdom is already begun. Those who receive him enter into it. Having overcome the sharpness of death, he has opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers. Those, therefore, who were once to "tell no man that he was Christ," are now to make "all the house of Israel know assuredly that God hath made that same Jesus, whom they had crucified, both Lord and Christ"; yea, they are to proclaim that fact to every nation under heaven. Through the blessed ordinance of a written word they have not ceased to do so now. To us they preach him still; a Christ "who died for our sins and rose again for our justification"; a Christ who saves without the Law, yet one who is witnessed by the Law and the Prophets. So they preach, and so we believe. This was the beginning of the confidence and the rejoicing of the hope to the Church at its birth, and this beginning it will hold firm unto the end. It is for us to see that we bear our part in the long history of the faith, finding its reality in the joy of our own salvation, and transmitting its testimony to the generation to come. T. D. B.

12-16. Effects wrought among the People by the Apostles' Preaching and Healing in the Name of Jesus.—These verses cover a considerable period of undisturbed ministry. The most appropriate order would probably be this: verse 13; the last sentence in verse 12; the first sentence in the same verse, attached to verses 15 and 16; and verse 14. Read thus, without any parenthesis, the meaning is clear and the narrative orderly and progressive.

The rest, the multitude without, had been so impressed by the miraculous judgment upon Ananias that they stood in awe of the apostles as divine messengers, and none ventured to join the company of believers unless drawn by a true faith and honest confession. Nevertheless they "magnified," in their hearts honored, the character and work of the apostles. They had learned at least the difference between false pretense and true service.

Solomon's porch was now the daily meeting and preaching place of the apostles. No other place was large enough for the concourse of believers and people. (Vol. I., p. 620.)

The account given in verses 15 and 16 recalls similar statements respecting great periods and wide circuits of Christ's ministry in Galilee. Everywhere from within Jerusalem itself, and from the numerous cities adjacent, the sick and the possessed with unclean spirits were brought by multitudes to the apostles. And the result is told in the old language of the gospels, "they were healed every one." Not, we suppose, that any one was healed by the lengthened shadow of Peter's person, as he returned toward sunset from the crowded evening service in Solomon's porch. Yet we know that the sick were afterward healed by the touch of aprons and handkerchiefs that had been in contact with the person of Paul; and we remember how one was healed by the touch of a garment-hem. There may have been such faith, as these cases showed, in the placing of the sick within the line of the apostle's shadow, and if there was, God may have healed in like condescension to human ignorance and infirmity. But the text does not furnish any inference that there was such faith, or that healing was wrought by this means. The fact is stated to show the extent and pervasive character of the influence which had already gone forth from these few illiterate fishermen, within the city and outside of it.

The "many signs and wonders" now "wrought among the people" were in answer to the first prayer of the Church. They were designed to honor the apostles in the sight, and so with the favor, of the people; that the people might interpose, as they did, to protect them against the assaults of the rulers. But, chiefly, their miracles of healing were wrought, like their Master's, to show how much God's mercy delighted to rejoice against his judgment, how much more willing were his helpful, gracious, loving purposes and acts, than his enforced strange deeds of judgment. And all these ends of miracle, we read, were accomplished.

14. Believers were the more added. This is the natural close to this whole statement. Even the terrible judgment combined with the multitude of healing mercies, in connection with the preaching of Jesus, produced far more faith than fear. Of the vast numbers who had been outwardly convinced by miraculous demonstration, many were inwardly touched by the truth concerning Jesus impressed by the present mighty Spirit of God. Multitudes both of men and women were added to the Lord!—to Christ, not to the roll of the Church. Here, as before, the LORD, i. e., CHRIST, added to the Church the saved! but first—then, now, and ever—added to the Lord! as branches to the vine, by the principle and through the divine implanting of a spiritual life: living branches, and fruitful if living, in the living vine—these only are "the saved," these only make up the roll of the true Church, visible or invisible! B.

17-19. The apostles are brought forward to preach before the Sanhedrim the doctrine of the resurrection, by the agency of the Sadducees who denied it. The Sadducees imprison the apostles; but the angel of the Lord opens the prison doors. Thus Christ overrules the designs of the Sadducees, who denied the existence of angels, and makes the Sadducees themselves to be the means of showing to the world that his angels are ministering spirits, encamping about his Church. W.—As their hate increased, their malignity gave them increased courage to seize and imprison the apostles. While these imprisoned men are filled with the Holy Ghost, and leave all things quietly with God, their persecutors—into whose hearts we are continually permitted to see—are filled with Satan, and undertake themselves to carry out the devices he has inspired.

But! This is a divine "but," which deranges all their plans. The excess, or "remainder," of men's wrath over what may be needful in the execution of his plans, God easily restrains, and generally by his usual methods of providence. Here, for the same purpose that he wrought by miracle, he sends an angel to release his first "ambassadors" to the world. Silently, and unnoticed by the slumbering guard, the prison doors are opened, and the rescued, newly animated disciples are bidden to resume their work for the Master. Go, as heralds go, not seeking safety in concealment, but before the face of the people. Utter the message of life—all of it—faithfully to all the people! It was a reaffirmation of the commission from their risen Lord, uttered under circumstances of implied approval, encouragement, and yet larger promise. And there was no hesitation or wavering in their response. Early in the morning, soon as the temple gates were opened, they gathered in Solomon's porch and taught the thronging crowds. B.—The Lord sent his angel and set his servants free. He showed the persecutors that they had no power over these men, "except it were given them from above." But having done this, the Master left the witnesses in their enemies' hands. His will was, that his servants should neither flee nor fight; that they should preach the Cross, and bear it; that they should overcome as he had overcome—by enduring. Arnot.

21-26. Then came the specially called meeting of the great Sanhedrim, showing how exasperated the priestly party were and how determined now utterly to destroy these teachers of Christ. "All the senate," i. e., all the elders of the nation, were called in to give counsel and add weight to the judgment of the Sanhedrim. The officers were sent to the prison, and excitedly returned with the wonderful story of an empty ward and carefully guarded doors and building. The meaning was, that there was full proof of divine interposition in the escape. And while the assembly were amazed and wondering what would come out of these marvels, one came with the intelligence that the men who had mysteriously disappeared out of their prison were boldly preaching again in the temple. At the instance of the high priest, the captain of the temple—the custodian of the sacred house—then went with his own band and quietly summoned the apostles into the presence of the assembled council. The obedient response of the apostles prevented any outbreak among the people.

The strongly favorable feeling of the people in behalf of these persecuted disciples is the instructive and cheering fact of this portion of the narrative. Many causes combined—all of them noble and grand—to produce this feeling. These lowly but bold disciples had dared to come right from the prison to the sanctuary and stronghold of their own and their Master's persecutors, instead of fleeing from them. They spake with like boldness as they acted; repeating in calm and serious words the offensive doctrines. Here were evidences of their own truthfulness, of their belief in the word they preached, and of a wonderful strength of personal trust in the Christ they proclaimed and urged upon others. And their forbearance equaled their courage and truth. Though their release showed that superhuman power was theirs, yet they did not seek to employ it in opposition to the high priest and elders. Not to resist the rulers, not to smite with judgment-might the men who had accumulated a vaster amount of even more aggravated guilt than the false Ananias, but to heal the sick and suffering they used the might of miracle.

And perhaps the "signs" most wonderful and powerful with the people were the signs of their Christlike spirit—their utterly unselfish lives and ministry—the avowed purpose of their preaching as well as the manifest ultimate object of their miracles, to save the lost soul! In palpable contrast to these "signs and wonders" of Christlike spirit and living, had been life-long presented before their eyes the selfish greed and rapacity, the open hypocrisy, and especially the utter lack of sympathy or care for others, which characterized the priests and rulers of that day above any other time even in Jewish history. Multitudes, therefore, of the common people heard these true-hearted apostles, also, gladly! They heard the words and read the life, and the Holy Ghost impressed his own truth in both forms, and wrought miracles of deliverance for multitudes of penitent, believing souls, more wondrous far than the angel's release of the imprisoned bodies of the apostles!

27, 28. If we needed proof of the superior intelligence and shrewdness of these foremost priests and rulers, we have it in their discriminating appreciation of the preaching and doctrine concerning Jesus as the source of the apostles' power, and of their own consequent danger. These men of the Sanhedrim cared nothing for mere miracles. They did not want to know, they wished not to know, how the apostles escaped from the prison; and passed that matter over in silence. But when the known companions of Jesus preach a spiritual religion, and declare a salvation of grace, when their preaching is attested not only by numerous and stupendous miracles, but by an unselfish, true, pure, and helpful life, when the religion they preach and practice stands forth in striking contrast with the teaching and life of authoritative Jewish teachers, and when, for all these reasons, multitudes from city and country are drawn to seek healing and find repentance in the name of Christ, no wonder these false hypocritical leaders take alarm, and seek to silence and destroy the apostles.

But the charge they make of a design "to bring this man's blood" (purposefully throwing contempt upon the name that the apostles had exalted) "upon them" is surprising, when we remember that these very rulers had led in that answering cry to Pilate, "His blood be on us and on our children." But they had an object in saying this now; they wished to create an impression among the people that the apostles were actuated by revengeful and hostile feelings in making the charge. B.

29-32. Critics have noticed the structure of Peter's brief defense as one of the finest specimens of pleading on record. It is a proof that the promise, "It shall be given you in that hour what ye shall speak," was amply fulfilled. It is clear and cogent; it is very short, but it is long enough. The speaker says all that is needful, and stops when he is done. In this short space he defends himself, confounds his adversaries, and commends Christ to the bystanders. Arnot.

Taking no notice of their attempt to create odium against himself and his companions, with manly boldness he repeats the main points of his previous address. Again he reverses the position of the parties, becomes himself the accuser of his judges, and preaches the gospel plainly to them. So did Stephen afterward, before that very same tribunal.

29. First, he declares directly, not as before in the way of appeal to their judgment, that God must be obeyed rather than men. In saying this, he boldly implies that they are commanding things contrary to God; and he justifies the disregard of their injunction solely on the ground of obedience to the higher authority of God himself. He does not deny the allegiance properly due to these rulers as the highest human authority in the nation. He claims and attempts no right of open opposition or organized resistance. But he must speak the word, and so obey the supreme command of God. B.

How much the world owes to the word that Peter uttered before the Sanhedrim that day! It is the foundation of all the true liberty that exists in the world. On this rock—the word that the Holy Spirit spake by Peter's lips—has the liberty of the Church been built, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. Leaning on this, human liberty has been able to maintain a footing on the world during the dark centuries that are past; and that liberty, wherewith the Son has made his people free, is waxing apace, as the dawn advances into day. Freedom of conscience—the subjection of a human spirit to God, and its emancipation therefore from all inferior control—is deposited here in the ground as a living seed. Thence it has sprung and spread; thence it will spring and spread until all superstition and tyranny shall be swept away. Arnot.

30. Next Peter reasserts the offensive doctrine of the resurrection of Jesus, carefully naming him whom they would not name. Still speaking as himself a Jew and to them as Jews, he declares that their God had "raised up Jesus," and unqualifiedly to their faces reaffirms the charge that they had slain him by crucifixion. It was true that Christ's blood was upon them. No words could be more direct or pointed; yet he instantly follows them with other words of promise and hope.

31. The same God, their God, had exalted this Jesus, who is already a Prince and Saviour—names well known to them as applied by Isaiah to the Messiah—by him to give repentance and forgiveness to Israel! The statement was very plain and the meaning very clear to them. All the facts of Christ's life—his character, his wondrous deeds and yet more wonderful words, his death and rising again—all accorded perfectly with the known and accepted teaching of their prophets. Even the outpouring of the Holy Spirit was distinctly promised. In all this Peter was speaking no enigmas to them.

32. In further asserting that the apostles are witnesses of all those things respecting Christ, Peter still refers them back to Isaiah (43 : 10, 12, and 44 : 6, 8), where the Lord the Saviour, Israel's King and Deliverer, utters these very words. Repeated by this Lord himself, after his resurrection, in the ears of the disciples, Peter now triumphantly responds to them, and affirms that they are his witnesses! And then, in support of their merely human testimony, and in conclusive proof of all these things respecting Christ, he refers to a divine witness, the long-promised and now received Spirit of God. This witness, the Holy Ghost, with his internal convincing testimony, he declares to these heartless, disobedient priests of the Temple, God will give to them that obey him.

Thus calmly, without sign of personal feeling, save earnest, faithful kindness, in the very spirit of the Master, this brave apostle preached to the Sanhedrim the whole doctrine of Christ and the Holy Ghost; to them he offers salvation by repentance toward God and faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, through the inworking of the Holy Spirit.

33-40. The Counsel of Gamaliel, and the Final Judgment of the Sanhedrim.—The same excessive madness of rage and hate that filled them against the Master was now excited toward the disciples. Under the first impulse, they would have done with these what they had done with him. But at this crisis God interposed for his people's sake, and raised up a helper in the person of the most influential and least moved of their number.

Gamaliel, here referred to as one of the council or Sanhedrim, a Pharisee, a teacher of the law, and of high repute among the people, is said by the Talmud to have been the grandson of Hillel, the founder of the then leading Rabbinical school. They say further that he was the second and last who "obtained the name of Rabban, a title of the highest eminence and note of any among their doctors." Apparently he is the only one unmoved, and therefore apprehends the peril of murdering the apostles, and certainly, though unconsciously, he is actuated by a divine impulse in his interposition. But he shows masterly skill and judgment in reaching his object. He removes these hated men out of sight, and so takes away one stimulus and supply of their excited feeling. He tells his colleagues of their peril in undertaking this murderous scheme. He recalls two well-known instances, of many similar ones in the history of the time, where insurgent leaders had taken advantage of strong Jewish expectation and feeling, and undertaken the overthrow of the Roman dominion, but had been themselves slain and their bands dispersed. With the designed intimation that such would be the issue with the movement begun by the apostles, he counsels that these men be let alone. And then he enforces all by stating a fact and using it as a basis for a principle—the fact that man's plan or work can not stand as against God's; and the principle that one should wait for the actual issue to determine whether a work is God's or man's.

From this method and reasoning of Gamaliel we may take this one bare grain of wisdom out of a full measure of folly and mistake. It is wise and right to deal tolerantly with errorists in sentiment; and intolerance with supposed error is always unjustifiable and wrong. In conclusive proof of this, we have Christ's spirit, his words, and his acts. But Gamaliel's principle, his main argument with his fellow-councillors, is essentially and most hurtfully wrong. It is conspicuously untrue, as applied to present results, in time, that all which fails to succeed is not of God. For many true churches of God in every age, and other beneficent Christian institutions, have been suffered to languish and become extinct. And we need not speak of unnumbered personal sacrifices of possessions and life for Christ and the truth. Only as applied to ultimate and eternal issues is it true that failure is God's condemnation. And as obviously, for similar reasons, it is untrue that seeming success and continuance in this life is certainly of God. David's teaching, as well as that of David's Lord, is clear and abundant upon this point. Nothing short of or prior to the final plaudit at the judgment is decisive of God's purpose and part in any life success.

Further, Gamaliel's counsel is fatally defective in this, that not only as responsible men, but especially as accredited teachers of a divine religion, as the ministers of a divinely ordained worship, they were bound to ascertain if these men were not really on God's side, and if they were, to side with them. They had God's "counsel" in their Scriptures, and could compare it with the words and works of "these men." Nay more, as we have seen, Peter had expressly referred them to these Scriptures throughout. And all the facts of Christ's career and of the Pentecost, to which he had also referred them, were open to their knowledge, and abundant for their conviction of the truth. For these reasons their obligation was to inquire and to act according to their best knowledge, not to ignore the matter as of no concern to them.

Perhaps they appreciated the counsel. Perhaps they did not feel quite strong enough to kill so many men in face of the protest of a friendly people. But they did not entirely "refrain"; for they severely scourged the apostles before they let them go. This scourging gave trifling relief to their wrath as well as their offended dignity; it served to show the people that they had not made so much stir without cause; and it would operate as a warning, if not to the apostles, to deter persons of feeble will and timid spirit from joining them.

Apostles.—Thus far they had encountered threats, imprisonment, and scourging, but none of these things moved them except to joyfulness, that thus the force of their testimony might be strengthened. It is a beautiful expression, evincing a depth of humility and strength of devotion that is marvelous in such weak men as they had been: "rejoicing that they were counted worthy to suffer shame for his name." The lesson of the Passion and the Cross, from which they had shrunk, was now fully learned!

Released once more, they went again "to their own company" and to their appointed work of preaching Jesus Christ. This they did daily, in the Temple at the hours of concourse for worship, and in every house where they were welcomed. Christ had delivered them, in order that they might continue in the fulfillment of his commission. And for a considerable period again they had rest, while believers continued to multiply under faithful teaching, with the power of the Holy Ghost.

CHRIST is Prince and Saviour. He rules in all whom he saves, and saves all in whom he rules. Christ rules among his enemies and protects his friends. His Church will abide against "the gates of hell," and his kingdom shall come. "The extension of this kingdom depends on the counsel of God and the work of man." Let us loyally look for the counsel and the needed grace, and faithfully do the work assigned! B.

The Christian, if at least he is a genuine believer, can not constantly remain silent concerning Christ! The same thing which we see here in the apostles, the experience of every really living Christian confirms. To speak of the Lord may often be difficult; to be continually silent regarding him is impossible. Our privilege is too great for us to be silent; our vocation is too exalted for us to leave the testimony regarding Christ to others, since we are personally destined each in his own circle to be the light and the salt of the earth. Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh; out of the animated word the life speaketh; and life alone is able to awaken life. Van O.

ACTS vi. 1-15.

- 1 AND in those days, when the number of the disciples was multiplied, there arose a murmuring of the Grecians against the Hebrews, because their widows were neglected in the 2 daily ministrations. Then the twelve called the multitude of the disciples unto them, and
3 said, It is not reason that we should leave the word of God, and serve tables. Wherefore, brethren, look ye out among you seven men of honest report, full of the Holy Ghost and

4 wisdom, whom we may appoint over this business. But we will give ourselves continually 5 to prayer, and to the ministry of the word. And the saying pleased the whole multitude:
 and they chose Stephen, a man full of faith and of the Holy Ghost, and Philip, and Pro-6 chorus, and Nicanor, and Timon, and Parmenas, and Nicolas, a proselyte of Antioch: whom they set before the apostles: and when they had prayed, they laid their hands on them.
 7 And the word of God increased; and the number of the disciples multiplied in Jerusalem 8 greatly; and a great company of the priests were obedient to the faith. And Stephen, full of faith and power, did great wonders and miracles among the people.
 9 Then there arose certain of the synagogue, which is called the synagogue of the Liber-tines, and Cyrenians, and Alexandrians, and of them of Cilicia and of Asia, disputing with 10 Stephen. And they were not able to resist the wisdom and the spirit by which he spake.
 11 Then they suborned men, which said, We have heard him speak blasphemous words against 12 Moses, and against God. And they stirred up the people, and the elders, and the scribes, 13 and came upon him, and caught him, and brought him to the council, and set up false witnesses, which said, This man ceaseth not to speak blasphemous words against this holy 14 place, and the law: for we have heard him say, that this Jesus of Nazareth shall destroy 15 this place, and shall change the customs which Moses delivered us. And all that sat in the council, looking steadfastly on him, saw his face as it had been the face of an angel.

THE transfiguration of Stephen is always a thing of the present, filled with a fresh life which touches our deepest nature whenever we look on it. Material scenes of the highest grandeur live only in the pages of history; and they become dimmer as distance intervenes. But spiritual greatness is everlastingly new, and we can be as closely in its presence as when it first appeared in the world. As time tests it and brings out its reality, we see and feel more of its ever-during power. Of this kind are all the moral evidences of the truth of the gospel, all the signs of the higher life which then entered the world, which never become old with years, but renew themselves in us as we open our souls to them. To this the form of Stephen belongs; not the angelic face alone, but the angelic spirit of which it was the index, a thing which never appeared in the world till Christ was heard of, and which true Christianity alone can reproduce. The canvas of that picture never decays, the dust of time does not gather on the features. It is no picture, for we may come and feel the life in it while we look, and share it as we gaze on the great object of his view. So true is it that we are come even now "to spirits of just men made perfect, and to Jesus, the mediator of the New Covenant." Ker.

The things within affect the outward appearance, and find there perpetual expression. Facial brightness, if you have it—and you may have it with any kind of features—what is it but an overflowing from the light of God within? Calmness on the countenance is index to peace in the soul. Benignity appearing in the features is the flushing out of indwelling love. Keep soul-brightness, and the smile will some way ripple through. Keep soul-peace, and fear or misery will not settle on your face. Steel your heart with heroic purpose, and you will never go with bloodless lips and coward eye. Love God with heart and soul and strength and mind, and your neighbor as yourself, and you will never need to think of putting up a face-advertisement of what will be found within. The poor will bless you, and the fallen will look up in your face, as they looked in the face of Christ, and see pity and help written there. Be a Christian man through and through, in belief and practice, among fellow-disciples, among worldly people, and the Lord your God will put his "beauty" on you, in one or other of its many forms; and in some supreme moments of life, in suffering, in trial, in death, may give your friends beholding you the privilege and joy of looking as it were upon the face of an angel. A. R.

1. Hebrews. The Jews of Palestine and Syria, with those who lived on the Tigris and Euphrates, interpreted the Scriptures through the Chaldee paraphrases, and spoke kindred dialects of the language of Aram: and hence they were called Aramaean Jews. Grecians. Of the other part of the nation dispersed through those countries where Greek was spoken, Alexandria was the capi- tal. They used the Septuagint translation of the Bible; and they were commonly called Hellenists, or Jews of the Grecian speech. The mere difference of language would account in some degree for the mutual dislike with which we know that these two sections of the Jewish race regarded one another. We can not be surprised that, even in the deep peace and charity of the Church's earliest days, this inveterate division reappeared, and that the old jealousy between the Aramaic and Hellenistic Jews reappeared. A murmuring of the Grecians against the Hebrews, or of the Hebrews against the Grecians, had been a common occurrence for at least two centuries; and, notwithstanding the power of the divine Spirit, none will wonder that it broke out again even among those who had become obedient to the doctrine of Christ. H.

Differences of feeling found expression in connection with the ministration to the poorer disciples. The complaint made by the foreign Jews that the widows of their number were neglected was probably just. But there is no implication of ill feeling or intentional injustice on the part of the native Jews who had charge of the daily ministration. These persons could not know the circumstances of the foreign widows, and the latter would not, naturally, press the statement upon them. 2-4. The apostles took prompt measures to remove the trouble. Their plan was to put definite responsibility for this special work upon men of conscience, heart, and eminent godliness. A division of labor was demanded at this point, and a new office grew out of this necessity, as every true office only can grow, or afterward subsist. We note, in passing, an indication here of the advance of the New Testament Church or dispensation over the Old. In the New, measures of administration are planned and set in operation as called for by actual occasion. In the Old, divine laws and ordinances are devised and published in anticipation of both ignorance and need. B.—The apostolic institution of the office of deacon seemed to grow naturally out of a providential occasion. That occasion illustrated what was likely to be a common and permanent want of the Church, a want clearly foreseen, no doubt, by those inspired men. It was simply the need of a systematic arrangement for distributing the Church's alms among her needy members equitably and satisfactorily. The apostles intended to secure such provision for needy Christians, in such a way as to relieve themselves of attention to it. They were called to the deaconry of the word, and would remit the deaconry of tables to other hands. These phrases illustrate the greater expressiveness of the original, in which one term is applied to both kinds of ministration. Nelson.

The method of accomplishing their plan also accorded with the simplicity of the Christian system, and with the principle of equal personal right everywhere embodied in the gospel. The body of the members were bidden to make the choice of men for the new office, men of good reputation as well as good character, actually held in esteem as wise and true men, indicated as such by the manifest Spirit of God in their words and life; and, further, qualified by sound practical judgment. In a word, they were to select seven godly men for their aptness in administering these temporal affairs, and for their heart and skill in blending spiritual counsel with help. They were to choose, the apostles to put in place; how, we shall see.

For themselves, the apostles, as ambassadors of Christ, concentrate all the purposes of their self-consecration in these two: prayer, and preaching of the Word. It is the ministry of the Word that God employs to save and sanctify. But it is through prayer, through the actual dependence of the man of God upon God in his actual preparation and utterance of the Word, it is through such an unceasing spirit of trusting request, that the minister of the Word receives the guidance and help which are vital to success in his ministering.

5-7. The Seven chosen and ordained. Still Greater Expansion of the Church.—Of five of these seven men we know nothing save this record. The names are all Greek. Some, a majority certainly, were "Grecian" or Hellenist Jews; so that they knew and could help the foreign widows. But some, we infer, were native Jews, since Greek names were also common among these. The "appointing" by the apostles was, in its accompanying worship and in its outward form, simple and significant. There was a recognition of God in the call and appointment, and a resting upon his communicated grace and benediction to make the proposed service effectual; this was the meaning and design of the prayer. And there was a formal indication of setting apart to office in the name and by the authority of Christ; this was the meaning and design of the laying on of hands. And this is New Testament ordination.

Perfect harmony was now restored, and, as before, the power of the Spirit and the Word was more widely exerted. As ever it had been, an earnest, harmonious, praying, and working Church, with a fervent active ministry, rejoiced in a great development of spiritual life, and in a large increase of disciples. And, as a signal proof of divine converting grace, many priests were obedient to the faith; men whose prejudices against the Christian doctrine were most intense, and who forfeited their birthright position and living upon the avowal of their belief in Christ. This was the culminating point of popularity and power with the primitive Church at Jerusalem. The Sadducees of the Sanhedrim had suspended their open persecution—the priesthood and the people were being gradually brought to respect the apostles' influence and to heed their teachings.

But, in God's purpose, through men's evil design, there came an assault from the old enemies of Christ, the Pharisees, who since his apprehension had withdrawn from the leadership of the opposition. The Sadducees had been compelled to cease their persecution, because the Pharisees had really sided with the apostles in the question at issue—the fact of a resurrection. But the old Pharisaic spirit began to be stirred by the plain preaching of the disciples; and, mainly through the bold fidelity of Stephen, speaking as his Master had done, a bitter intolerance and hatred grew up afresh among the Pharisees. And again, we shall see, the predominant influence of this sect with the people was successfully exerted to bring about the killing of the first martyr to Christ and his Cross.

8-10. Stephen maintains the Faith of Christ against opposing Pharisees.—Brief but beautiful is the story of Stephen; beautiful because so eminently Christlike in temper, in self-forgetting fidelity to truth and to God, in clear reasoning upon the Old Testament Scriptures, in boldness of warning and directness of accusation, and in the final issue of trial before the same tribunal. Rapidly maturing under the tuition of the Holy Ghost, first, the outward gifts of miracle-working are added to his qualifications as servitor to the poorer saints, to keep pace with the expanding inward forces of faith and love; then, without formal indication of transfer, the Holy Ghost advanced him to the higher office of ministering the Word, as afterward Philip was similarly advanced. The fullness of the power of the Holy Ghost is shown in his discriminating and thorough exposition of the Christian doctrines of grace, in comparison with the Old Testament teachings, and in sharp contrast with gross and destructive Pharisaic errors. In his discussions, referred to here, with the men of the synagogues, as in his subsequent defence before the Sanhedrim, he lays down in outline and substance the doctrinal scheme afterward so sublimely expanded and applied by Paul.

As a Hellenist or foreign Jew, Stephen was admitted to the synagogues mentioned in verse 9, of one of which he was probably a member. Of the synagogues in Jerusalem, some were established by the foreign Jews for their own use and for that of their sons, sent thither to complete their education at the schools and colleges which in most instances were attached to the synagogues. With the young men of these schools as well as the older members of the synagogues Stephen was thus brought into contact. And it was his decisive and irresistible preaching of Christ crucified and risen that awakened such intense hostility on the part of both older and younger adherents of the Pharisaic doctrines, and led to their determined and organized persecution against him. To one of these synagogues, that of the Cilician Jews, the young Saul of Tarsus then belonged; and the inference is strong, that he was a listener at least to these unrecorded words of Stephen, as he almost certainly must have been to the martyr's noble defence before the Sanhedrim.

11-15. The Arrest, Arraignment, and Charge against Stephen.—Failing to find accusing testimony in his words or acts, as they had done with his Master, these malignant Pharisees sought false witness against him. By circulating the old charge of blasphemy against Moses and against God, they wakened afresh the hostile feeling of the bigoted people, who instantly joined the elders and scribes (the Pharisaic party) in seizing Stephen and hurrying him tumultuously before the Sanhedrim. B.

It is evident, from the vivid expression which is quoted from the accusers' mouths—"this place," "this holy place"—that the meeting of the Sanhedrim took place in the close neighborhood of the Temple. Their ancient and solemn room of assembly was the hall Gazith, or the "Stone-Chamber," partly within the Temple court and partly without it. The president sat in the less sacred portion, and around him, in a semicircle, were the rest of the seventy judges. H. (Vol. I., p. 623.)

There the charge is repeated and amplified by particulars which serve to unite all classes, Pharisees and Sadducees, rulers and people, in the common purpose of destroying the disciples as they had destroyed the Master. Perverting Stephen's language respecting Christ, as before they had perverted Christ's words respecting the Temple, they charge him with speaking against their holy Temple and Law, and with some truth they add, predicting the overthrow of their national customs and worship by "this Jesus of Nazareth." Thus, in the person of Stephen, the issue is joined for the first time but finally between the people, hitherto favorable and friendly to the apostles, and the infant Church or company of believers in Jesus. From thenceforth the great commission takes on its broader terms, and those who bear it know that they who have begun its execution in Jerusalem must go forth into neighboring and distant regions.

But for the central object of this malignant throng, the arraigned disciple before the already prejudging, condemning tribunal, for him who stands in the Master's place, environed by all the Master's peril, surely destined to the Master's doom, stands he as the Master stood, calm, unflinching, with the Master's promised peace in the heart and manifest upon the countenance? The record answers: They saw his face as it had been the face of an angel! He stood before them seemingly transfigured with a reflected glory, with the brightness of a seeming preternatural light. And yet, was it other light or halo than came from the inner soul of an already triumphant faith and hope in the near prospect of that fulfilled Christ-longing prayer, breathed forth at the moment of his heavenward flight? B.

Acts vii. 1-53.

1 THEN said the high priest, Are these things so? And he said, Men, brethren, and fathers,
 2 hearken; The God of glory appeared unto our father Abraham, when he was in Mesopo-
 3 tamia, before he dwelt in Charran, and said unto him, Get thee out of thy country, and 4 from thy kindred, and come into the land which I shall shew thee. Then came he out of the land of the Chaldæans, and dwelt in Charran: and from thence, when his father was 5 dead, he removed him into this land, wherein ye now dwell. And he gave him none inheritance in it, no, not so much as to set his foot on: yet he promised that he would give 6 it to him for a possession, and to his seed after him, when as yet he had no child. And God spake on this wise, That his seed should sojourn in a strange land; and that they 7 should bring them into bondage, and entreat them evil four hundred years. And the nation to whom they shall be in bondage will I judge, said God: and after that shall they come 8 forth, and serve me in this place. And he gave him the covenant of circumcision: and so Abraham begat Isaac, and circumcised him the eighth day; and Isaac begat Jacob; and 9 Jacob begat the twelve patriarchs. And the patriarchs, moved with envy, sold Joseph into 10 Egypt: but God was with him, and delivered him out of all his afflictions, and gave him favour and wisdom in the sight of Pharaoh king of Egypt; and he made him governor over Egypt and all his house.

11 Now there came a dearth over all the land of Egypt and Chanaan, and great affliction:
 12 and our fathers found no sustenance. But when Jacob heard that there was corn in 13 Egypt, he sent out our fathers first. And at the second time Joseph was made known to 14 his brethren; and Joseph's kindred was made known unto Pharaoh. Then sent Joseph, 15 and called his father Jacob to him, and all his kindred, threescore and fifteen souls. So 16 Jacob went down into Egypt, and died, he, and our fathers, and were carried over into Sychem, and laid in the sepulchre that Abraham bought for a sum of money of the sons of 17 Emmor the father of Sychem. But when the time of the promise drew nigh, which God
 18 had sworn to Abraham, the people grew and multiplied in Egypt, till another king arose, 19 which knew not Joseph. The same dealt subtilly with our kindred, and evil entreated 20 our fathers, so that they cast out their young children, to the end they might not live. In which time Moses was born, and was exceeding fair, and nourished up in his father's house 21 three months: and when he was cast out, Pharaoh's daughter took him up, and nourished him for her own son.

22 And Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, and was mighty in words 23 and in deeds. And when he was full forty years old, it came into his heart to visit his 24 brethren the children of Israel. And seeing one of them suffer wrong, he defended him, 25 and avenged him that was oppressed, and smote the Egyptian: for he supposed his brethren would have understood how that God by his hand would deliver them: but they under-26 stood not. And the next day he shewed himself unto them as they strove, and would have set them at one again, saying, Sirs, ye are brethren; why do ye wrong one to another?
 27 But he that did his neighbour wrong thrust him away, saying, Who made thee a ruler and a 28 judge over us? Wilt thou kill me, as thou didst the Egyptian yesterday? Then fled Moses 29 at this saying, and was a stranger in the land of Madian, where he begat two sons. And 30 when forty years were expired, there appeared to him in the wilderness of mount Sina an 31 angel of the Lord in a flame of fire in a bush. When Moses saw it, he wondered at the 32 sight: and as he drew near to behold it, the voice of the Lord came unto him, saying, I am the God of thy fathers, the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob.
 33 Then Moses trembled, and durst not behold. Then said the Lord to him, Put off thy 34 shoes from thy feet: for the place where thou standest is holy ground. I have seen, I have seen the affliction of my people which is in Egypt, and I have heard their groaning, and 35 am come down to deliver them. And now come, I will send thee into Egypt. This Moses whom they refused, saying, Who made thee a ruler and a judge? the same did God send to 36 be a ruler and a deliverer by the hand of the angel which appeared to him in the bush. He brought them out, after that he had shewed wonders and signs in the land of Egypt, and in the Red sea, and in the wilderness forty years.

37 This is that Moses, which said unto the children of Israel, A Prophet shall the Lord your 38 God raise up unto you of your brethren, like unto me; him shall ye hear. This is he, that was in the church in the wilderness with the angel which spake to him in the mount Sina, 39 and with our fathers: who received the lively oracles to give unto us: to whom our fathers would not obey, but thrust him from them, and in their hearts turned back again into 40 Egypt, saying unto Aaron, Make us gods to go before us: for as for this Moses, which 41 brought us out of the land of Egypt, we wot not what is become of him. And they made a calf in those days, and offered sacrifice unto the idol, and rejoiced in the works of their 42 own hands. Then God turned, and gave them up to worship the host of heaven; as it is written in the book of the prophets, O ye house of Israel, have ye offered to me slain 43 beasts and sacrifices by the space of forty years in the wilderness? Yea, ye took up the tabernacle of Moloch, and the star of your god Remphan, figures which ye made to worship them: and I will carry you away beyond Babylon.

44 Our fathers had the tabernacle of witness in the wilderness, as he had appointed, speak-45 ing unto Moses, that he should make it according to the fashion that he had seen. Which also our fathers that came after brought in with Jesus into the possession of the Gentiles, 46 whom God drove out before the face of our fathers, unto the days of David; who found 47 favour before God, and desired to find a tabernacle for the God of Jacob. But Solomon built 48 him an house. Howbeit the most High dwelleth not in temples made with hands; as saith 49 the prophet, Heaven is my throne, and earth is my footstool: what house will ye build me?
 50 saith the Lord: or what is the place of my rest? Hath not my hand made all these things?
 51 Ye stiffnecked and uncircumcised in heart and ears, ye do always resist the Holy Ghost:
 52 as your fathers did, so do ye. Which of the prophets have not your fathers persecuted?
 and they have slain them which shewed before of the coming of the Just One; of whom 53 ye have been now the betrayers and murderers: who have received the law by the disposition of angels, and have not kept it.

God gave the covenant to Abraham for all believers in Jehovah Jesus! This is the original, ever vital charter of restored sonship to God and heirship with Christ. It is one and the same covenant of grace, unchanged amid all changes of outward dispensation and ordinance of worship. Upon this covenant, ratified and sealed in the blood of Christ, rest the hope of the generations living and to come, and the blessed life of all the dead in Christ.

No histories so naturally and thoroughly impress us with the fact of God's providential supervision and control, as these of the prominent men in Israel's earliest period, including the three great progenitors of God's chosen people. Yet of all that are prominent until Moses, Joseph occupies a unique pre-eminence. Honesty in truthful speaking and pure, faithful action—an honesty avowedly the product of an exalting fear of God—formed a characteristic which shone in scarce another Old Testament leader, and which was conspicuously absent in many at some period of their career. This beautiful lesson, of so true and pure, so generous, forgiving, and beneficent a youth and man, may well be emphasized afresh, whenever brought to view. B.

LIKE John the Baptist, Stephen had a brief but effective career; his words were bold and trenchant, and his death was that of the martyr. The source of his courage and endurance for Christ is disclosed in the expressions by which he is characterized: Full of faith and the Holy Ghost—full of faith and power. He believed, and therefore spoke and acted. The power of the Holy Ghost wrought in and by him.

As the Jewish leaders could not gainsay his Christian teachings, nor deny the miracles done by him among the people, they resorted, as in the Master's case, to false witnesses. First, before the people, these charged him with blaspheming Moses and God. Then, when the people had been stirred up to arrest Stephen, and when the crowd stood with him before the Sanhedrim, the charge was that he had spoken blasphemous words against the Temple and the Law. For, they said, we have heard him say that this Jesus of Nazareth shall destroy this place, and shall change the customs (ceremonial rites) which Moses delivered us.

For the understanding of Stephen's answer, note carefully that Stephen had taught that Christ was about to abrogate the Temple and its ceremonial service, and to introduce a new and more spiritual form of worship. The charge of blasphemy was false; but the statement upon which they based the charge was true. Stephen had so taught, and he proceeds directly to justify this teaching. Of himself he says nothing; attempts no personal defense, but in this, his last discourse, preaches the gospel as taught in God's dealings with his ancient people.

The Jews had come to believe that the Temple, with its ritual worship, was a permanent divine institution. Therefore when Christ, and after him Stephen, intimated its abrogation of God, they were charged with blasphemy. One of Stephen's two objects was to answer and refute this charge. This he did by showing from the history, that from period to period, God had different places and methods of manifesting himself, and variable ordinances of worship. Many localities in alien and heathen countries he had made sacred by his presence. Differing forms of outward worship he had prescribed and accepted. His entire dealings with the Jewish nation were characterized all along by changes of dispensation and method, and by progress through change. Therefore it was not blasphemy to believe in another change. It was rather in accordance with his plans in the past to look for a further and even greater change. It was in harmony with the progress thus far manifest to expect a dispensation wherein God would make a fuller personal revelation of himself in connection with a more direct and spiritual worship.

While Stephen's whole address implies that their Scriptures actually taught the advent of this new dispensation and its inauguration by the "Spirit of God," yet he refers to the Son of God as the authority for all that he has preached. But this Christ of God they had rejected and now denied. Therefore, as his second object, Stephen suggests successive points in the history bearing upon the claim of Christ, and upon their rejection of that claim. The persons referred to—Abraham, whose noted faith centered upon this Messiah; Joseph and Moses, David and Solomon, the signal types of Christ in office-work and in life experience—these persons suggested and enforced the claim of Christ. And the treatment of Joseph and Moses, here discoursed upon at large, as sharply impressed their treatment of Christ. As their fathers had disbelieved and rebelled against God, so they, his accusers and judges, were guilty of similar unbelief and rebellion: Ye do always resist the Holy Ghost: as your fathers did, so do ye! Of the Just One ye have been now the betrayers and murderers!

In the outline of the history he chooses details which bear upon this double object, justifying what he had taught about the displacing of the Jewish by the Christian economy, and dealing faithfully with their souls, in the spirit of prophet and apostle. So, plainly and effectually, he transfers the charge of blasphemy from himself to them.

1, 2. The Question of the High Priest, and the Formal Opening of Stephen's Reply.—"You are permitted to answer this accusation," was the meaning of the presiding high priest's words. And Stephen's personal address was respectful to the Council and friendly to the people. Like Peter, he claimed a common interest in their nationality and history, as God's chosen people. His argument and appeal, too, rested on the facts of their history. Both argument and appeal were honestly addressed to candid hearers. The argument was designed to instruct misguided Jews concerning their great error, their reliance upon the Temple glory and ritual as the source and hope of national continuance. And the appeal was intended to convince them of their sin in rejecting and crucifying Christ. One of his hearers, the only one that is mentioned by name, then a conscientious persecutor, but afterward a Christian leader, sums up Stephen's meaning in Heb. 1 : 1, 2.

3-8. Points of Abraham's History.—The brief clause, The God of glory, forms both a fine introduction to this discourse and a striking contradiction of the charge of blasphemy. His reference, as they well knew, was to the Shechinal or former visible glory above the mercy-seat. It was their God and his God, of whose dealings he was about to speak. And this glory of God Stephen saw at his death hour (v. 55).

The first departure of Abram from Ur, Stephen said, was at the call of God. This we may infer from Gen. 11 : 31. The call was repeated at Haran, here called Charran (the Greek form). The summons to separate utterly from his idolatrous kindred and people was imperative, while the direction of his journey and place of his sojourn were indefinite. Yet with implicit faith he obeyed. And this absolute faith and heroic obedience justly stands commended in the Old Testament by God himself, by Christ and his teachers in the New. A chief lesson suggested is this: "There is no grace which God delights more to exercise and try than the faith of his people; as faith puts honor upon God, so doth God put honor upon faith; and faith never honors God more, nor is more highly honored by him, than when it is put upon the greatest exercise and trial." (Burkitt.)

Not only does Stephen recall the forgotten faith of their father Abraham, but he reminds them that neither Abraham nor the twelve patriarchs, nor the nation which sprang from them, had for long centuries any temple or ritual, any city or even country that they could call their own. Thus he rebukes, indirectly but forcibly, their extravagant and idolatrous reverence for their Temple and its ceremonial, their capital and nationality. Further to emphasize this rebuke, he quotes the divine prediction to Abraham, that his seed should be enslaved and degraded for four centuries. Yet in all this homeless and oppressed period, Abraham and the patriarchs and their descendants practiced some kind of worship. So, Stephen intimates, as worship existed before Jerusalem and the Temple, it may exist when these are no more. And more, as God once called Abram from idolatry and heathenism, so he may call idolatrous Jew and barbarous Gentile to

Mention of this covenant is made to show that God's promise of grace preceded by many centuries the law and customs given to Moses. The promise or covenant was simple and unalterable, while the ceremonials were many, various, and changeable. Take away the covenant, and there was left no ground or hope for worship. But take away the ceremonials, and the heart could worship just as well and truly. This, also, was a part of Stephen's answer. In predicting change or abrogation of the Mosaic customs, he surely had not blasphemed the God or the worship of Israel.

9-16. Outline of Joseph's Story.—Prominence is next given to Joseph's history to show how God's plan of his people's progress is developed by changes. Here, as at almost every step, the purposed advance is made by his interposing deliverance in peculiar crises of individuals or of the people. When some of his brethren would have killed Joseph, God led Reuben and Judah to save his life. When he was sold, God directed the event, and brought him to Egypt. And God rescued him from an unjust imprisonment and led him, by successive steps, to become a ruler and deliverer of Egypt and a savior to his brethren. Thus God was with Joseph to rescue and exalt him, and through him to bring the sons of Israel into Egypt for present safety and future increase into a nation. Seventy-five souls (cited from the Greek translation of the Old Testament) thus multiplied into two millions in four hundred years; their isolated compacted condition, even with servitude, kept them from the dispersion which must have ensued from the nomadic life of Canaan. All these facts Stephen glances at in support of his point, that at every age, in all change of circumstance, God was with his people, and was producing progress by changes, either small or great.

Another reason for the fullness of Joseph's story may have been his singular resemblance to Christ, in his rejection by his brethren, his exaltation to power, and his deliverance of those who rejected him.

17-34. The Earlier Years of Moses.—At the expiration of the four hundred years of bondage (v. 6) occurred the time of the promise (v. 7). It would seem that the oppression had been comparatively light during nearly this whole period. At length, toward the end, arose a king of a new dynasty who beheld the wonderful increase of Israel's descendants with alarm. Various devices (Ex. 1) were carried into effect to destroy the young children among the Hebrews. And the burdens were made heavy and galling so as to induce Hebrew parents to consent willingly to the destruction of their male children. But all these events, also, God overruled to accomplish his purpose and promise.

Two facts in this part of the narrative concerning Moses are to be briefly noted. One suggests Stephen's charge against them; the other forms part of his answer to their charge. The first is the rejection of Moses by his brethren when he would have delivered them. Indirectly the connection of Moses with Christ is here intimated. For like Moses, Christ was rejected as a deliverer by his brethren. The sequel of Stephen's words shows this to have been his meaning. And verses 26, 27 disclose this other point of analogy: that as Moses was "thrust away" because he urged right doing, so Christ was rejected because of his demand of righteousness in heart and life.

The other fact, helping to answer their charge, is the manifestation of God to Moses in the burning bush. Five centuries before the Temple was built and its inclosure made holy ground, in an alien and afterward hostile country, God had sanctified by his presence a portion of the ground. So—Stephen suggests to their quick apprehension—when the Temple is removed, he may reveal himself elsewhere, nay, everywhere. Afterward, as before, he may be worshiped without a ritual. Afterward, as before, he may deal directly, spiritually, with the individual soul, without intervention of altar, priest, or sacrifice.

35-38. Moses, sent of God, Israel's Deliverer from Egypt, Leader in the Wilderness, Lawgiver, Prophet, and Mediator.—This Moses whom, they refused is the emphatic thought in these four verses. He whom God sent as their savior from bondage, through whom he wrought stupendous miracles for their deliverance and preservation, through whom he transmitted living precepts and truths, and whose mediation he appointed and oftentimes graciously accepted, this Moses was refused by the people for whom he so faithfully wrought and interceded.

And in the very midst of these weighty particulars respecting Moses occurs his signal prophecy of Christ. One, like unto himself, should deliver, teach, intercede for, lead, and provide for his people. Such a one, whose offices of redemption, whose coming, life, death, and resurrection, were further set forth by David and the prophets, Stephen here asserts that this Moses, their Moses, had promised in the future. And until Christ, no being answering in person and work to the promise had appeared. But this CHRIST had fulfilled to the letter every statement of prophecy, every particular of promise. This was the culminating intimation conveyed in the address of Stephen. With all that had occurred in the events of Christ's history and of the apostle's subsequent teaching and miracles, these keen-witted priests could not mistake his meaning. And if Christ were the prophet predicted by Moses, they could not but feel the charge as proven against them which they had brought against Stephen. For they were dishonoring Moses in rejecting Him whom Moses had foretold.

39-43. How Israel refused Moses and rejected God by turning to Idolatry.—Stephen refers only to their prominent sin as a conclusive illustration. The making and worshiping the calf of gold was an open defiance to God. And it was prefaced with scornful contempt of this Moses. Reminding his hearers of this to deepen previous impressions, he also tells them plainly what God did to the rebellious people: how when they turned from him he abandoned them to their own desires and left them to idolatrous worship. In verse 43 he refers to the unnatural and murderous sacrifices offered to Moloch and to the star-god Remphan (in Amos 5: 26, Chiun), or Saturn worshiped under the image of a star. And he cites the threatening of God, afterward sorely fulfilled to their fathers, to drive them out into distant captivity. Thus plainly Stephen reminds them of their father's guilt and its punishment to point his own severe charge that follows.

44, 45. Their Possession of the Tabernacle an Aggravation of their Guilt.—In this structure, built and furnished under God's direction, the law of God was kept and the symbol of God's presence was visible. And God had shown his presence and power by driving out idolatrous nations from their promised inheritance. So that the generation in the wilderness and the after generations to David were without excuse for their disobedience and idol worship. B.

46, 47. There is really a tacit contrast between David and Solomon, in favor of the former. Solomon, notwithstanding his wisdom and the splendor of his reign, holds a very inferior place to David in the Scriptures. This being well known to the priests and scribes whom Stephen was addressing, he employs it to enforce his argument, but tacitly and indirectly, lest he should appear to speak indecorously of so great and wise a king as Solomon. What is thus suggested or implied may be brought out more distinctly by a paraphrase. "So far is a permanent and solid temple from being essential to acceptable worship, that even David, the favorite of Jehovah, the man after God's own heart, whose darling wish it was to find a shelter and a home for his divine protector, was not suffered to erect the house which he had planned, and for which he had collected the materials, but it was Solomon who built it!" J. A. A.

46-50. Even the Temple shown by Solomon and the Prophet Isaiah to be an Insufficient Dwelling for the Lord of Hosts.—Their superstitious and idolatrous veneration for their temple, in which God had never visibly entered, Stephen rebukes, while he still more effectually refutes their charge of blasphemy "against this place." He reminds them that even Solomon, who built the first temple by express command of God, who had seen the symbol of lighted flame descend from heaven, God himself; enter and abide within the completed structure—even Solomon at that very time publicly declared that the Most High dwelleth not in, is not confined to, any hand-made temples. Nay, more than this, Stephen's mind, under its divine inspiration, expands to the wider, grander thought of Isaiah (66: 1, 2), where his prophecies culminate in the sublime prediction of God's universal spiritual indwelling in human hearts. Then shall be no longer temple, ritual, nor priest. Then the framer of the heavens and the earth, he who formed and lighted every world, whose power holds or energizes all natural things, will be worshiped in spirit and truth! How grand the climax and how complete the proof, in the martyr's argument! How clear the prophetic prediction of the very change of dispensation announced by Christ and by Stephen, a change which these sharp-minded, convinced Jewish priests and rulers saw already taking place in the marvels of the infant Christian Church of Jerusalem! B.

51, 52. One of Stephen's lines of argument was now completed. He had shown, by a simple but masterly historical deduction, the temporary nature of the ceremonial law, and of the Temple as a part of it, concluding by a reference to Solomon himself, and to Isaiah, who had foretold the same changes now foretold by Stephen. What link could have been added to this chain of proof? All that was left then was to take up and complete his other line of argument, designed to show, by means of the same history which he had been expounding, that the Jews had always been unfaithful to their trust, and that the abrogation of the present system was not only necessary to the execution of God's purpose as revealed from the beginning, but a righteous retribution of the sins of those by whom the system was administered. Having prepared the way for this conclusion by referring to the sins of Joseph's brethren, and of the Israelites in Egypt and the wilderness, he now suggests the conclusion itself, not by a formal inference, but by a terrible invective, summing up all that he had said on this point in a brief description of the men whom he addressed, and of the nation which they represented. As the ancient Israel had been rebellious and unfaithful, so the present generation had exactly the same character, and therefore might expect the evils threatened to their fathers. To them the prophets had applied the same reproachful epithets which Stephen here applies to his accusers and his judges. The compound terms, uncircumcised in heart and ears, mean those who hear and think and feel like Gentiles, like the heathen ; and their sudden application to the Sanhedrim, instead of necessarily implying a departure from the theme of his discourse, is rather a tremendous summing of it up in the conclusion, that these proud representatives and rulers of the chosen people were in fact mere heathen.

53. Who have received the law, and have not kept it. The Jews, as a nation, had betrayed the highest trust, and proved themselves unworthy of the greatest honor ever granted to a people. They, the recipients and depositaries of an exclusive revelation, had themselves endeavored to defeat the very end for which it was vouchsafed to them. Beyond this, accusation or invective could not well be carried. In point both of rhetoric and logic, Stephen could not have concluded more effectively. J. A. A.—They could deny nothing, for Stephen had stated only facts. The inferences they perfectly understood. The points he had made, in his own justification and in the plainly implied charge against them, Stephen knew that these sharp-witted leaders both apprehended and felt. They were prepared for a direct accusation, and Stephen's conscience as well as his argument pressed him to make it. So, as first the Master and afterward Peter, in the identical tribunal and before the very same priests and rulers, Stephen now reverses the position of the parties. Guided and girded by the indwelling Spirit of Christ, he fearlessly arraigns his judges for a far higher crime before a more august tribunal.

Up to this point, he had only implied this charge and laid a broad foundation for it. But now, concentrating in one view the crimes of many generations of their fathers against God, he boldly affirms that of all these they have been guilty. As their fathers resisted the Holy Spirit of God in his partially exerted force, they have openly defied the same Spirit now manifest in his mightiest energy of blessing and life. As their fathers persecuted the prophets who announced the coming and the redemption of Messiah, the Just One, they have pursued to the death the Just One, the Christ himself. And as their fathers, so they have despised the holy Law of Jehovah. This Law they professed to honor as sent through their great leader Moses. He reminds them of an even greater dignity, upon which also they prided themselves, in its transmission to Moses through the instrumentality of angels. Yet this Law, in itself of divine origin and ordination, transmitted through agents so august and revered—this Law, which they had falsely charged him with blasphemy, they themselves had utterly disobeyed and dishonored. And in truth, as Stephen charged, they were not the true, the spiritual Israel. With all their proud boasting, they were only aliens and heathen. B.

ACTS vii. 54-60 ; viii. 1-4.

54 WHEN they heard these things, they were cut to the heart, and they gnashed on him with 55 their teeth. But he, being full of the Holy Ghost, looked up stedfastly into heaven, and 56 saw the glory of God, and Jesus standing on the right hand of God, and said, Behold, I see 57 the heavens opened, and the Son of man standing on the right hand of God. Then they 58 cried out with a loud voice, and stopped their ears, and ran upon him with one accord, and cast him out of the city, and stoned him : and the witnesses laid down their clothes at a 59 young man's feet, whose name was Saul. And they stoned Stephen, calling upon God, and 60 saying, Lord Jesus, receive my spirit. And he kneeled down, and cried with a loud voice, Lord, lay not this sin to their charge. And when he had said this, he fell asleep.
1, 2 And Saul was consenting unto his death. And devout men carried Stephen to his burial, and made great lamentation over him. And at that time there was a great persecution against the church which was at Jerusalem ; and they were all scattered abroad throughout 3 the regions of Judæa and Samaria, except the apostles. As for Saul, he made havock of the church, entering into every house, and haling men and women, committed them to prison.
4 Therefore they that were scattered abroad went everywhere preaching the word.

THE death of Stephen is the New Testament translation, and he is to be set as the third with Enoch and Elijah, only higher, inasmuch as each manifestation of God rises while time moves on. It is a greater thing to overcome death than to be carried past it, and here it is no fire-chariot which lifts to heaven, but the outstretched hand of Christ, according to his own word, "I will come and receive you unto myself, that where I am there ye may be also." In the death of Stephen it is intended that we should see how thin the veil is between the two worlds—how the Lord stands on the very confine, sending across his look and arm and voice, so that ere his servant left the earth he saw his heavenly master, heard his words, and returned his smile. And, in our own time, God lets us see how he can lighten the dark valley with his presence, and make his most beautiful gems sparkle in the coronet of death. He reveals to us in our Christian friends oftentimes such a beauty and tenderness of soul in the hour of parting, that we can see they were directing their look clear into the heavenly world, and we walking with angels unaware. The calmness and tender sweetness of the dying hour, the faith and patience and hope, are most evident tokens of the presence of Christ's Spirit; but may not the smile of more than human joy, the glow which sometimes suffuses the countenance till it is seen like the face of an angel, be the reflection of the look of Christ himself, and the first faint ripple of the waves of unutterable glory that are beginning to touch the feet and sparkle in the eyes of the awakening soul? Most sure, to those who have witnessed it, is the conviction that there must be light beyond, that this gleam is not from death's darkness but God's own day, and may well be encouragement to us "to hope in his word, and to wait for the Lord more than they that watch for the morning; yea, more than they that watch for the morning." Ker.

54. Deeply stung by the Direct, Incisive Charge of Stephen, the Leaders and People are maddened with Rage against him.—As he intended, his words are truthful home-thrusts that can neither be avoided nor turned aside. And where conviction does not melt into penitence, it hardens into a stronger hate, and flames into a fiercer wrath. So here, the hate and the wrath seek God's sent reprove. They would rend to pieces the Christlike man who now stands calmly before them, with eyes upcast, and with the "sheen of heaven" still upon his brow.

55, 56. His Vision of the Opened Heavens, the Glory of God, and the Man Christ Jesus standing at the Right Hand of God.—The very first words of Stephen were, The God of glory. These words comprised his theme. In the ways and working of this God, traced to his incarnation in Christ, he finds his justification and defense. And now this God confirms the martyr's truth by a palpable vision of his glory in vital association with the person of Jesus, the Son of man. Instantly the self-forgetting Stephen avails himself of the vision for his enemies' advantage. Virtually continuing his address, he fervently preaches Him whom he now beholds. With a testimony so clear and marvelous that demanded belief, he proclaims the risen and glorified Christ to these hardened men, if he may move them.

Concerning this marvelous experience of Stephen, it was certainly true that a supernatural spiritual illumination was vouchsafed, which had all the effect of actual vision. The latter may have been added. But the purpose of this opened heaven and visible Christ seems to be clear and manifold. As it related to the martyr himself, it was designed to lend in this crisis hour special strength to his faith, and so give a tone of triumph to his final testimony.

But there seems to be a more significant purpose and use intimated by the form of Stephen's declaration. To these very men, only three or four years before, Christ had said, Hereafter shall the Son of man sit on the right hand of the power of God! Now Stephen affirms in their presence that this assertion of Christ is fulfilled: Behold, I see the Son of man standing on the right hand of God! Thus another most powerful testimony to the truth and Godhood of Christ is added to deepen the impression upon their minds. That Stephen's words are designed to be thus responsive to Christ's, we find strong confirmation in his use of the expression Son of man. Nowhere but here, in the Gospels, Acts, or Epistles, is this title applied to Christ except by himself. If here used by Stephen in responsive quotation or parallel, we have a reasonable explanation of his use of a title so solemnly appropriated by our Lord himself.

A minor difference between the two utterances of the Master and disciple carries with it a touching suggestion. In Christ's words, and elsewhere, he is described as sitting on the right hand of God. Stephen beholds him arisen as if ready and waiting to welcome his first martyred disciple!

57, 58. Stephen is borne, with Outcry and Violence, out of the City and stoned.—The enraged leaders and people understand his meaning, but they scorn the Christ he declares to be God. To their blinded minds and envenomed hearts, Stephen's words only aggravate his guilt. Their cry of blasphemy now rings loudly out on the air. Then, without further form of trial, without a moment's respite or a thought of pity, the maddened throng seize this unbefriended man, drag him with insult and stroke through the Temple gate outside the city, and there maim and crush his body with stones to the death. B.

Somewhere about the rocky edges of the ravine of Jehoshaphat, where the Mount of Olives looks down upon Gethsemane and Siloam, or on the open ground to the north, which travelers cross when they go toward Samaria or Damascus—with stones that lay without the walls of the Holy City—this heavenly-minded martyr was murdered. H.

The witnesses, according to the law (Deut. 17: 7), were required to cast the first stones and afterward to lead the rest, in the execution of sentence. They laid aside, therefore, the outer garment, or mantle, that their action might be freer. The garments were put in charge of Saul, who, in God's purpose, will ere long take this stoned man's place as witness to Christ. Saul's only human teacher was Stephen. He was instructed if not convinced by Stephen's address. He could not but have been impressed by the martyr's bold fidelity and utter self-consecration. He must have felt that sublime trust which expelled all fear and power of death. And deeply must he have been touched by the beautiful spirit that added to forgiveness of his murderers fervent intercession with God in their behalf. For Saul certainly, probably for many besides, Stephen's intercession availed as a means of ultimate conversion. B.

It is deeply interesting to think of Saul as listening to the martyr's voice, as he antedated those very arguments which he himself was destined to reiterate in synagogues and before kings. There is no reason to doubt that he was present. And it is evident, from the thoughts which occurred to him in his subsequent vision within the precincts of the Temple (Acts 22: 20), how deep an impression Stephen's death had left on his memory. We can not dissociate the martyrdom of Stephen from the conversion of Paul. The spectacle of so much constancy, so much faith, so much love, could not be lost. It is hardly too much to say with Augustine, that "the Church owes Paul to the prayer of Stephen." H.

59, 60. The Dying Prayers and the Death-Sleep of the Proto-Martyr.—For himself and for his murderers, he prays; as before, in like experience, the Master had prayed. Only this difference in the petition for himself: Christ had commended his spirit to the Father. But He had taught his disciples that they belonged immediately to Him; and that He would receive them again unto himself at death. So understanding and believing, Stephen simply responds, Lord Jesus, receive my spirit! B.—Plainly in this prayer Stephen honored the Son even as the Son honored the Father when he prayed, "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit." As plainly neither the Master, nor this first martyr among his followers, questioned the separate existence of the spirit after death. O. E. D.

And the prayer for his murderers is identical in spirit with Christ's upon the cross. Specially touching are the circumstances of this prayer. While crushing blows were overwhelming him and his life-blood was freely flowing, mindful only of their guilt and God's mercy, he gathers his last strength, kneels down—that they may see his attitude of prayer—and prays with full voice—that they may hear—for their forgiveness. Thus, in Christlike love, under circumstances never humanly matched, he deliberately leaves this last impression of his spirit and purpose. And this completes and crowns his ministry that day to them. He had "magnified Christ in his life" by Christlike fidelity and boldness. And now he "magnifies Christ in his death" by his tranquil and triumphant faith, and by his fervent intercession for his slayers. As he stands or kneels, the target of their murderous rage, their tumultuous, passionate outcry is met by his calm, patient endurance, his steadfast heavenward gaze, his fervent prayer, his trustful self-commitment—and then his falling asleep!

And when he had said this, he fell asleep. Sleep is Christ's word for death, which Luke and his teacher Paul have thoroughly learned. But how striking its use just here! Amid such tumult, while raging passions are actually venting themselves in violent outcry and murderous deed, how does this figure of perfect calmness in a soul departing from its crushed body add wonderful testimony to the truth and power of the Christ here appealed to!

Now that they have silenced this faithful voice, and stilled this fervid heart in death, the Jewish priests and leaders seem to have prevailed. But they were the conquered, not the conquering party. From that one sacrifice sprang many new-created souls, as gracious trophies of the power that from the planted seed brings life out of death. B.—The revelation of such a character at the moment of death was the strongest of all evidences, and the highest of all encouragements. Nothing could more confidently assert the divine power of the new religion; nothing could prophesy more surely the certainty of its final victory. H.

At the martyrdom of Stephen, the malice of the Jews became, under the power of Christ, the means of proving that He, whom they had crucified, the divine proto-martyr, Jesus Christ, now reigning in heaven, is the source of all the courage of martyrs in the dying hour, and of all the hope which gives them a foretaste of bliss, and of all the charity which makes them love and bless their persecutors. W.

The reader is not likely to die for his allegiance to Christ under a shower of stones, but how does he bear it when a single stone is thrown at him? He may be assailed by injurious words, which often wound more sharply, leave uglier scars, and are harder to be borne; and does he hold fast his serenity and good will? Trivial trials may be as decisive of character as martyrdoms. Many a disciple to-day in some obscure lot of suffering or want treads as closely in the footsteps of the Master as his first martyr Stephen. O. E. D.

1-4. The first seven chapters trace the founding of the Christian Church, and its extension among the Jews. The eighth and ninth chapters sketch some marked details of its transition from the Jews to the Gentiles.

Stephen's bold declaration that the Temple and its service were to be laid aside struck directly at the most deeply rooted prejudices and feelings of the people. Against the apostles, who said nothing about the Temple, but simply preached Christ as the Messiah of the Hebrew Scriptures, the people had taken no decided part. They had little sympathy with the priestly party, by whom mainly the apostles had been prosecuted. But now, thoroughly roused by Stephen's defense and not satisfied with his destruction, the people turn their persecuting rage against the body of believers in Jerusalem. Of this persecution Saul was the leader. And so sharp and fierce was the pursuit, that the Church fellowship was broken up, and its members compelled to disperse. In small detached companies they went into the whole region of Judea, and thence northward into Samaria; so fulfilling the terms of the Master's commission. A few, doubtless, remained with the apostles in Jerusalem. B.

The martyrdom of Stephen forms an epoch in the early history of the Church, the date of which is the more interesting on account of its bearing upon Paul's life. But the narrative in the Acts supplies us with no chronological data, from the day of Pentecost in A. D. 30 down to the famine under Claudius and the death of Herod Agrippa I. in A. D. 44. That Paul's conversion followed at no long interval after Stephen's martyrdom seems clear; and various indications concur to place it somewhere within the limits of Caligula's four years' reign. Coming to narrower limits, we shall see that the strongest arguments and the best modern opinions concur in fixing the conversion of Paul about A. D. 37. S.

Section 203.

Acts viii. 5-40.

5 THEN Philip went down to the city of Samaria, and preached Christ unto them. And 6 the people with one accord gave heed unto those things which Philip spake, hearing and 7 seeing the miracles which he did. For unclean spirits, crying with loud voice, came out of many that were possessed with them: and many taken with palsies, and that were lame, 8 were healed. And there was great joy in that city.

9 But there was a certain man, called Simon, which beforetime in the same city used sorcery, and bewitched the people of Samaria, giving out that himself was some great one: to 10 whom they all gave heed, from the least to the greatest, saying, This man is the great power
11 of God. And to him they had regard, because that of long time he had bewitched them 12 with sorceries. But when they believed Philip preaching the things concerning the kingdom of God, and the name of Jesus Christ, they were baptized, both men and women.
13 Then Simon himself believed also: and when he was baptized, he continued with Philip, 14 and wondered, beholding the miracles and signs which were done. Now when the apostles which were at Jerusalem heard that Samaria had received the word of God, they sent 15 unto them Peter and John: who, when they were come down prayed for them, that they 16 might receive the Holy Ghost: (for as yet he was fallen upon none of them: only they 17 were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus.) Then laid they their hands on them, and 18 they received the Holy Ghost. And when Simon saw that through laying on of the apostles'
19 hands the Holy Ghost was given, he offered them money, saying, Give me also this 20 power, that on whomsoever I lay hands, he may receive the Holy Ghost. But Peter said unto him, Thy money perish with thee, because thou hast thought that the gift of God may 21 be purchased with money. Thou hast neither part nor lot in this matter: for thy heart is 22 not right in the sight of God. Repent therefore of this thy wickedness, and pray God, if 23 perhaps the thought of thine heart may be forgiven thee. For I perceive that thou art 24 in the gall of bitterness, and in the bond of iniquity. Then answered Simon, and said, Pray ye to the Lord for me, that none of these things which ye have spoken come upon 25 me. And they, when they had testified and preached the word of the Lord, returned to Jerusalem, and preached the gospel in many villages of the Samaritans.
26 And the angel of the Lord spake unto Philip, saying, Arise, and go toward the south, 27 unto the way that goeth down from Jerusalem unto Gaza, which is desert. And he arose and went: and, behold, a man of Ethiopia, an eunuch of great authority under Candace queen of the Ethiopians, who had the charge of all her treasure, and had come to Jerusa-

28 lem for to worship, was returning, and sitting in his chariot read Esaias the prophet.
 29 Then the Spirit said unto Philip, Go near, and join thyself to this chariot. And Philip ran 30 thither to him, and heard him read the prophet Esaias, and said, Understandest thou what 31 thou readest? And he said, How can I, except some man should guide me? And he 32 desired Philip that he would come up and sit with him. The place of the Scripture which he read was this, He was led as a sheep to the slaughter; and like a lamb dumb before his 33 shearer, so opened he not his mouth: in his humiliation his judgment was taken away:
 34 and who shall declare his generation? for his life is taken from the earth. And the eunuch answered Philip, and said, I pray thee, of whom speaketh the prophet this? of himself, or 35 of some other man? Then Philip opened his mouth, and began at the same Scripture, and 36 preached unto him Jesus. And as they went on their way, they came unto a certain water:
 37 and the eunuch said, See, here is water; what doth hinder me to be baptized? And Philip said, If thou believest with all thine heart, thou mayest. And he answered and said, I 38 believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God. And he commanded the chariot to stand still:
 and they went down both into the water, both Philip and the eunuch; and he baptized him.
 39 And when they were come up out of the water, the Spirit of the Lord caught away Philip, 40 that the eunuch saw him no more: and he went on his way rejoicing. But Philip was found at Azotus: and passing through he preached in all the cities, till he came to Cæsarea.

THE one theme of apostles and disciples all—of Peter, Stephen, Philip, Paul, and of the many here unnamed—was Jesus Crucified. This word of Isaiah about the Crucified and Risen One is preëminently that which moves the selfish dull heart. The preaching of law and morality either strikes against an antagonistic will or quiets the conscience by falling in with the self-righteousness of the heart. But to stir the soul to a needed sense of sin, and awaken the craving and the cry for peace and pardon, this can be effected by nothing save the sublime fact of a divine self-sacrifice for human guilt; nothing but the preaching and the telling of Jesus. B.—The treasurer had come from Ethiopia to Jerusalem with the burden of sin; he was going away with it, much as he came, when the Holy Spirit turned his eye to the Sin-bearer, the Lamb of God. He saw that the sin-bearing work was done; he accepted the divine testimony to that finished work; and in the acceptance of that testimony he found immediate joy. What he read was as blessed as it was true, and our joy comes from the same testimony to the same finished work. The passage of Scripture may be different; that matters not. There are a thousand passages, and a thousand testimonies, all bearing on the one cross, the one propitiation, the one Lamb of God, the one blood, the one sacrifice. Any one of these testimonies in the hand of the Holy Spirit can pour in gladness into the soul. Bonar.

5-8. Stephen's death, introducing a general persecution of the disciples, formed the turning point of the gospel's extension among the Gentiles. For they that were scattered abroad went everywhere preaching the word. Of the many, Luke, under inspiration, briefly refers to Philip, who had been a fellow-deacon with Stephen, and was also a Greek. Like the many who preached, this man was ordained to the higher ministry directly and only by the Holy Ghost. By the Spirit he is first led to a city of Samaria. We know not what city. But we may well infer that it was Sychar, where Christ had privately taught for two days with wonderful results. He performed no miracle, yet they acknowledged him to be indeed the Christ, the Saviour of the world. Now we see further fruit in their hearty reception of Philip's preaching, accredited as he was by many miracles. The simple recital of the effect wrought in his ministry is noteworthy: And there was great joy in that city.

9-11. The Previous Influence of Simon the Sorcerer in that City.—This man was one of a class who had existed from the earliest period in all the kingdoms of the East. With various names—soothsayers or sorcerers, magicians or conjurors—they pretended to possess supernatural power from the spirit world. In ignorant and credulous ages, when superstitions of every sort abounded, it was easy to delude by professed enchantments and by the assumption of a superior nature and force. Thus did the magicians in Egypt and the astrologers in Assyria and Persia. The Samaritans held this man in fear, "because for a long time he had astonished (not bewitched) them with sorceries."

12, 13. Effect of Philip's Preaching upon the Samaritans and upon Simon.—Mark what it was that Philip preached, and how he was accredited as from God. He preached the kingdom of God as opened by Christ: Christ, of whom they knew in their Scriptures, with whose teaching and recent death they were familiar. Against this the Samaritans opposed no prejudice of false Pharisaic teaching. To them, too, the miracles of Philip were proven to be real by their blessed effects in healing and restoring. Therefore they believed him, and received his teaching; while by Simon's wonders of jugglery, subserving no useful purpose, they had only been amazed. So God contrasted the real with the counterfeit miracle, and the real prevailed, as it had aforetime with Moses before Pharaoh. The people believed, and were baptized in testimony of their belief. And their belief, as subsequently proven, was genuine.

But Simon believed also, and was baptized. He believed—what? Just that which his unenlightened mind understood of the statements of Philip. He believed in the bare fact of marvels pertaining to Christ's nature, life, and resurrection, because he saw absolute miracles: effects clearly supernatural, utterly overmatching his poor deceits. But of the spiritual aspects and truths lying beneath the outward statements and facts he had no discernment, and of course could exercise no faith. He believed in the miracles, and in the necessary inferences of fact suggested by the miracles, but no more. As the people had wondered at him, so, Luke says, he wondered (the same word translated "bewitched" before), as he closely watched Philip, and "the miracles and signs done." Only, like "the devils," he "believed and trembled." Yet, without an idea of spiritual saving faith, he went through the form of profession; he dared to attach himself to Christ's visible body.

14-17. The Mission of Peter and John to Samaria.—The apostles as a body still directed and controlled the great religious movement. So had Christ ordained. As a body, without a primate, they sent Peter and John to Samaria so soon as they heard the results of Philip's preaching. John once would have called down destroying fire upon the Samaritans. Now he gladly seeks to bring upon them the blessed baptism of fire from the Holy Ghost. Together these fervid brother-apostles plead for this special power, and their prayer is answered. B.

It is not surprising that the college of apostles, when they heard that Samaria had received the Word of God, should send a deputation to the place where the good work had begun; not because Philip was only a deacon, for he was more; or because they were jealous or suspicious of him; or because they doubted the sincerity or depth of the Samaritan conversions; or to show that the apostles, though this work began without them, still retained their old position; but because they were the constituted organizers of the Church, and as such not only authorized but bound to enter every open door, whoever might have opened it. J. A. A.

They received the Holy Ghost.—The meaning seems to be clear. They, like all true converts, had received his ordinary gifts bestowed in regeneration. Now they receive the peculiar, extraordinary gifts of Pentecost, of special illumination and knowledge of truth. These gifts were needed in that crisis by many in various regions. And they were imparted here in connection with a special formality, the imposition of hands by these divinely guided apostles.

18, 19. Simon's Sacrilegious Proffer and Request.—Evidently Simon was not of the number who received the Holy Ghost, or he would not have made this request. He saw in others the effect of this special divine gift, and so was led to ask. He did not offer himself, as others had done, to receive the gift, but he offered money to buy it. And this offer, together with his proposed use of the power, plainly show what his spirit and purpose were. He wished to be the "great one" that he had before proclaimed himself. He would use this surpassing power as he had used his own trivial sorceries, for his selfish ambition, enrichment, and gratification. A fearful condition of heart indeed, that dared cherish and express such a sacrilegious purpose in the face of these servitors of the Most High God, nay, more, in presence of stupendous tokens of the manifest God himself.

20-23. Peter's Sharp Rebuke and Exposure of Simon's Impiety, and his Faithful Counsel.—The apostle did not need a special gift to discern this man's spirit, for the attempt to influence them by money considerations showed plainly that he was controlled by selfish motives. Peter's rebuke was an outburst of holy indignation, not an utterance of divine judgment, as in the case of Ananias. The difference in the cases and circumstances accounts for his different dealing. Calvin interprets verse 20, "Thou art worthy to perish with thy money, when thou dost blaspheme the Spirit of God." The apostle tells him that his profession of Christ and his baptism were worthless, because his heart was not right in God's sight. He is still what he had been before, with the poison of sin embittering his nature and its servitude binding his life. Therefore he counsels repentance of this wickedness and prayer for forgiveness. As Peter had condemned the thought of Simon's heart, not the act it prompted, so now this is the point of the prayer he urges: "Pray God, if perhaps the thought of thine heart may be forgiven thee."

24. Simon's Reply, showing only an Ignorant and Untouched Heart.—No proper sense of sin was awakened by the apostle's warning. He was temporarily alarmed, but only on account of threatened punishment. Instead of praying as a consciously sinful penitent man for his own forgiveness, as Peter had bidden him, he selfishly begged the apos-

bles to pray that the consequences of his sin might be remitted. Ignorant of the very rudiments of divine teaching, he dreams of forgiveness without either faith, repentance, or prayer of his own. And so he disappears from the history, without hint of after change in his stolid heart.

25. The Home Journey of the Apostles a Missionary Circuit through Samaria.—By the way of many villages of the Samaritans, in each of which they tarried to preach the gospel, Peter and John returned to Jerusalem.

26-37. The spurious conversion of Simon is here contrasted with a true one, in connection with the same ministry. That was an enforced alarming belief in the mere miracle-working power of the Christ who was preached. This is a glad belief of the heart in Christ's personal love and full redemption. Another contrast we see in the sphere of Philip's ministry here. Multitudes heard, heeded, and believed, when he "preached Christ" in that city of Samaria. One man believed, when "he preached Jesus" in an untraveled highway. Yet he went willingly from the large "field" to the small; toiled far more, and preached as fervently to one man as to the multitude. Philip was obviously an excellent example to all who in Christ's name say, "Come." Another useful thought, of wide application in our New Testament study, is that both these instances of Philip's preaching, with its diverse effects, are given simply as sufficient illustrations of his whole ministry, and of the ministry of all who "went everywhere preaching the Word." They are designed to show how the gospel was carried abroad, and made effectual in winning individuals and communities. And herein lies the peculiar purpose and value of the Acts. All after individual experience and church history is shadowed forth or plainly exemplified in this book.

26. Philip's New and Special Commission.—He had finished his designed work in the Samaritan city. He is now called of God elsewhere. By the ordinary intimations of Providence the Spirit had guided him to Samaria. By an extraordinary message through an angelic messenger the same Spirit now sends him on a peculiar errand. The direction is simple in terms: Go to a certain road! Yet it is vague, for it indicates no point or place in the road. The road is one of many from Jerusalem to Gaza. It is a desert road, passing through a region without cities or villages. No point upon this road, no time, and no duty, are indicated. To realize how indefinite the direction yet how surely divine the appointment, remember that this road was sixty miles in length, and a considerable portion of it was "desert." But Philip at once obeyed. Like a commander who sails for a given point, with sealed orders to be opened there, he reached the place, and found his further procedure definitely marked. And, throughout, he was obedient to the heavenly vision.

27-29. His Meeting with the Ethiopian Chamberlain, and the Further Direction he received.—Himself on foot, he is overtaken by a chariot and its attendants. In the chariot sits a stranger, a high court officer of the reigning Queen of Ethiopia. He is returning southward from Jerusalem, where, as a Gentile proselyte of the Jewish religion, he had gone to worship. Now he is reading aloud, as he journeys, from a scroll containing the prophecies of Isaiah. This simple fact, showing his interest in the truth and earnest desire to understand and receive it, is evidence of some special influence of the Holy Spirit in preparing him to accept Philip's teaching. Thus we see the Spirit operating on both sides, sending the teacher, and making ready the heart to be taught and convinced. Nay, more, he leads this interested man's thought to the central theme of the Old Testament Gospel. And it is always thus. The Spirit of God prepares the agents and means and the heart itself in every case of true conversion. Now by an inward voice the Spirit bids Philip run after and overtake the chariot, which had passed on. Other subsequent divine directions to Philip appear in the part he took in the conference that followed.

30, 31. The Question of Philip and its Answer. "Understandest Thou?"—A question of vital moment—now as then! "Ye know not the Scriptures," was Christ's bold declaration to the cultured Sadducees. And the question repeats itself, the charge lies against multitudes to-day who profess to read them. Frankly and humbly this Ethiopian, nobler in this frank humility than in his high position, acknowledges his ignorance. He asks the poor foot-traveler to sit beside him in his chariot, and to be his guide to the "understanding" of the Scripture. As frankly and as humbly Philip assents, and takes the equal place assigned him.

32-35. The Question of the Ethiopian and Philip's Answer.—He was reading the 53d chapter of Isaiah; the signal prophecy of Christ's vicarious sufferings, many times distinctly referred to. Seven centuries had passed since it had been recorded for the Jewish people. But it had never been apprehended, much less accepted, by the Jews; for it disclosed a suffering Messiah, and they looked only for a world-conquering and long-reigning king. Reading about this patiently suffering Servant of God, his heart is moved. He has heard no Jewish interpretation, and yet wishes to know to whom this sad story refers. A tradition of the Jews described the persecution of Isaiah, and his death by being sawn asunder. Is it then himself to whom the prophet refers, or some other man?

No better text for his one great theme could Philip desire. From it he began, and preached unto him Jesus. Jesus the suffering Lamb of God, taking away the sins of men. Not as fully as Christ upon his resurrection afternoon had expounded to the two disciples, on another road, all "the things concerning himself." But, led by the Spirit, his words were satisfactory to this open-hearted, devout listener. He answered all the questions that were proposed, and at length the man's mind was convinced that Christ was the Son of God, the Saviour of the world, and his heart converted. There remained but one thing: avowedly to join himself to the company of Christian believers.

36-38. The Baptism of the Believer in Christ.—The Scripture has doubtless been explained by Philip in accordance with the direct command of Christ. So the newly converted man expresses his wish, and avows his purpose to stand openly on the Lord's side, in the question, "What doth hinder me to be baptized?" If the reply of Philip belongs to the inspired account (v. 37), which is more than doubtful, it would seem that he had learned caution from Simon's case. For he asks a heart-test of the man's faith. Satisfied with the test, Philip descends with him to the water, and baptized him there. B.

39, 40. These two were brought together by the agency of an angel, and now they are parted asunder by a miracle, but a miracle of wisdom as well as of power. For this sudden and supernatural removal of the preacher was a powerful confirmation of the doctrine which he taught, and had an obvious tendency to impress on the mind of the new convert this important truth, that although a man had been employed as the instrument of his conversion, yet the work itself was truly divine, and the glory of it due to God alone. R. W.—They met and parted in a few hours. But those hours were charged with experiences for ever memorable to both. As there had been great joy in the city upon Philip's ministry there, so now the Christian eunuch goes on his way rejoicing, when his human guide had disappeared. For a divine companion, a perfect guide unto all truth, even the Holy Ghost who shows the things of Christ, is with him now. And Abyssinia traces to this man (Indich he is called) the source of that influence which made many of her people Christian in name.

Philip was next heard of at Azotus or Ashdod, another of the five cities of the Philistines, north of Gaza. From that point he preached in all the cities on or near the sea-coast, including Lydda and Joppa, until he reached Cesarea. In Cesarea he made his home, and became an evangelist for that region. Here, twenty years afterward, he entertained Paul as his guest (Acts 21 : 8).

Truths worthy of Thought.—Every saved soul, in the history to be read hereafter, will learn that a vast amount of labor and an accumulation of combined influences were expended by God in the saving. First, chief, and in all, the Holy Spirit; then the word and the providences of God; and in a place appointed, the human teacher and pleader.

Another truth respects the actual work of the Holy Spirit in behalf of human conversion. On the one hand, every believer—preacher, parent, teacher, or simple disciple—just in proportion to the willingness and earnestness of his desire to do good, is especially prompted, guided, and enabled to speak or act effectively for Christ and for souls. And on the other hand, every unbeliever receives the same divine help, in proportion to his simple willingness to be taught and led of God. This double truth stands out in this incident: the entire control of all its details and issues, of its two characters and their actions by the Spirit of God. Let this be thoroughly pondered! B.

THE preaching of the gospel, begun from Jerusalem according to Christ's command, had embraced all classes of the Jewish name—the pure Jews and the despised Samaritans, the representatives of the dispersion, and the circumcised proselyte from the far southern region which Christ himself had called the ends of the earth. Such were the results accomplished about the epoch marked by the death of the Emperor Tiberius (A. D. 37), and distinguished also by the disgrace of Caiaphas and Pilate, the two chief actors in the death of Christ. S.

Acts ix. 1-19.

- 1 AND Saul, yet breathing out threatenings and slaughter against the disciples of the Lord,
- 2 went unto the high priest, and desired of him letters to Damascus to the synagogues, that if he found any of this way, whether they were men or women, he might bring them bound
- 3 unto Jerusalem. And as he journeyed, he came near Damascus: and suddenly there shined
- 4 round about him a light from heaven: and he fell to the earth, and heard a voice saying

5 unto him, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? And he said, Who art thou, Lord? And the Lord said, I am Jesus whom thou persecutest : it is hard for thee to kick against the 6 pricks. And he trembling and astonished said, Lord, what wilt thou have me to do? And the Lord said unto him, Arise, and go into the city, and it shall be told thee what thou 7 must do. And the men which journeyed with him stood speechless, hearing a voice, but 8 seeing no man. And Saul arose from the earth; and when his eyes were opened, he saw 9 no man : but they led him by the hand, and brought him into Damascus. And he was three days without sight, and neither did eat nor drink.

10 And there was a certain disciple at Damascus, named Ananias; and to him said the Lord
11 in a vision, Ananias. And he said, Behold, I am here, Lord. And the Lord said unto him, Arise, and go into the street which is called Straight, and enquire in the house of Judas for 12 one called Saul, of Tarsus: for, behold, he prayeth, and hath seen in a vision a man named 13 Ananias coming in, and putting his hand on him, that he might receive his sight. Then Ananias answered, Lord, I have heard by many of this man, how much evil he hath done 14 to thy saints at Jerusalem: and here he hath authority from the chief priests to bind all 15 that call on thy name. But the Lord said unto him, Go thy way: for he is a chosen vessel
16 unto me, to bear my name before the Gentiles, and kings, and the children of Israel: for I 17 will shew him how great things he must suffer for my name's sake. And Ananias went his way, and entered into the house; and putting his hands on him said, Brother Saul, the Lord, even Jesus, that appeared unto thee in the way as thou camest, hath sent me, that 18 thou mightest receive thy sight, and be filled with the Holy Ghost. And immediately there fell from his eyes as it had been scales: and he received sight forthwith, and arose, 19 and was baptized. And when he had received meat, he was strengthened.

EVERY great truth which is to win a triumphant way must become incarnate in some one man, and derive from a living, fervent heart that passion and power which constrain and subdue. So long as it remains in the cold region of mere ideas, it exercises no mighty influence over mankind. The truths of religion are not exceptions to this law. God, therefore, prepared a man, who was to represent in the primitive Church the great cause of the emancipation of Christianity, and whose mission it was to free it completely from the bonds of the synagogue. This man was Paul, and never had noble truth a nobler organ. He brought to its service an heroic heart, in which fervent love was joined to indomitable courage, and a mind equally able to rise to the loftiest heights of speculation, and to penetrate into the deepest recesses of the human soul. All these great qualities were enhanced by absolute devotedness to Jesus Christ, and a self-abnegation such as, apart from the sacrifice of the Redeemer, has had no parallel upon earth. His life was one perpetual offering up of himself. His sufferings have contributed no less than his indefatigable activity to the triumph of his principles. De P.

By faith, Saul of Tarsus, journeying toward Damascus, exchanged the path of persecution for that of martyrdom. By faith, Saul filled the known world with the name of Jesus Christ, and did a work which no other human work has equaled, either in extent or in depth. By faith, Saul, victorious over a rebellious nature, attained to a height of Christian life which would have been judged above man, if it had not been realized in his history. "Go, and do likewise." It is not a question of strength—it is a question of faith. Monod.

TARSUS of Cilicia, where Saul was born, was a city of wealth and culture. The education he received there was perfected at Jerusalem under the instruction of the greatest teacher of his time, the Rabban Gamaliel. What Saul became as a scholar, and with what fine fiber of heart and large capacity of intellect he was naturally gifted, we readily gather from his inspired letters. B.—Saul was born and spent his earliest days in the shelter of a home which was Hebrew, not in name only but in spirit. He grew up an Israelitish boy, nurtured in those histories of the chosen people which he was destined so often to repeat in the synagogues, with the new and wonderful commentary supplied by the life and resurrection of a crucified Messiah. The histories of Abraham and Isaac, of Jacob and his twelve sons, of Moses, Joshua and Samuel, Elijah, Daniel and the Maccabees, were the stories of his childhood. The destruction of Pharaoh in the Red Sea, the thunders of Mount Sinai, the dreary journeys in the wilderness, the land that flowed with milk and honey—this was the earliest imagery presented to his opening mind. The triumphant songs of Zion, the lamentations by the waters of Babylon, the prophetic praises of the Messiah, were the songs around his cradle. Above all, he would be familiar with the destinies of his own illustrious tribe. How little was it imagined that, as Benjamin was the youngest and most honored of the patriarchs, so this listening child of Benjamin should be associated with the twelve servants of the Messiah of God, the last and most illustrious of the apostles! H.

1, 2. Saul's Self-moved Mission to persecute the Christians of Damascus.—This abrupt introduction of Saul is deeply stirring and suggestive. Here is a man of intense energy with a soul on fire with a purpose of serving God in the only way he knew, by destroying those whom he thought were overthrowing religion. Even then, as a persecutor, Saul boldly acted out his belief. And with what depth of passion is evident from these words, "breathing out slaughter," and from his own after statement, "I was exceedingly mad against them." B.—The position of Saul at the death of Stephen was due, not to natural cruelty, but to a perverted judgment. He thought he did God service by slaying the disciples of Christ. At this time his belief was that Stephen's doctrines were subversive of the true religion; and that the best way of checking a heresy was to put the heretics to death. These principles did not die out with the conversion of Saul. They survived, and deluged Europe with blood down to a very recent period. It is only now, in our own generation, that religious toleration has been established. Arnot.

2. The authority of the Sanhedrim of Jerusalem was very great, so that not only the Jews who inhabited the land of Israel, but the Babylonian and Alexandrian Jews, received its decrees, and obeyed them with reverence. They acknowledged the Sanhedrim as the bulwark of the oral law. They more especially submitted to its authority in accusations of heresy, and trial of false prophets, which the Sanhedrim alone was supposed competent to consider. The Romans, to whose power the whole of Arabia at this time submitted, granted to the Jewish council the power of imprisonment and scourging, not only over the Jews of Palestine, but over other synagogues, which willingly, in religious matters, yielded to the control of the Sanhedrim. G. T.

3-7. The conversion of Saul was like the call of a second Abraham. H.—It was the most striking and important individual conversion between Christ's ascension and his return to judge the world. In its results, direct and indirect, it is the largest single fruit that has yet been gathered from the tree of righteousness that the Lord by his death and resurrection planted in the world. No mere man, before or since, has filled so great a space in the scheme of Providence, or left his mark so wide and deep upon the world. The gospel is the greatest power that has ever operated on earth, and Paul was its greatest minister. Arnot.

Eastern Seaboard of the Mediterranean. (The position of the several places named should be carefully noted.)

3. Damascus is the oldest city in the world. Its fame begins with the earliest patriarchs, and continues to modern times. It was founded before Baalbec and Palmyra, and it has outlived them both. While Babylon is a heap in the desert, and Tyre a ruin on the shore, it remains what it is called in the prophecies of Isaiah, "the head of Syria." How important a place it was in the flourishing period of the Jewish monarchy, we know from the garrisons which David placed there, and from the opposition it presented to Solomon. And how close its relations continued to be with the Jews, we know from the chronicles of Jeroboam and Ahaz, and the prophecies of Isaiah and Amos. Its mercantile greatness is indicated by Ezekiel in the remarkable words addressed to Tyre—"Damascus was thy merchant in the multitude of the wares of thy making, for the multitude of all riches; in the wine of Helbon, and white wool." Leaving the Jewish annals, we might follow its history through continuous centuries, from the time when Alexander sent Parmenio to take it, while the conqueror himself was marching from Tarsus to Tyre—to its occupation by Pompey—to the letters of Julian the Apostate, who describes it as "the eye of the East"—and onward through its golden days, when it was the residence of the Omniad caliphs, and the metropolis of the Mohammedan world—and through the period when its fame was mingled with that of Saladin and Tamerlane—to our own days, when the praise of its beauty is celebrated by every traveler from Europe. H.

Saul's journey of five or six days (140 miles) was nearly completed. Damascus, the queen city of the East, beautifully situated upon a fertile plain, between two broad streams rushing down from the foot of Hermon and the anti-Lebanon mountains, was now close at hand, perhaps visible in the distance. The anticipation of success and triumph in his persecuting work was in his heart as he pressed eagerly on. Suddenly his career was checked by a blinding light from heaven. B.—The light was that which the Jews called the Shechinah, or glorious presence of Jehovah, dwelling in the tabernacle—the divine indwelling majesty. It was the very light, the sacred light, which their fathers knew so well. It appeared at sundry times, and in diverse forms, for various purposes; now of mercy, now of judgment. It was this light that blazed out in the flaming sword; that appeared to Abraham in Ur of the Chaldees; that was seen by Moses in the burning bush; that shone out in the pillar of fire, and compassed the top of Sinai; that dwelt in the tabernacle and in the temple; that showed itself to Gideon's father; that kindled the fire on Solomon's altar; that was seen by Ezekiel departing, and by Daniel in his visions; that for four hundred years left the earth, but reappeared at Bethlehem to the shepherds and to the wise men; at Christ's baptism; at the transfiguration; at Pentecost; at Stephen's martyrdom; and now at Saul's conversion; and afterward at Patmos. Such is the history of this wondrous light—the representation of Him who is light, and in whom is no darkness at all; of Him who is the light of the world; of Him who is the brightness of Jehovah's glory. The history of that light is the Christology of Scripture. Bonar.

As he was stricken to the earth, a voice distinctly articulates the question, "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" In the double address, as also used by Christ to Martha and Simon, is designed both accusation and tender remonstrance; first (always) a convincing of sin, and then a gracious pity. Saul's thought was of binding and punishing Christ's disciples, and so doing service to God. Christ calls it persecution. And he identifies himself completely with these imperiled persecuted disciples: Why persecutest thou Me? In the thou, Christ further emphasizes Saul's self-prompting in his cruel work. Then in answer to the question of the prostrate but uplooking man, "Who art thou Lord?" comes a repetition of the charge: I am Jesus of Nazareth whom thou persecutest! Here, too, again Christ identifies his suffering members with himself. And in a figure that was proverbial he counsels Saul against a vain and a hurtful resistance.

These first words of Jesus were not merely enough to convince Saul of sin and draw his faith to Christ, revealed here as Jehovah through the known Shechinah, a symbol of dazzling light. This we know they did effect, and this was Saul's conversion. It was wrought as all other conversions are wrought, through truth convincing the conscience of sin and through the revelation of Christ as a divine Redeemer. It differed from others in the personal, visible manifestation of Christ. The transfigured God-man Saul saw, even as Peter and James and John had seen him "in the holy mount," and as Stephen had seen him through the opened heavens. So Paul distinctly affirms.

But these first words of Christ did more than convert. They were imprinted so deeply upon Saul's very heart that they shaped all his after thought and teaching. A deep intense conviction of sin as unbelief in and rejection of Christ; an overwhelming conception of the inconceivable breadth and depth of the grace of Christ in saving and seeking; and a realization of Christ's identity with his disciples, especially of his living present sympathy with them in suffering—these great fundamental truths, rooted in the soul of Saul in this personal interview with Christ, form the staple and substance of his preaching and his epistles. Ofttimes he refers to this first experience as the source of his knowledge.

That he is already converted, that his strong will is subdued, voluntarily subjected to the will of Christ, that his heart is humbled, utterly turned from persecution to devotion, that he is henceforth consecrated to Christ and to Christ's service, his answering question assures us: Lord, what wilt thou have me to do? His question is a new request for another commission, for one directly opposed in its spirit and object to that which had sent him thus far on his journey. And this request is answered with a direction to arise and go into the city (Damascus). There he would receive instruction what to do. Thus far no human instrumentality had been employed. Saul had been apprehended, as he calls it (Phil. 3), grasped and taken possession of by Christ. For this end, too, all that was supernatural was wrought by Christ. But he was not disobedient to the heavenly vision! B.

8. Thus entered Saul into Damascus; not, as he had expected, to triumph in an enterprise on which his soul was set, to enter into houses and carry off prisoners to Jerusalem; but he passed himself like a prisoner beneath the gateway and through the street called "Straight," where he was led by the hands of others to the house of Judas, his dark and solitary lodging. H.

9. The Three Days of Blindness and Fasting.—A period and an experience of inestimable value. Without sight and food, the world shut out from every sense, that the spirit may have undisturbed communion with itself and with God. Thought upon his own previous life, upon the Old Testament disclosures of Messiah, upon the glowing words, the saintly spirit, and the glad sacrifice of Stephen, and thought upon his own part in that sacrifice. And now the Christ of Nazareth, seen by him as by Stephen, as the God of glory, had come into his heart. The Spirit of Christ was opening his understanding and inspiring his soul to fervent trustful communion with God in supplication and praise. So passed those days of thought, of confirmed convictions and purposes, of grateful adoration, of penitent joy, and of earnest yearning and pleading with God—days of special divine inworking and preparation for the work before him.

10-16. Christ sends Ananias to Saul.—A human instrumentality is now employed for Saul's further instruction and reception into Christian fellowship and ministry. The agent is an obscure disciple, unknown before and after this transaction. But he is supernaturally directed, and Saul supernaturally prepared to receive him, showing that Christ controls all human ministry. In the vision Christ directs Ananias to go to Saul, plainly intimating the change wrought in this persecutor by the words, "For, behold, he prayeth!" But, with the knowledge of Saul's slaughter of the saints in Jerusalem, and of his purpose in coming to Damascus, and otherwise ignorant of what had occurred to Saul, the faith of Ananias is not equal to so sudden and strong a demand. Frankly he tells his difficulty to the Lord, and without a word of reproach Christ removes it. "A chosen vessel is this intensely earnest enemy! He shall bear my name before kings and all peoples! For my name's sake he must suffer great things!" Yet Christ granted this sufferer, as since every sufferer for Him, to do great things also. B.

11. Behold, he prayeth. As he the Pharisee of Pharisees has never prayed before; he prays with the heart of a publican. Where prayer like this is uttered, a foe of Christ has been disarmed. Here is a light arisen for the blind, of which he had never dreamed when he sat at Gamaliel's feet; a light on the greatness of his own guilt, by which he, who had dreamed himself to be already on the summit of perfection, awakens on the brink of an abyss. But here, too, a thirsty soul is brought nigh to the spring of consolation, where refreshing is never sought in vain. Can we ever doubt again that in heaven an ear is opened to the prayer of penitence? Who has not, on the contemplation of the spiritual greatness of this Paul, trembled involuntarily in silent wonder? But the key to it all lies in the prayer-chamber at Damascus, whence he issued as one awakened to new life. When a sinner prays in this manner, a future song of praise is made certain. Happy is he who has learned to pray in such a manner that even in heaven it may be termed prayer, and who can declare, "To me is mercy shown!"

VAN O.

15. A chosen vessel. It was a polished and capacious vessel that the Great King wrenched from the hands of the arch-enemy near the gate of Damascus. One of the clearest intellects that ever glowed in a human frame changed hands that day. Saul was a man of rare courage. He was a good soldier of the wicked one before he owned allegiance to Christ. He was Christ's chief enemy then in the world. He breathed forth threatenings and slaughter against the members of the Church, blasphemies against its living Head. God looks down from heaven on this man, not as an adversary whose assaults are formidable, but as an instrument which may be turned to another use. As clay in the hands of the potter this man lies. Saul of Tarsus, called to be an apostle, is a conspicuous example of Divine sovereignty. He did not first choose Christ, but Christ chose him. Arnot.

17, 18. The Words of Ananias and the Result Wrought by the Holy Ghost.—Ananias at once obeys the heavenly vision, goes to the "street called Straight," enters the house of Judas and the chamber where Saul is lying, puts his hands upon those sightless eyes, and utters the message of Christ. Two things Ananias announces as the purpose of his mission, and connects with the laying on of his hands. One, the receiving again of bodily sight; the other, the being filled with the Holy Ghost. The latter, we have already learned, refers only to his extraordinary and miraculous gifts; for his quickening power had been already exercised at Saul's conversion. At once the darkness was exchanged for clear vision. Accepting the ordination and appointment of Christ, as duty and privilege, he formally joined himself to the living body of Christ, and by an ordinary believer was baptized. So the persecutor became a disciple and leader of the persecuted—the inveterate enemy a devoted adherent. And all without human agency. "An apostle," he said, "by the will of God, sent not from man nor by man, but by Jesus Christ."

The leading points of profitable thought are found mainly in the impressions left upon Paul's heart by this memorable experience of conversion, impressions elaborately inwrought in his inspired letters for the help and comfort of believers. First of all, the facts of sin and grace, imprinted upon his soul by the question and responses of Christ, sin, as unbelief in Christ, and grace, Christ's compassionate seeking and saving the guilty, these are the truths which comprise the substance of the gospel. Next, Christ's absolute identification of his people with himself. His constant vision of every believer, and instant sympathy with every need and trial. With inimitable tenderness the words "I am Jesus whom thou persecutest!" respond to the whole spirit of his last discourse and prayer. They prove, by fact, his oneness with his own after he had passed into the heavens! Again, suffering, in some form, is a vital part of the highest training for effective service. Saul's experience and teaching abundantly declare that the faithful follower must, like the Master, be "made perfect through suffering."

Another expression of Christ concerning Saul, a chosen vessel, the apostle dilates upon, in its twofold meaning, as applicable to all believers. Vessels for use—of varying capacity—that can only give of that which is first received; empty and useless unless filled by the grace of God, but, when thus supplied, made sources of blessing to others to the praise of God. And chosen—"elect of God and precious." Signally as this truth of God's choice is proven in Saul's conversion, as certainly is it proven by the experience of every true believer. And the teaching of this sustaining truth Paul expressly and only addresses to the believer, since the believer alone can fully and joyfully accept it. Yet another theme, in its grandeur of reality, was impressed indelibly upon his heart. It was the glory of the risen Christ. A living, glorified, Divine Saviour, who was and is Jesus of Nazareth! Glorifying in the Cross because of the redemption wrought upon it, he glories, ever in a higher strain of rapture, in Jesus, the man of Nazareth, effulgent with light celestial and majesty Divine! B.

Section 205.

Acts ix. 19–30.

19 THEN was Saul certain days with the disciples which were at Damascus. And straight-20 way he preached Christ in the synagogues, that he is the Son of God. But all that heard 21 him were amazed, and said; Is not this he that destroyed them which called on this name in Jerusalem, and came hither for that intent, that he might bring them bound unto the chief priests? But Saul increased the more in strength, and confounded the Jews which dwelt at Damascus, proving that this is very Christ.

23 And after that many days were fulfilled, the Jews took counsel to kill him : but their laying 24 await was known of Saul. And they watched the gates day and night to kill him. Then the 25 disciples took him by night, and let him down by the wall in a basket. And when Saul
26 was come to Jerusalem, he assayed to join himself to the disciples : but they were all afraid 27 of him, and believed not that he was a disciple. But Barnabas took him, and brought him to the apostles, and declared unto them how he had seen the Lord in the way, and that he had spoken to him, and how he had preached boldly at Damascus in the name of Jesus.
28 And he was with them coming in and going out at Jerusalem. And he spake boldly in the 29 name of the Lord Jesus, and disputed against the Grecians : but they went about to slay 30 him. Which when the brethren knew, they brought him down to Cæsarea, and sent him forth to Tarsus.

In the fusing of Christianity and Judaism, what and who is needed ? The man must be a pure Jew by birth, and by education imbued with the fullest and deepest knowledge both of the law itself and of that fabric of human traditional interpretation which the rabbis had built up around it. No less necessary is it that he should have been versed in the Greek tongue, which was then the universal vehicle of thought and argument ; should have been trained in Gentile habits of joining thought to thought ; and should have acquired that degree of acquaintance with heathen literature which might enable him to dispute with effect in Grecian schools and among Grecian audiences. These qualifications were united in Saul of Tarsus. And his personal qualifications were to the full as marvelous. Ardent, sympathetic, universal in his regards, and able to cast himself into every other man's position ; within certain limits becoming all things to all men, but absolutely immovable as to compromise beyond these limits ; carrying all in his heart, and making every man's griefs and joys his own ; with tears for every sorrow, and glowing terms of endearment and congratulation ever on his tongue ; master at the same time of the most melting exhortation and the keenest and most delicate irony ; pouring out his words, which crowded one another to keep pace with the rapidity of his phases of thought, flying from proof to proof, and from one indignant refutation to another ; sometimes seemingly forgetful of his main subject, while he pursues word after word which have sprung up along the path of his disputation, then returning to it again, in like manner again to desert it : till at last all these off-lying ideas and images and allusions are bound up together in the majestic and overwhelming conclusion. Such was the mind and such was the heart of which God made choice, to bring about the greatest revolution ever wrought in the history of man. A.

19-22. Saul straightway preaches Christ to the Amazed Jews.—His obedience to the heavenly vision was instant, unquestioning, and whole-hearted. No thought had he of looking back, and none of measuring hindrances or of forecasting difficulties in his forward path. At the outset his conviction was as clear and decisive as it was intense and deep ; and it remained unchanged to the end. And his courage was that of conviction, not of mere nerve or will. This bold fronting of danger for the preaching of Christ was first manifested now, and to his old associates. He had led them in their hatred and persecution of Christ and his disciples—now he would turn them, with himself, to the service of his revealed Lord. The same Saul, with aim and object of life reversed, he throws the same intensity into his new mission of love. As one who has seen the Lord, whose soul is taken captive by the Lord's grace to him, as one who believes, he must speak. He must bear testimony at least, that may help to counteract the evil he had done. No wonder that his former associates were amazed at the extreme change produced in him. They saw it was real, and felt that an incomprehensible power had wrought it. His honest consecration had a life and energy which contrasted with their formal and lifeless religion. B.

That the bigoted persecutor, at the climax of honor with his own nation, and in the full career of success, should have suddenly cast in his lot with the Christians, and entered on the new course of self-sacrificing labor and suffering which made up the rest of his life, has often been esteemed of itself a complete evidence of the truth of Christianity. S. —Next to the resurrection of Jesus Christ and the descent of the Holy Ghost, the gospel history has no testimony which equals the conversion of Saul of Tarsus. It has been felt in all ages ; and many a reflective mind, hitherto unmoved, has yielded to the power of this page of the gospel. Monod.

23. Interval of Special Preparation in Arabia, and Return to Damascus.—His spontaneous testimony borne for Christ, after brief stay—certain days, verse 19—he tells us (Gal. 1 : 17) that he went into Arabia and returned again to Damascus. The interval spent in Arabia comprised nearly the whole of the three years (Gal. 1 : 18) between his conversion and his first visit to Jerusalem. This interval is indicated in verse 23 by many or sufficient days. B.—As used by Paul (Gal. 1 : 17), Arabia does not necessarily mean the wilderness of Arabia, commonly so called. Early Christian writers assign Damascus itself to Arabia; and the region of Auranitis, on the south of Damascus, is reckoned by Roman writers as belonging to Arabia. Luke passes over an interval of three years. And it is observable that “many days” are equivalent to three years in 1. K. 2 : 38. W.

Windows on the Wall—Damascus.

Like Moses and Elijah, he seems to have been led into the quiet of the wilderness for a period of needful thought and prayer. Thought upon the Old Testament Scriptures in their new light, upon his own previous career, upon the heavenly vision, the Christ of prophecy now disclosed to him in the person of Jesus of Nazareth; and prayer for guidance, for qualification to serve and teach, for needed inward discipline and training of spirit to do and bear. And gradually, as others are, was he guided by the Holy Spirit into truth. Not by any direct or independent revelation, but in connection with the studied Scriptures and the known facts of Christ's incarnate career. Visions indeed he had, at intervals and in emergencies of his after-life. But here he was led to the right apprehension and full meaning of the written word, and of the teachings of Christ. The Spirit took of the things of Christ and showed them unto him. Yet let it be remembered that to the three days of blindness, and the three years of thoughtful study and prayer, five years of practice are added before he is fully charged with his great commission. God takes time to prepare those whom he specially employs.

23-25. Saul's Escape from Damascus.—Returned again, he goes straightway to the synagogue. With even stronger faith and zeal, as his views of truth were wider, his skill in argument and force of statement were such that his old opponents could not meet or refute his teachings. And, since he thoroughly knew them and their views, his refutation of their errors would be especially pointed and effective. Naturally, therefore, Saul's former associates became his most implacable foes. They conspired with the governor of Damascus to kill him (2 Cor. 11 : 32, 33). But, from the overhanging window of a house upon an unguarded part of the wall, the disciples let him down into the open country, and he made good his first escape from persecuting Jews. The Lord has already begun to show him how great things he must suffer.

26-29. Brief Visit and Ministry at Jerusalem.—Paul's own account of this visit we find in Gal. 1 : 11–18. His chief motive was to see Peter and James. But even these leaders of the apostles (and he sought and saw none besides these two) doubted his sincerity. They would not receive him until Barnabas—who was from Cyprus, not far from Tarsus—who had learned the facts of Saul's conversion, probably from himself, took the new convert to the two, and told them his marvelous story. For only fifteen days the three remained together. B.

The first meeting of the fisherman of Galilee and the tent-maker of Tarsus, the chosen companion of Jesus on earth and the chosen Pharisee who saw Jesus in the heavens, the apostle of the circumcision and the apostle of the Gentiles, is passed over in Scripture in a few words. The divine record does not linger in dramatic description on those passages, which a mere human writing would labor to embellish. What took place in the intercourse of these two saints, what was said of Jesus of Nazareth, who suffered, died, and was buried, and of Jesus, the glorified Lord, who had risen and ascended, and become “Head over all things to the Church,” what was felt of Christian love and devotion, what was learned under the Spirit's teaching of Christian truth, has not been revealed and can not be known. H.

Boldly and effectively he proved his divine mission in presence of these veteran apostles. Boldly he entered the very synagogue of the Grecians where Stephen had taught, and effectively preached the same Jesus of Nazareth, conclusively refuting all opposing argument. And again, as their only way of silencing, they seek to slay him!

counsel of the two apostles, but a positive command of Christ (Acts 22 : 18-21), led Saul to leave Jerusalem and go to his own home. Another long interval in Saul's history here occurs, during which we only know that he remained in comparative retirement, preaching simply as other disciples did, without special appointment or formal ordination, as occasion called or the leading of the Spirit prompted. B.

The early chapters of the Acts are like the narratives in the Gospels. It is often hardly possible to learn how far the events related were contemporary or consecutive. It is impossible to determine the relations of time which subsist between Paul's retirement into Arabia and Peter's visit to the converted Samaritans, or between the journey of one apostle from Joppa to Cesarea and the journey of the other from Jerusalem to Tarsus. H.—The interval of uncertain length, which he spent in Cilicia and Syria, after his flight from Jerusalem to Tarsus, is a blank in the story of the Acts; but some refer to this period the chief part at least of the perils and sufferings which he recounts to the Corinthians, including two Roman and five Jewish scourgings and three shipwrecks. At all events, we may safely regard this as the great probationary period of the apostle's ministry, in which, laboring alone and unaided by man, he was specially prepared for the wide field to which he was called when Barnabas came to Tarsus to seek his aid for the work at Antioch. S.

ACTS ix. 31-43.

31 THEN had the churches rest throughout all Judæa and Galilee and Samaria, and were edified; and walking in the fear of the Lord, and in the comfort of the Holy Ghost, were multiplied.

32 And it came to pass, as Peter passed throughout all quarters, he came down also to the 33 saints which dwelt at Lydda. And there he found a certain man named Æneas, which had 34 kept his bed eight years, and was sick of the palsy. And Peter said unto him, Æneas, Jesus

35 Christ maketh thee whole : arise, and make thy bed. And he arose immediately. And all that dwelt at Lydda and Saron saw him, and turned to the Lord.

36 Now there was at Joppa a certain disciple named Tabitha, which by interpretation is 37 called Dorcas : this woman was full of good works and almsdeeds which she did. And it came to pass in those days, that she was sick, and died : whom when they had washed, they 38 laid her in an upper chamber. And forasmuch as Lydda was nigh to Joppa, and the disciples had heard that Peter was there, they sent unto him two men, desiring him that he 39 would not delay to come to them. Then Peter arose and went with them. When he was come, they brought him into the upper chamber : and all the widows stood by him weeping, 40 and shewing the coats and garments which Dorcas made, while she was with them. But Peter put them all forth, and kneeled down, and prayed ; and turning him to the body said, 41 Tabitha, arise. And she opened her eyes : and when she saw Peter, she sat up. And he gave her his hand, and lifted her up, and when he had called the saints and widows, 42 presented her alive. And it was known throughout all Joppa ; and many believed in the 43 Lord. And it came to pass, that he tarried many days in Joppa with one Simon a tanner.

“ТАБИТНА was not a fashion-plate, but a model for every Christian female.” She “looked also on the things of others,” helped to bear the burdens of others, and “so fulfilled the law of Christ.” Her methods were appropriate and womanly, as her spirit was Christlike. By this record not only, but by manifold organizations and bands that have wrought a similar work of love in every Christian age and nation, Dorcas being dead hath spoken and yet speaketh. She is one of three women (Mk. 12 : 44 ; 14 : 9) whose self-consecration was shown in their gifts and deeds, and whose memorial and eulogy have gone wheresoever the gospel has been preached. B.

Dorcas died regretted ; she was worth regretting, she was worth being restored, she had not lived in vain because she had not lived for herself. The end of life is not a thought, but an action—action for others. But you, why should you be regretted ? Have you discovered spiritual truth like Paul ? Have you been brave and true in defending it, like Peter ; or cheered desolate hearts, like Ananias ; or visited the widow and the fatherless in their affliction, like Dorcas ? If you have, your life will leave a trace which will not soon be effaced from the earth. But, if not, what is your worthless self-absorbed existence good for but to be swept away and forgotten as soon as possible ? You will leave no record of yourself on earth except a date of birth and a date of death, with an awfully significant blank between. F. W. R.

31. The Upbuilding and Increase of the Church in the Three Provinces.—This verse is a point of transition in the history. After brief statement of Saul’s conversion and early ministry, Luke’s narrative returns for two or three chapters to further incidents in Peter’s career. No points of time are given in either case, as they were not needful to the purpose of the revelation. This purpose (and it should be carefully noted) was to show, by these few specific incidents, in what manner, and how rapidly and widely, the gospel was carried through the land, how effectively it was preached, and with what wonderful results in the conversion of men and the formation of churches. Many “had gone everywhere preaching the word,” and founding communities of believers. So we find churches in Judea, Samaria, and even in far Galilee—this in spite of persecution, and as its indirect effect in scattering abroad disciples filled with the Holy Ghost.

The “rest,” or interval of freedom from persecution, here referred to, grew out of an intense excitement, which for a considerable period absorbed the whole thought of the Jewish rulers and people. B.—About this time a more urgent and immediate danger than the progress of Christianity occupied the mind of the Jewish people. The very existence of their religion was threatened, for the frantic Caligula had issued orders to place his statue in the Temple at Jerusalem. The historian of the Jews must relate the negotiations, the petitions, the artful and humane delays interposed by the prefect Petronius, and all the incidents which show how deeply and universally the nation was absorbed by this appalling subject. It caused, no doubt, a diversion in favor of the Christians ; and the temporary peace enjoyed by the churches is attributed, with great probability, rather to the fears of the Jews for their own religious independence, than to the relaxation of their hostility against the Christians. This peace was not disturbed for about three years. The apostles pursued their office of disseminating the gospel in every part of Judea until Herod Agrippa took possession of the hereditary dominions. Milman.

And so, through the providence of God, his people had needed quiet. The result of quiet is twofold. They were edified, or built up; referring to the inward life, not the outward organization. Advanced and strengthened internally, they made progress in spiritual life and its fruits. And they were multiplied, increased in the number of the saved. Mark the conditions of this increase! The walking, or going on and forward, actively meeting daily duties. Walking in the fear of the Lord, with filial reverence and obedience at heart. And walking in the comfort of the Holy Ghost, in the soul's resting upon the helpful interposition of the Holy Spirit at every needful point—this is the meaning of “comfort,” as it is of “comforter” (the same word), applied by Christ to the Holy Ghost. These conditions fulfilled, inwardly strengthen, advance, and make fruitful the Church; they increase the vital force, they expand the graces, and make larger and richer the fruitage of the believer's life.

32-35. The Miraculous Healing of Eneas at Lydda, and its Blessed Results.—Peter's visit at Lydda and stay at Joppa (see map, p. 61) probably occurred while Saul was at Tarsus. Nothing like apostolic circuits or visitations seems to be even hinted at in the Acts until we reach Paul's history, and that is purely exceptional in this matter, growing out of his exclusive appointment and work as the apostle to the Gentiles. As a body the apostles remained at Jerusalem controlling and guiding the general movements of the new Christian body or church. So Christ had ordained. But individual apostles, like other individual disciples, went as they were called by the Holy Ghost, upon specific missions. In such a mission Peter was now engaged, and in his journeying arrives at Lydda, an inland village a few (six) miles from Joppa. There he seeks the saints—a Scriptural term, and therefore a proper one if properly employed—signifying the holy; and descriptive of believers, all of whom are called to be saints.

Among them—the connection implies—he finds a man for eight years crippled with palsy. There is here no testing or prompting of faith, as in the case of unbelievers, by question or address (Acts 3 : 4). But, addressing him as one who already believes, he simply announces a gracious, joyful fact: Jesus Christ maketh thee whole! For proof of this, the command is added: “Arise, and make thy bed.” The doing for himself what for eight years had been done for him was conclusive evidence that his infirmity was gone and his strength restored.

The widespread results of this miraculous healing furnish yet further verification of Christ's words (John 14 : 12), that greater works than His should be done in his name. Not only in Lydda, but over the broad, fertile, and beautiful plain of Sharon—reaching from Cesarea to Joppa—the tidings of the cure and the name of Jesus the healer were spread by grateful believing disciples, and many of the multitudes that dwelt in that vast region received Christ and were enrolled as his disciples.

36-42. The Character, Death, and raising to Life of Dorcas, and the Result wrought in Joppa.—Joppa (“beautiful”), on a high hill of the Mediterranean coast, distant forty miles from Jerusalem, was its seaport from the time of Solomon. This disciple of Christlike spirit was called Tabitha in the Aramaic tongue, used by the Jews, and Dorcas by the Greeks. The name signifies “gazelle,” and, as an image of peculiar attractiveness, was often appropriated as a proper name for females.

Though nothing is said of her faith, she had faith, for she was a true disciple. More and better, she proved faith's possession by its works. Her life was actively employed in helping disciples and others. She wrought with her hands, and gave from her store for the supply of poor and needy; especially for widows, who in that period and country were in peculiar need. That her motive was utterly single and unselfish, we know from the common high sentiment concerning her. When she died, this sentiment was at once manifest. All the Christian fellowship was moved to the deepest grief. In their yearning for comfort, and if possible for help in some unknown way from God, they instantly send to Peter, six miles off, asking that he hasten to do what he can in their grief and need. As they desired, Peter came at once, arriving before the interment, which ordinarily takes place on the day of death in the East.

The body lay in an upper chamber, and was surrounded by "saints and widows," that is, by fellow disciples and by those she had helped. With a natural and tender touch, Luke tells how these grieving but grateful beneficiaries recited her memorial. But Peter puts them all forth. He would be alone with God, especially when he had so great a request to urge, so mighty a boon to obtain. Kneeling down, he prayed! The spirit of the prayer, its intense fervor and its energy of faith, and the motive which he urged, the greater glory of Christ, we may know by the assurance given to Peter by the Holy Ghost—that inward assurance by which he was prompted to say, "Tabitha, arise." His faith was in the divine power, and his word was guided by the divine spirit. In response to his faith, immediately upon the utterance of his word, "she opened her eyes," and her spirit came again. To those who mourned her dead, "saints and widows, he presented her alive." And joy takes the place of mourning. In all this, not Peter, but Peter's Lord, is glorified. Therefore it was that, when the people of Joppa heard of this restored life of Dorcas, many heeded the preaching of Jesus the Restorer, and believed in him unto a higher, even an everlasting life.

43. Simon Peter tarries in the House of the Tanner Simon.—"Many days," indicating a sufficient period for the work to be done, in connection with his stay there. The tanner's business—that of preparing skins for different uses—was an unclean one, and therefore dishonorable in Jewish estimation, because it required contact with dead animals. But Peter's Judaism is already so much modified, and his apprehension of Christ's exposures of Pharisaic interpretation so clear, that he is willing to risk the uncleanness and the dishonor, by sharing the home and table of his namesake, the hospitable Christian tanner. B.

Section 207.

ACTS x. 1-23.

1 THERE was a certain man in Cæsarea called Cornelius, a centurion of the band called the 2 Italian band, a devout man, and one that feared God with all his house, which gave much 3 alms to the people, and prayed to God alway. He saw in a vision evidently about the 4 ninth hour of the day an angel of God coming in to him, and saying unto him, Cornelius.
5 And when he looked on him, he was afraid, and said, What is it, Lord? And he said unto 6 him, Thy prayers and thine alms are come up for a memorial before God. And now send 7 men to Joppa, and call for one Simon, whose surname is Peter: he lodgeth with one Simon

7 a tanner, whose house is by the sea side : he shall tell thee what thou oughtest to do. And when the angel which spake unto Cornelius was departed, he called two of his household
8 servants, and a devout soldier of them that waited on him continually ; and when he had declared all these things unto them, he sent them to Joppa.

9 On the morrow, as they went on their journey, and drew nigh unto the city, Peter went 10 up upon the housetop to pray about the sixth hour : and he became very hungry, and would 11 have eaten : but while they made ready, he fell into a trance, and saw heaven opened, and 12 a certain vessel descending unto him ; as it had been a great sheet knit at the four corners, 13 and let down to the earth : wherein were all manner of fourfooted beasts of the earth, and 14 wild beasts, and creeping things, and fowls of the air. And there came a voice to him, 15 Rise, Peter ; kill, and eat. But Peter said, Not so, Lord ; for I have never eaten anything 16 that is common or unclean. And the voice spake unto him again the second time, What 17 God hath cleansed, that call not thou common. This was done thrice : and the vessel was 18 received up again into heaven. Now while Peter doubted in himself what this vision which 19 he had seen should mean, behold, the men which were sent from Cornelius had made en-20 quiry for Simon's house, and stood before the gate, and called, and asked whether Simon, 21 which was surnamed Peter, were lodged there.

22 While Peter thought on the vision, the Spirit said unto him, Behold, three men seek thee.
23 Arise therefore, and get thee down, and go with them, doubting nothing : for I have sent 24 them. Then Peter went down to the men which were sent unto him from Cornelius ; and 25 said, Behold, I am he whom ye seek : what is the cause wherefore ye are come ? And they 26 said, Cornelius the centurion, a just man, and one that feareth God, and of good report
27 among all the nation of the Jews, was warned from God by an holy angel to send for thee 28 into his house, and to hear words of thee. Then called he them in, and lodged them. And 29 on the morrow Peter went away with them, and certain brethren from Joppa accompanied 30 him.

ALMS and prayers are branches from a common stem, which binds them together. That stem is the moral law of God ; that law to which, though it be not the covenant under which (as Christian men) we live, we must yet be conformed as a rule of life. The law branches out into two great precepts—supreme and unbounded love to God, and love to our neighbor as to ourselves. Now, the man who really and habitually prays, the man who lives in the spirit of prayer, fulfills the first great branch of duty. True spiritual prayer—"the effectual, fervent prayer of a righteous man," such as was that of Cornelius—is the outcome and expression of a man's duty to God. Such prayer is called in Scripture "incense"; partly from its reaching the throne of grace, even as incense when kindled soars up to the sky ; partly from its spiritual fragrance and acceptability. "Let my prayer be set forth in thy sight as the incense." And the man who gives alms, in the true spirit of almsgiving, is equally fulfilling the second great branch of duty. Devout almsgiving—such as was that of Cornelius, who "gave much alms to the people"—is the outcome and expression of a man's duty to his neighbor. Yet think not that the act passes no further than to our neighbor. It too, no less than prayer, comes up before God as a memorial. It too, no less than prayer, finds in the fragrant, soaring incense its Scriptural emblem and type. E. M. G.

Nor only was God's covenant made with the Jewish nation, not only did he intrust that nation with his word and ordinances of worship, not only was Christ a Jew, and as he affirmed, "salvation was of the Jews," but the first Christian disciples, and the entire membership of the first Christian Church up to this period, were members of the Jewish Church, by descent or adoption. They were all imbued with the prevalent Jewish belief, respecting the essential importance of the leading Mosaic rites. They were filled with the Jewish feeling of their immense superiority as God's people over all other nations. It seemed natural to them, therefore, when Christianity was to be introduced among the Gentiles (and they knew that all nations were to receive the gospel), that it should be introduced under Jewish auspices and in connection with long venerated Jewish forms. The apostles, with others, were still imbued with these conceits and prejudices.

Before God's work among the Gentiles can be begun, these teachers must be taught ; their narrow, erroneous notions removed. First and emphatically they must know that in Christ Jesus the Gentile is equal to, is one with the Jew : "a fellow-heir, of the same body, and partaker of the same promise by the gospel." And this is the lesson conveyed by the vision to Peter, the man strongest in feeling and prejudice, the foremost, most energetic, whole-souled in active obedience, among the body of apostles. More fully afterward, and frequently, the same needed lesson was taught.

It is conveyed to Peter in the first act of transition in the ministry of the gospel, from the Jew to the Gentile. A period this of marked significance, as a turning-point in the history of the Christian Church. And because so necessary, at this eminent juncture, to prepare the body of apostles and disciples for right ministry among the Gentiles, God added supernatural means to the natural. He connected a miraculous vision with many providences. As respects the latter, it is interesting to note how events are linked in with each other by God's plan and providence. Lydda was nigh to Joppa, so Peter was called from Lydda. Now, Joppa is so nigh to Cesarea that he is called from Joppa. Yet it is the Lord and the Lord's work that call. So God ever marshals providences in the way and for the discharge of our duty.

Another point worthy of note is the analogy between this bringing together of Peter and Cornelius and that of Saul and Ananias. Each was prefaced with a double and responsive vision, and with instruction, from God; and a hindering difficulty removed from the minds of Ananias and Peter.

1, 2. The Position and Character of Cornelius.—Cesarea, on the Mediterranean coast, about thirty miles north of Joppa and sixty northwest from Jerusalem, was lavishly built by Herod the Great, and made his residence and the civil and military capital of Judea. Now, it was the seat of the Roman procurators or governors, as is frequently intimated in the Acts. B.—The gospel made its first conquest over heathenism in this large city, named from the Roman Cæsar, a military stronghold and naval arsenal of the Roman power. And it made that conquest over a soldier called Cornelius, one of the noblest of Roman names—an officer of the Italic band—a cohort of Roman blood. In his conversion we may see a prophetic intimation of the submission of the great Fourth Monarchy to the mild yoke of the gospel. Devout. A worshiper of one God, in contradistinction to polytheists and idolators. In the providence of God, the military successes of the Macedonian and Roman monarchies had impaired the local reverence for national deities, and had cleared the ground for the planting of a purer faith. The diffusion of the Hebrew Scriptures and the decomposition of paganism had tended to produce a class of persons in all parts of the world who may be said to have been the seminary of the Gentile Church. These were "the devout," or God-fearing, of the Acts. Tired of polytheism, and yet unwilling to subject themselves to the ceremonial law, these "God-fearing" men received with joy the tidings of the gospel; they recognized in Christianity a religion which satisfied the wants of their nature, the requirements of their reason, and the yearnings of their hearts, without impairing any of the reverence with which they had learned to regard the God of the Old Testament, but rather, and much more, enlarging the ideas they had already conceived of his merciful purposes and glorious attributes. The apostles everywhere in their journeys met with this class of proselytes. W.

Three centurions of the New Testament are referred to as favoring the truth, either in the person of Christ—as the centurion of Capernaum, and the witness of the crucifixion—or, as in this case, under such forms as the truth had been brought to his knowledge. The character here given him is specially attractive when we consider that he was only a truth-loving and -seeking man, looking for and taking it where he could find it, and voluntarily finding and accepting enough from the Jewish Scriptures and worship to make him devout—that is, to lead him to the true and filial fear and personal worship of God. Such a man we have here. Like Abraham, he influenced his household by imparting his own convictions of duty and worship. To God's poor or to God's call, he consecrated a portion of God's intrusted gifts. And in all, in the ordering of his own life, in the guidance of his household, and in his helpful alms, he looked upward continually for divine direction, acceptance, and blessing. All this is conveyed by the statement of inspiration. Only partially is he taught, but he heartily receives and faithfully acts out all he had learned of God and his will. And how many the evidences in all missionary history that God prepares heathen hearts for his gospel, and that with but little of truth and without specific human instrumentality he takes possession of many such hearts!

3-6. Cornelius is instructed by an Angel of God, in a Vision.—At the afternoon hour of prayer, or three o'clock, while himself at prayer, there appeared coming in to him a human form, marked in some manner intelligibly to him as a messenger from another world. To the certain sight and to the audible call of this supernatural being, the alarmed centurion uttered the briefest question in response.

Two things are conveyed in the angel's message. Both intimate a superhuman knowledge: one in regard to the internal acting of the mind of God, the other in regard to God's will respecting the two men, Cornelius and Peter. First he says, God has heard thy prayers and beheld thy gifts, and he remembers both. This direct assurance, for the encouragement and greater trust of the centurion, none other than a heavenly messenger could give. Next, he directs Cornelius to send for Peter as his instructor, merely using his own superior knowledge to inform the centurion where the apostle was to be found. But, besides the simple encouraging assurance, the angel teaches him nothing. He is only a celestial guide to a human teacher! Because the occasion is so great and prophetic, the first opening of the fold-door to the "other sheep" of the great Good Shepherd, or the first breaking down of the middle wall of partition between Jew and Gentile, therefore it is signaled by the sending of this messenger from heaven. But even God's angels, while they joyfully and triumphantly herald the advent, redemption, and glory of the Incarnate Son, have no part in the direct ministry of the gospel. For this ministry he exclusively uses and honors a human instrumentality.

7, 8. Obedient to the Vision, Cornelius sends Three Messengers to Peter.—Gladly and instantly he obeys the divine direction. He selects and summons two household servants and a soldier of his band, all in sympathy with his devout feeling and life, to whom he could therefore fully unfold the vision and intelligently commit the peculiar errand and message. And on the same afternoon, the three men start for Joppa, arriving on the next day soon after noon. B.

Cornelius was in Cesarea and Peter in Joppa—the Roman soldier in the modern city, which was built and named in the Emperor's honor—the Jewish apostle in the ancient seaport which associates its name with the early passages of Hebrew history—with the voyage of Jonah, the building of the Temple, the wars of the Maccabees. All the splendor of Cesarea, its buildings and its ships, and the Temple of Rome and the Emperor, which the sailors saw far out at sea, all has long since vanished. Herod's magnificent city is a wreck on the shore. A few ruins are all that remain of the harbor. Joppa lingers on, like the Jewish people, dejected but not destroyed. Cesarea has perished, like the Roman Empire which called it into existence. H.

9-16. What Peter saw while in a Trance.—On the next day at noon, within half an hour of the arrival of the centurion's messengers, Peter sought the secluded house-top, to lift his vision and heart heavenward, as he was wont. After his prayer, it would seem, while waiting the call to the noonday meal and craving food, the trance, or supernatural absorption of mind upon themes supernaturally suggested, took place. He saw heaven open—not, as Stephen, the heavens—but that bound of the visible upper sky which we call heaven, and above which we place the region of God's dwelling-place. Within the immense folds of a vast seemingly woven fabric, knit together by four suspending cords, and rapidly lowered from the cleft sky to the level of Peter's vision, he saw all manner of clean and unclean animals. And he heard a voice summoning him to kill and eat. To his respectful but distinct demur, that he could not partake that which was ceremonially unclean, the voice sharply forbade him call that unclean which God had made clean.

No instruction by symbol could possibly be clearer, more decisive than this. The very method of it, the suddenness, swiftness, and repetition in the descent and ascent of this vast sheeted fabric with its strange contents, and the shortness and sharpness of the command and reproof, all were admirably suited to Peter's strong nature. More than the other apostles, and for them, he needed just such plain teaching. And he could neither misunderstand nor forget it, when the immediate event made its interpretation clear, and even lent after-force to the vision itself. B.

There was then a distinction between clean and unclean, indicated by the calling of Abraham, but more explicitly by the Levitical rites and laws; yet appointed from the beginning, for we read of it in the time of Noah; a distinction applicable to men, to food, to dwellings, to land, to animals. This disinction was made by God for special ends, but at Christ's death the distinction had served its purpose. God interposed, and threw down the middle wall of partition; not rejecting the Jew, yet accepting the Gentile; not obliterating national distinctions, but making these no longer of any importance, and attaching to them no spiritual or religious privilege. Without lowering the Jew, he lifted up the Gentile; not making the Jew unclean, but the Gentile clean; so that from that time there should be (so far as access to God was concerned) "neither Jew nor Greek, bond nor free." In the vision or trance, Peter was taught that the Gentile was now made as clean as the Jew; that God had done it, and that even he, though the apostle of the circumcision, must at once accept the verdict. Bonar.

17-20. The Messengers arrive, and the Spirit instructs Peter.—While he pondered the vision, the three men from Cornelius stand at Simon's door asking for Peter. This the apostle learns not from any human summons, but from the intimation of the same Divine Spirit who had previously produced the audible voice. The vision is thus linked with the three visitors and their errand. And the connection is confirmed by the positive Divine direction, that Peter should return with these men whither they went, and the conclusive assurance that the Holy Ghost had sent them on this errand. No explanation of the vision has been offered. But Peter is bidden to obey certain directions, to do something, and in the doing all his questions about the vision were to be resolved. Here is the same principle we meet at every step in the histories of the Old and New Testaments. It is that obedience leads to knowledge. "We shall know if we follow on." If any one wills to do God's will, he shall know. In what follows we find this principle again verified. Both Peter and Cornelius, in their implicit following of the Spirit's directions, learn that which they desire to know, and with knowledge receive larger grace. B.

Points of Useful Thought.—We miss very much devotional joy, by the neglect of fragmentary prayer. In the intervals which separate periodical seasons of devotion, we need a habit of offering up brief ejaculatory expressions of devout feeling. The morning and the evening sacrifice depend very much upon these interspersed offerings, as these in return are dependent on those. Communion with God in both is assisted by linking the "set times" together by a chain of heavenward thoughts and aspirations, in the breaks which occur in our labors and amusements. Nothing else can do this so naturally as the habit of ejaculatory prayer. The spirit of prayer may run along the line of such a habit through a lifetime. So one may live in a state of prayer, "a devout man that prays always." A. P.

The eyes which run through the whole earth behold also the searching soul struggling for life and light which it can not procure for itself. To the upright there ariseth light in the darkness; yet by degrees, through the use of means, only and alone through the preaching of a full and free gospel, of which Christ is the center, peace the basis, and grace the glad tidings. This man who fears God and worketh righteousness is pleasing to him, not in order that he may remain what he is, but that by the way of faith and repentance he may be received into the kingdom of God, without which there is no safety for those who in themselves are lost. Van O.

Cornelius was recompensed for his prayers and alms by the visit of an angel, by the visit of an apostle, by the glad tidings of the gospel, and, to crown all, by the gift of the Holy Ghost. How striking an instance of the large and munificent scale on which God responds to the desires and efforts which his own free grace has prompted—of his "giving more" (as is his wont) "than either we desire or deserve"! How wonderful a fulfillment of the promise made by our Lord both to secret alms and secret prayers—"Thy Father, which seeth in secret, himself shall reward thee openly." E. M. G.

Benevolence or almsgiving is always remembered of God, and ranks in his estimate with prayer or direct worship. It is counted a vital part of that obedience which is worship in act or life. It comes from the heart equally with that worship which finds expression in uttered prayer and praise. Prayer and alms equally show the presence of an operative faith and a living active love.

The diversity of God's methods and the special adaptation of each to his particular purpose are illustrated in this case of Cornelius as compared with that of Saul. An obscure disciple baptized and received into the Church the great apostle to the Gentiles; and this because God would have his ministry from the first free from all human dependence. But this first pagan disciple, a purely Gentile member of the Christian Church, was received into Church fellowship, not even by Philip the evangelist who lived at Cesarea, but by the foremost of the apostles; and this because God would throw around an event so signal, prophetic, and glorious—the receiving of this first-fruit of a world harvest—all that could give it impressiveness and significance! B.

Doubting nothing! That is the secret of liberty, of efficiency, of success in every work which is undertaken by men: a confidence in the practicability, in the value of the work, in the Divine authority which imposes it upon us as an obligatory work, and in the Divine providence and power which will bring it to a successful performance. ACTS x. 24-48.

24 AND the morrow after they entered into Cæsarea. And Cornelius waited for them, and 25 had called together his kinsmen and near friends. And as Peter was coming in, Cornelius 26 met him, and fell down at his feet, and worshipped him. But Peter took him up, saying, 27 Stand up; I myself also am a man. And as he talked with him, he went in, and found 28 many that were come together. And he said unto them, Ye know how that it is an unlawful thing for a man that is a Jew to keep company, or come unto one of another nation; 29 but God hath shewed me that I should not call any man common or unclean. Therefore came I unto you without gainsaying, as soon as I was sent for: I ask therefore for what 30 intent ye have sent for me? And Cornelius said, Four days ago I was fasting until this hour; and at the ninth hour I prayed in my house, and, behold, a man stood before me in 31 bright clothing, and said, Cornelius, thy prayer is heard, and thine alms are had in remem-32 brance in the sight of God. Send therefore to Joppa, and call hither Simon, whose surname is Peter; he is lodged in the house of one Simon a tanner by the sea side: who, when 33 he cometh, shall speak unto thee. Immediately therefore I sent to thee; and thou hast well done that thou art come. Now therefore, are we all here present before God, to hear all things that are commanded thee of God.

34 Then Peter opened his mouth, and said, Of a truth I perceive that God is no respecter of 35 persons: but in every nation he that feareth him, and worketh righteousness, is accepted
 36 with him. The word which God sent unto the children of Israel, preaching peace by Jesus 37 Christ: (he is Lord of all:) that word ye know, which was published throughout all 38 Judæa, and began from Galilee, after the baptism which John preached; how God anointed Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Ghost and with power: who went about doing good, and 39 healing all that were oppressed of the devil; for God was with him. And we are witnesses of all things which he did both in the land of the Jews, and in Jerusalem; whom they slew 40 and hanged on a tree: him God raised up the third day, and shewed him openly; not to 41 all the people, but unto witnesses chosen before of God, even to us, who did eat and drink 42 with him after he rose from the dead. And he commanded us to preach unto the people, and to testify that it is he which was ordained of God to be the Judge of quick and dead.
 43 To him give all the prophets witness, that through his name whosoever believeth in him shall receive remission of sins.

44 While Peter yet spake these words, the Holy Ghost fell an all them which heard the 45 word. And they of the circumcision which believed were astonished, as many as came with Peter, because that on the Gentiles also was poured out the gift of the Holy Ghost.
 46 For they heard them speak with tongues, and magnify God. Then answered Peter, Can 47 any man forbid water, that these should not be baptized, which have received the Holy 48 Ghost as well as we? And he commanded them to be baptized in the name of the Lord.
 Then prayed they him to tarry certain days.

TRUTH and mercy and self-devotion in men are greater than all miracles, and have the very essence of God in them. Therefore we are bound to thank him for every disinterested act performed by any man, for every generous and heroic deed, for the search after truth, simply because it is truth, by those great minds that seek her as hid treasure, for unpaid devotion to the cause of suffering and want, for the blessed feet that seek out shame and sin, and the lips that plead with them to bring them home contrite and forgiven. These are all testimonies to the greatness of the soul of man, and therefore to the being of God. Those footsteps are echoes of the feet of him who went about doing good, and help us to believe that he once walked our earth. Ker.

In every nation, now that Jesus Christ has come, there is an equal access to the open door for every tongue and tribe and people. Under this new and heavenly reign of light and love which has been set up, all are free citizens. There are no external disqualifications. There are no internal incapacities for being saved. All this Peter had just found out in a peculiar way, the vision of the four-cornered sheet three times let down from heaven, to show him that the ceremonial distinctions of things to be lawfully eaten, symbols of all other natural disqualifications, were abolished. The Gentile world which God has now liberated from its long neglect, "call not thou common." But go to it, preach to it, respect and love human nature in Cesarea just as much as in Jerusalem or Bethany: there is no difference. The gospel is no respecter of persons. Christ died for all. F. H. D.

24-33. After the narrative of the first Christian Pentecost, the second book of Luke scarcely contains a picture which in beauty and interest can be placed above that of the reception into the Church of Cornelius and his household. It is the history of the Gentile day of Pentecost. Moment worthy of eternal remembrance, when the first Gentile threshold was crossed for the first time by the feet of them who published peace, and the earliest beam of light dawned on the land of the shadow of death! Van O.

The three messengers from Cornelius carried over night in the house of Simon at Joppa. On the next morning Peter departed with them for Cesarea, a distance of thirty Roman miles. Six Jewish Christians of Joppa voluntarily accompanied him. The journey required a day and a half; so that they reached Cesarea the day following, or the fourth day after the vision of Cornelius.

The centurion, anticipating the time of their arrival, had called together a considerable company, from his own and other friendly Gentile households. Whatever blessing is to come, he would extend its effects to as many as he could reach. Regarding Peter as one directly and especially sent of God, his mind ingrained with the Roman notion of deifying such ambassadors from heaven, the centurion would have rendered divine honors to the apostle upon his entrance. But instantly Peter checked his purpose, gave him his hand, and bade him stand; assuring him that he himself was only a man. After a moment's friendly converse, Peter went in to the gathered company. Without further reference to Cornelius, he first accounts for his—to them strange—presence, a Jew among Gentiles, by frankly declaring that God had taken away his Jewish prejudice; had taught him that all nations were equally acceptable to Him. He then asks why they have summoned him. To this question Cornelius replies by reciting his vision of the fourth afternoon before—the direction he had received, and his obedience to it—and then expresses the readiness of all present to hear all things commanded of God for Peter's utterance.

34, 35. Peter's Introduction: all Men and Nations alike before God.—The singular coincidence of the two miraculous visions, and the manifest spirit and desire of this company of Gentile souls, at once deepened into strong settled assurance the new view God had taught him of the relation of the Gentiles to the Gospel. And this conviction naturally first finds utterance, "I have thoroughly learned this, that God looks favorably upon Gentile and Jew alike, and on the single condition of filial fear in the heart, and integrity in the life." But Peter stops not here. His new knowledge of something that had always been true could not help Cornelius. If he had no more to say he need not have come. For if alms and prayers, with a devout and beneficent life, were sufficient for a man's justification before God, then this man and his company need no "words" of Peter "telling them how they may be saved." If Cornelius himself (not merely his prayers and alms) had been already accepted by God, then neither vision nor angel, neither Peter nor his gospel of Christ, neither divine nor human baptism would have been necessary or appropriate. But Peter saw in this "fearing God and working righteousness" only the indications that God had been preparing these devout hearts for the further essential knowledge of Christ, in his sacrificing life and death, his resurrection and exaltation; and for the instant glad acceptance of this justifying Saviour. And this is the "Word" he proceeds to preach.

36, 37. Substance of the Word preached, and the Sphere of its Proclamation thus far.—That Word God had sent to the children of Israel, and it had been published from the Baptist's coming in all the country of the Jews. These general facts they knew. But the substance of that Word, which they did not know, he here first sums up, in a clause and an included parenthesis: preaching peace by Jesus Christ (he is Lord of all). No single word expresses so well and winningly the very heart of the gospel, in its design and effect upon human souls, as this word "peace." It is God's peace, for there is no other. And the giver is God, in the person of Jesus Christ his Son. There is no other giver, for He is Lord over all souls. And this proclamation of peace provided and proffered to men in their disquiet—disquiet because of sin and its consequent misery—fully meets, and it alone meets, the deepest most vital craving of the disturbed heart. How winning, how blessed then this divine gospel, with this its great disclosure—Christ, God over all, in good-will to men, bringing peace upon earth!

38-43. The Particulars of this Published Divine Gospel, the Facts of Christ's Incarnate Career, here testified to by Peter, and referred back to Previous

Testimony by the Prophets.—The same facts that he has heretofore preached to Jews of every degree, he declares to this first audience of Gentiles. While he asserts Christ's Lordship over men, and his ordination as Judge of quick and dead in the great and final assize, he yet declares His humanity by the name Jesus of Nazareth, and tells of His ignominious death by hanging on a tree.

By His anointment "with the Holy Ghost and with power," the apostle intimates Christ's three-fold functions as God's appointed prophet, priest, and king for men, for only these three were anointed among men. His beneficent and blessed ministry is summed up in the simple but sublime record: He went about doing good! To all his marvels of divine power in healing and in casting out devils, to all his deeds of mercy and help, the apostle here interjects the fact that he himself was witness. Also His death upon the Cross, and His resurrection upon the third day, Peter declares. And here again he refers to his own personal witness and knowledge. He states a fact that thoughtful readers of the Gospel history have noticed, but which is nowhere stated in that history. It is that the risen Saviour showed himself only to disciples, never to unbelievers. The single object of the showing was to secure witnesses enough and of such a character as could testify and as would be credited. Such witnesses could not be found among unbelievers. They could only be found among honest disciples, and that after testimony strong and conclusive enough to overbear their previous honest doubt and unbelief.

And the witnesses of Christ's beautiful and blessed life, they who had accompanied with him during the brief period of his ministry to men, who had known of his condemnation and death by the Cross, who had beheld him arise and saw him ascend to heaven, these chosen witnesses (of whom Peter was one of the foremost) Christ had commissioned to speak unto all people that which they knew, and to testify that they had seen; and to declare that He, the ascended Redeemer, should finally reappear as the Judge of the quick and dead. Lastly, to complete, confirm, and crown these details of Christ's office-work on earth and in heaven, the apostle declares the sublime end and object of all: that whosoever believeth in Him shall receive remission of sins. This, he affirms, is the witness of the prophets to Christ, thereby asserting that this is the ultimate supreme fact of the Old and New Testament Gospel. The same Being who is LORD and JUDGE of all is the SAVIOUR of all that trust in Him. This Lord and Saviour—in his incarnate life of love, his death of shame, and his glorious resurrection and ascension, already often preached to Jewish rulers and people—by express command of God Peter now preached to this first-gathered company of Gentiles. And similar are the results which ensue.

44-48. Gentiles receive the Holy Ghost and are baptized, while Believing Jews stand amazed.—The prayers of Cornelius find now abundant answer. In the preaching of Christ all is revealed that he sought to know and receive. And not the centurion alone, but the whole Gentile company gathered at his call, listened, heeded, believed, and received the offered Saviour. And now, as oftentimes before upon Jewish multitudes, upon these first-fruits of the Gentiles descended the fullness of the power of the Holy Ghost, quickening, converting, and endowing with limited supernatural gifts. It was the Pentecost of the Gentiles, and they also spake with tongues, and magnified the grace of God in their salvation.

This outpouring of the Spirit upon pagan hearers is the significant fact emphasized in the whole narrative. All the previous occurrences by miracle and providence had been definitely arranged to give the utmost prominence and significance to the introduction of the Gentiles into the Christian Church. And this mainly to make the deepest impression upon the minds of all Jewish disciples, apostles and Church members alike; to produce an unquestioning conviction that from henceforth the middle wall of partition between Jew and Gentile was, by God's own purpose and hand, for ever broken down. How much needed was this lesson and how hard it was to learn, striking as it did directly at the heart of a prejudice incorporated for ages in the very fabric of the Jewish mind, we may gather from the entire after-history of the Acts, and from large portions of Paul's leading epistles. The lesson was this: That Judaism was not the way of entrance to Christianity; that the ceremonial rites of the Jewish law were not in any wise conditions of admission to the Christian Church; nay more, that the Mosaic ritual was, in its two chief features, now replaced by two unbloody and simple sacramental symbols, whose significance better suited the new relations of the Church to Christ.

Peter learned this now as the lesson of his vision at Joppa, and at once acted upon it. Taking advantage of the amazement and conviction of the Jewish disciples from Joppa, he puts to them the conclusive question of verse 47. "Uncircumcised as they are," he says, "they have received the baptism of God. Shall we refuse them the baptism of man, as appointed by Christ?" And, by the ordinance then administered at his command, Peter there declared, and afterward, upon his recital of the facts, the body of the apostles reaffirmed the declaration, that Gentile believers henceforth were to be received through the simple Christian symbol of baptism alone, and were entitled to full, equal right and privilege in Christian Church membership. B.

Suggested Thoughts.—The scale of God's plans is large, and the fulfillment gradual and slow. For fifteen hundred years the Jewish people were the chosen recipients of his special regard and favors. But never for themselves alone. Instruments, favored indeed, but only instruments they were, trained by instruction and discipline, to testify of the one Jehovah, to receive and distribute his Word of Life. Yet, in the later centuries, God had also been training two other nations to take part in the great crisis of human history. Now that the Jewish nation has fulfilled its appointed function, all that is special in God's dealing ceases. Now that Greek and Roman are prepared for God's working in their behalf, above all, now that the time for humanity's divine redemption has fully come, and the work of that redemption is complete, now the promise and the salvation of God takes a breadth and reach that includes all nations. And it is this wide transfer of divine blessings, it is the universal proclamation of the redemption in Christ Jesus, that we read in the occurrence narrated here.

Two expressions, found in this story in different connections, seem to be wonderfully adapted for inscriptions in our churches; one on either side-wall, where they may be read from pulpit and pew: We are all here present before God, to hear all things that are commanded thee of God! Every word is emphatic and quickeningly suggestive. And the other is equally profitable: Who (i. e., God's preacher) shall tell thee words, whereby thou and all thy house shall be saved! Words that are spirit and life, words from Christ, about Christ, for Christ: words from the Word of Life, accompanied by the living Spirit, which are able to make wise unto salvation. Here we find the design, the sure, the only subject-matter, and right temper of preaching and hearing!

Peter's first sermon to Gentiles may be beautifully and effectively summed up in its first and last expressions: Peace by Jesus Christ, Lord of all! Through his name every one who believeth shall receive remission of sins! Peace by pardon—redemption by faith!

Now, too, the world, of Jews as well as Gentiles, in heart are craving the message of peace by Jesus Christ, and remission of sins by faith in his name. Now, too, individual souls—and many—like Cornelius are desiring, praying! Shall we not send far and wide the living voice with the living gospel? B.

Section 209.

Acts xi. 1-30.

1 AND the apostles and brethren that were in Judæa heard that the Gentiles had also received the word of God. And when Peter was come up to Jerusalem, they that were of 3 the circumcision contended with him, saying, Thou wentest in to men uncircumcised, and 4 didst eat with them. But Peter rehearsed the matter from the beginning, and expounded
5 it by order unto them, saying, I was in the city of Joppa praying: and in a trance I saw
6 a vision, A certain vessel descend, as it had been a great sheet, let down from heaven by four 7 corners; and it came even to me: upon the which when I had fastened mine eyes, I considered, 8 and saw fourfooted beasts of the earth, and wild beasts, and creeping things, and 9 fowls of the air. And I heard a voice saying unto me, Arise, Peter; slay and eat. But I said, 10 Not so, Lord: for nothing common or unclean hath at any time entered into my mouth.
11 But the voice answered me again from heaven, What God hath cleansed, that call not thou 12 common. And this was done three times: and all were drawn up again into heaven. And,
13 behold, immediately there were three men already come unto the house where I was, sent 14 from Cæsarea unto me. And the spirit bade me go with them, nothing doubting. Moreover 15 these six brethren accompanied me, and we entered into the man's house: and he shewed us
16 how he had seen an angel in his house, which stood and said unto him, Send men 17 to Joppa, and call for Simon, whose surname is Peter; who shall tell thee words, whereby 18 thou and all thy house shall be saved. And as I began to speak, the Holy Ghost fell on 19 them, as on us at the beginning. Then remembered I the word of the Lord, how that he 20 said, John indeed baptized with water; but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost.
21 Forasmuch then as God gave them the like gift as he did unto us, who believed on the Lord 22 Jesus Christ; what was I, that I could withstand God? When they heard these things, they held their peace, and glorified God, saying, Then hath God also to the Gentiles granted repentance unto life.

19 Now they which were scattered abroad upon the persecution that arose about Stephen travelled as far as Phenice, and Cyprus, and Antioch, preaching the word to none but unto 20 the Jews only. And some of them were men of Cyprus and Cyrene, which, when they 21 were come to Antioch, spake unto the Grecians, preaching the Lord Jesus. And the hand of the Lord was with them: and a great number believed, and turned unto the Lord.

22 Then tidings of these things came unto the ears of the church which was in Jerusalem:
 23 and they sent forth Barnabas, that he should go as far as Antioch. Who, when he came, and had seen the grace of God, was glad, and exhorted them all, that with purpose of heart 24 they would cleave unto the Lord. For he was a good man, and full of the Holy Ghost and 25 of faith: and much people was added unto the Lord. Then departed Barnabas to Tarsus, 26 for to seek Saul: and when he had found him, he brought him unto Antioch. And it came to pass, that a whole year they assembled themselves with the church, and taught much people. And the disciples were called Christians first in Antioch.
 27 And in these days came prophets from Jerusalem unto Antioch. And there stood up one 28 of them named Agabus, and signified by the spirit that there should be great dearth 29 throughout all the world: which came to pass in the days of Claudius Cæsar. Then the disciples, every man according to his ability, determined to send relief unto the brethren 30 which dwelt in Judæa: which also they did, and sent it to the elders by the hands of Barnabas and Saul.

By cleaving unto Jesus is meant that we hold fast to his religion, abhorring the thought of apostasy—that we adhere to him as the Revealer of truth, avoiding every heresy and error—that we rest upon him by faith as our atoning Priest—that we kneel to him as our King—that we cling to his example—that we keep near him as the source of all spiritual, sanctifying influence—and that we abide in him as our everlasting portion and ultimate good. Abiding in Christ is abiding in his service, walking in his will, doing that which shall please him, and living to his glory. And this derives new force from the consideration that holiness, whether of heart or conduct—in other words, cleaving to the Lord in duty—can by no means be secured, except by cleaving to him in acts of personal faith and affection. J. W. A.

Let the central flame of Christian love burn in your hearts with an undying constancy and pureness. Let your sweet charity and patience and peace breathe as a fragrance throughout the society of believers. Let the sustaining and heavenly hope which comes through Christ impart its beauty to your character always, and shine with clear celestial luster throughout your life. Let your self-devoted labors for others reach out to them, and bring both them and us a blessing. Take what of influence from the spheres unseen you here may meet, and make it felt throughout the circles which you affect. Seek first of all in yourselves, at all times, the richest, brightest, most abounding experience of all that which the Spirit of God will work, through the gospel, in the hearts and minds of those who receive him; of all which study, prayer, and effort, beneficent action and the wisest self-discipline, can bring to the soul through Christ its Lord; of all which God imparts in his grace to those whom he chooses for his own. And then let this be spontaneously revealed, in endurance and in action, in your life and on your lips, in all the circumstances in which you may be placed. R. S. S.

1-18. This event was the crown and consummation of Peter's ministry. He who had first preached the resurrection to the Jews, baptized the first converts, and confirmed the Samaritans, now, without the advice or coöperation of any of his colleagues, under direct communication from heaven, first established principles which issued in the complete fusion of the Hebrew and Gentile elements in the Church. It was no mere acquiescence in a positive command, but the development of a spirit full of generous impulses, which found utterance in the words spoken by Peter on that occasion, both in presence of Cornelius and afterward at Jerusalem. But the Church at Jerusalem was slow to learn the lesson involved in the tidings that the Gentiles had also received the word of God. When Peter returned to Jerusalem, he was accused by "those of the circumcision" because he had eaten with the uncircumcised. But his plain narrative of the whole transaction, crowned by the argument that, in the outpouring of the Holy Ghost, he had recognized that same baptism of the Spirit which Christ had promised as the sign of his presence with the apostles themselves, silenced every objection, and opened every mouth in praise to God for the great revelation which marks this epoch in the history of the Church: "Then hath God also to the Gentiles granted repentance unto life." S.

We note, here and throughout the Acts, in the record of personal contentions and church divisions, the same ingenuous frankness in telling the story of their own weaknesses and sins, that we read so often and plainly in the gospels. The bearing of this honesty of the sacred writers upon the truth of their writings is obvious.

19-21. The Gospel widely diffused through Persecution. Its first Great Triumph among Gentiles at Antioch.—The work of Christ thus far had only reached the limit of Palestine. As bidden at his ascension, the disciples had begun at Jerusalem, and thence gone into Judea, Samaria, and Galilee. Now a signal step in advance is taken; an earnest vital movement is begun among the Gentiles.

Luke recurs (v. 19) to the fact previously stated (8: 4), only specifying regions where the scattered believers went, and the single class of persons (Jews) to whom they preached the Word. The time is indefinite and considerably prolonged. Phœnicia, here referred to, was a province of Syria on the Syro-Palestinian coast of the Mediterranean, extending northward from Mount Carmel one hundred and thirty miles in a strip of land bounded by the Lebanon range. It included Tyre, Sidon, Barytus (Beirut), and other cities. Cyprus is the large island, distant sixty miles from the Phœnician coast, noted at that period for its productions and commerce, and for the luxury of its inhabitants. (See map, p. 61.)

After the dispersion of the disciples at Stephen's death these two populous regions were ultimately reached, and the gospel preached to the Jews. But we learn (v. 20) that some of these preaching disciples, natives of Cyprus and of Cyrene in Lybian Africa, were moved by the Spirit to go to Antioch and there to preach to Greeks. They were prompted, we can hardly doubt, by tidings of what had occurred in Cesarea; for their movement followed close upon Peter's ministry in the house of Cornelius. The method employed was the preaching of a personal Saviour, telling the story of Christ. Peter and Stephen to the Jerusalem Jews, Philip to the Samaritans and the Ethiopian, Peter to the Gentile company of Cornelius, and now these unnamed disciples to the Greeks of Antioch, alike dwelt upon the facts of Christ's person and history. They unfolded the truths of salvation incarnated in his serving life, his suffering death, and his triumphant resurrection and ascension. And as before, so now, "the arm of the Lord is revealed" as directing and energizing this ministry of men; so that "a great number believed and turned unto the Lord." Here we see the one only method of bringing truth and salvation effectually to men: man preaches peace by Jesus Christ, but God inspires and guides the preaching, and makes the truth preached quickening and sanctifying! B.

Hence we learn how much was accomplished in the first Christian propagandism by the easy, natural, and spontaneous influence of laymen. The first successes of Christianity in foreign parts were on this wise. Individual believers, dispersed abroad in the providence of God, imparted to others those glad tidings with which their own souls were gladdened. In those passages in the Evangelists and the Acts which relate to the promulgation of the Gospel, we find three several words, all of which are translated into our English word preach. The original word in verse 19 is the very word we should have employed to describe simple conversation. Their hearts were full of Christ, and so they talked everywhere concerning him. It was with them as when the news of some joyful event is abroad in the city; it spreads in advance of all messengers, throbbing along amid high-wrought enthusiasm, reflected from the countenance and repeated from the mouth of all you meet. W. A.

22. Impression made upon the Mother Church in Jerusalem by the Tidings from Antioch.—They had learned that God had also given to the Gentiles repentance unto life. Here God summoned them to behold a great and marvelous work. He put upon them a new and vast responsibility. For Antioch was then one of the three or four greatest cities of the civilized world. Lying on the river Orontes, about twenty miles back from the north-eastern angle of the Mediterranean Sea, inclosed by the Taurus mountain range on the north and Lebanon on the east, by its harbor of Seleucia inviting the trade of the great sea, and through the open country beyond Lebanon accessible to the caravans of the East, it had every advantage to attract multitudes of all classes from every portion of the world. It was now the residence of the Roman governors, as it had been the capital of the Syrian kings, from whom it had received grandeur and name. Of great size, with immense and costly public and private structures, with temples, groves, and gardens, attractive with statues and works of art, almost rivaling Rome in extent and variety of its population, and surpassing it in the luxurious abandonment and worthless character of the people, Antioch was at once the most brilliant and the most debased, the greatest and the worst of the Oriental Greek cities under the wide Roman rule. Many Jews had originally settled here, because unmolested in their religion.

Under the pressure of their responsibility for helping on the movement of God's Spirit in this great and wicked metropolis, the mother Church at once sent Barnabas thither. We remember him, first as Joses (Acts 4 : 36), and next as the endorser of Saul to Peter and James. As a native of Cyprus and familiar with Antioch, himself also of Greek origin, with a transparently beautiful character and high natural and spiritual endowments, the selection and trust were eminently wise.

Note here, however, that it is the Church body that sends, not the apostles; and that an unofficial Church member, not an apostle, is sent. From henceforth the apostles act as such only upon certain occasions which call for the exercise of their special commission from Christ. Thus it appears that the offices in the Church by Christ's appointment are limited to specific purposes, and always subordinated to the interests of the body of believers.

23, 24. What Barnabas saw, felt, and did at Antioch, and what ensued.—He saw that which he had spiritual vision to discern, and spiritual desire to look upon. He saw the fruits of the grace of God, in a multitude of souls "turned to the Lord," that is, converted. And spiritual vision and desire, through sympathy, naturally begat spiritual joy: He was glad. Yet further, his quick, glad, deep sympathy seeks and finds its true relief in active helpfulness. He enters at once upon a ministry of instructive exhortation. Only the key-note and substance of that exhortation is given us here. But it is very rich and full in its instruction.

Earnestly Barnabas counsels those who had turned unto the Lord to cleave unto Him with full consecration (so the word purpose implies) of heart. Cleaving or holding fast is only a keeping turned unto the Lord. Christ is the vital center of trust and of life; and through the heart's cleaving, or close living union, to Him, the soul's attachment and consecration is made firm and enduring. It is the old and always beautiful figure of the vine and its branches. Faith in the living Christ turns the heart to Him; and a grafting of the believer's life into His life holds fast the once-turned heart. But let it be always remembered that, as the graft continues to live by the unceasing transmission of sap from the nourishing stem, so the believer's life is maintained by unbroken communion with Christ. Personal love to a personal Saviour is made living and fruitful by continuous personal communion with Him! This is the one essential truth declared by Christ and by all these primitive preachers in preaching Jesus.

The Christlike character of this "Son of Conso-lation" is here happily embodied in three particulars: his goodness of heart and life; the principle from which that goodness proceeded, faith; and the Divine agent who wrought the inward principle and actuated the outward life—who "worked in him to will and to do." Thus earnestly he taught the newly converted, and his inwrought faith and excellence confirmed his teaching. But the good effects were not limited to disciples. The same truths, so enforced by his manifest character through the Holy Ghost, reached and converted multitudes besides.

25, 26. A Year of Ministry in Antioch by Barnabas and Saul.—The hope and prospect of a yet larger ingathering, and the promise of a great and permanent prosperity for the growing Church of Christ, prompted Barnabas to seek help. Naturally he turns to Saul. He had recognized a Divine purpose in Saul's conversion, and he, better than others, appreciated Saul's qualifications for effective ministry. Under divine impulse, therefore, and without conference with the apostles, he sought Saul in his home at Tarsus. Together they return to Antioch, and together minister to the increasing Church for "a whole year."

Thus gradually still, and by no appointment of men, is Saul brought into prominence. For not yet has he been specially commissioned by the Holy Ghost and ordained to his world-wide work. And thus simply, by the labors of two unordained disciples, was the mother Church of the Gentiles founded. Thus quietly, without notice or knowledge of men, was established a new and second center around which the great movements of the Church were to circulate. Thenceforth the Church of Antioch held the same relation to Gentile Christianity as that at Jerusalem held to Jewish Christianity.

Disciples were called Christians first in Antioch.—As a natural consequence, as soon as they were seen to be characterized by something distinctive, as compared with other sects or parties among the Jews, they received a name taken from their peculiar doctrines and practices. And since the faith, the love, and the hope of this body of believers was concentrated upon the person and work of Christ, it was especially appropriate that they should be called Christians. The name, doubtless, originated with the Gentiles, and was distinctive only, given neither in mockery nor opprobrium. B.—This much at least is evident, that they who called themselves His disciples must in a conspicuous manner have separated themselves from those who did not believe the gospel; that not only their regard for Jesus and their assent to his commands, but their confession of the Christ as their Lord and King, was the cause of their receiving such a name. Van O.

So from the world the Church received its best descriptive name; from heathen, in a heathen city, believers received their most appropriate and honorable title. "A Latin derivative from the Greek term for the Messiah, it is connected with the office, not the name, of our Lord." The term is derived not from JESUS, the Saviour, but from CHRIST, the anointed of God, referring to His appointed and accepted work. So believers are fellow-workers, not fellow-saviours, with him; Christians not Jesuits. For their work they "have an unction (anointing).

Modern Antioch.

from the Holy One." B.—Derived from the three-fold office of Christ, the Anointed One of God, to be Prophet, Priest, and King of the world, the name intimates the obligation of those who bear it to faith in him, to worship through him, and to obedience to him as the Christ, and it also declares their participation in his unction. The name Christian is also a protest against all religious titles derived from human leaders. This name was not given at Jerusalem, but at Antioch, a Gentile city—an intimation of the future diffusion of Christianity throughout the heathen world. W.—Before this, they were called by the Jews Nazarenes, or Galileans; and by each other, disciples, believers, brethren, or saints. But they now assumed the name of their great Leader. D.

27-30. The Predicted Dearth, and the Christian Charity of the First Gentile Church to their Needy Jewish Brethren.—The prophets here referred to were simply men specially inspired with helpful messages of various kinds. This message was a prediction, but its purpose was obviously helpful. The matter of verses 27 and 28 is introduced here only to set forth the charity of the Gentile Church that followed. In that charity, kindred with previous similar acts of the Jewish believers at Jerusalem, we see the unity of the Christian spirit. And what was in the beginning has been, is now, and shall be until need and relief become obsolete terms. Here, each was willing to give, and gave what he could. Judgment and conscience determined the measure of obligation, and each gave heartily; and the combined gift, the first evidence of their fraternal affection, was sent by their teachers, Barnabas and Saul, to Jerusalem. B.

One of the two events in the life of Paul which give us sure marks of time, is his journey from Antioch to Jerusalem with Barnabas, on the occasion of the great famine under Claudius, about the time of the death of Herod Agrippa I.—an event which we can fix with certainty to A. D. 44; and the visit itself could not be later than A. D. 45. S.—They carried from Antioch a contribution to sustain the Christians of Jewish origin at Jerusalem through the famine. From Jerusalem, and from Jews, came forth the spiritual things wherewith the Gentiles at Antioch were enriched; they only obey a law of the kingdom when they load the returning train with temporal gifts for Christian Jews in Jerusalem. Such reciprocal charities were eminently fitted to break down the partition walls and blend all believers into one. Arnot.

30. Elders. Hitherto Luke had applied the word to the elders of the Jews; henceforth the Elders are officers recognized in the Church. Thus the Church almost insensibly succeeds to the Synagogue, and supplies its place. W.—The office of presbyter, or elder, was the only permanent essential office of the Jewish church, and as such was retained under the new organization, without any formal institution, and therefore without any distinct mention in the history, such as we find afterward in reference to the organization of the Gentile churches, where the office had no previous existence, and must therefore be created by the act of ordination. Section 210.

Acts xii. 1-24.

1 Now about that time Herod the king stretched forth his hands to vex certain of the 2 church. And he killed James the brother of John with the sword. And because he saw
 3 it pleased the Jews, he proceeded further to take Peter also. (Then were the days of un-
 4 leavened bread.) And when he had apprehended him, he put him in prison, and delivered
 5 him to four quaternions of soldiers to keep him; intending after Easter to bring him forth
 6 to the people. Peter therefore was kept in prison: but prayer was made without ceasing 7 of the church unto God for him. And when Herod would have brought him forth, the 8 same night Peter was sleeping between two soldiers, bound with two chains: and the keep-
 9 ers before the door kept the prison. And, behold, the angel of the Lord came upon him, 10 and a light shined in the prison: and he smote Peter on the side, and raised him up, saying,
 11 Arise up quickly. And his chains fell off from his hands. And the angel said unto him, 12 Gird thyself, and bind on thy sandals. And so he did. And he saith unto him, Cast thy 13 garment about thee, and follow me. And he went out, and followed him; and wist not 14 that it was true which was done by the angel; but thought he saw a vision. When they 15 were past the first and the second ward, they came unto the iron gate that leadeth unto the 16 city; which opened to them of his own accord: and they went out, and passed on through 17 one street; and forthwith the angel departed from him. And when Peter was come to 18 himself, he said, Now I know of a surety, that the Lord hath sent his angel, and hath del-19 ivered me out of the hand of Herod, and from all the expectation of the people of the 20 Jews. And when he had considered the thing, he came to the house of Mary the mother 21 of John, whose surname was Mark; where many were gathered together praying. And 22 as Peter knocked at the door of the gate, a damsel came to hearken, named Rhoda. And 23 when she knew Peter's voice, she opened not the gate for gladness, but ran in, and told 24 how Peter stood before the gate. And they said unto her, Thou art mad. But she con-
 25 stantly affirmed that it was even so. Then said they, It is his angel. But Peter continued 26 knocking: and when they had opened the door, and saw him, they were astonished. But 27 he, beckoning unto them with the hand to hold their peace, declared unto them how the 28 Lord had brought him out of the prison. And he said, Go shew these things unto James, 29 and to the brethren. And he departed, and went into another place.
 30 Now as soon as it was day, there was no small stir among the soldiers, what was become 31 of Peter. And when Herod had sought for him, and found him not, he examined the 32 keepers, and commanded that they should be put to death. And he went down from Judæa 33 to Cæsarea, and there abode. And Herod was highly displeased with them of Tyre and 34 Sidon: but they came with one accord to him, and, having made Blastus the king's cham-35 berlain their friend, desired peace; because their country was nourished by the king's 36 country. And upon a set day Herod, arrayed in royal apparel, sat upon his throne, and 37 made an oration unto them. And the people gave a shout, saying, It is the voice of a god, 38 and not of a man. And immediately the angel of the Lord smote him, because he gave 39 not God the glory: and he was eaten of worms, and gave up the ghost.
 40 But the word of God grew and multiplied.

THE kingdom of God on earth is in real, vital connection with his kingdom in heaven; so that there is—shall we say?—a sympathy between them; so that when a saint is smitten on earth, there is a sensation conveyed to the upper sky. The Lord of saints and angels says, "Saul, why persecutest thou me?" a strange expression of the union of the "King of Glory" and his humble mortal friends! The mighty spirits that he has on high in his service take their share of interest in his kingdom below. Throughout the Scriptures we see them prompt to come down, in aid and in avengement of his oppressed saints.

There will be a time when we shall have to go out from the prison-house of mortality, and from the world itself. And let us seriously think what previous course, what habits, what spirit prevailing through our life, will be likely to terminate in our finding such a messenger appointed to be with us at that hour—appointed to be with us, and not to leave us—to accompany us in an immense and amazing journey; that, whereas Peter came to be delightedly and collectedly sensible of the grand intervention when he found himself alone in the street, we may become sensible of the wondrous reality of it, by finding ourselves in the presence of saints, and angels, and their supreme Lord! J. F.

1, 2. The Murder of James by Herod Agrippa I.—The three striking incidents of this chapter break for a moment the thread of the history. The connection is restored in the last verse. The killing of James and the taking of Peter occurred in Jerusalem about the time of the journey thither of Barnabas and Saul from Antioch. The closing verse records their return from Jerusalem to Antioch, after fulfilling their ministry as bearers of the first Gentile benefactions.

James, the older brother of John and son of Zebedee, was one of the three admitted into the closest intimacy with Christ. Yet concerning him we have scarcely anything distinctive; no record whatever except in connection with his younger brother. And as his life, so his death is entirely unmarked by special record. Like John the Baptist, he was suddenly beheaded by an arbitrary kingly will, to gratify others. In each case the royal murderer was a Herod, son and grandson of the great Herod who slaughtered many children in a vain effort to destroy Christ. James was the first martyr among the apostles. He drank of the Master's cup, and was baptized with his baptism of blood, as Christ had declared; and was the first restored to Christ's abiding fellowship. B.

Herod Agrippa I. (here only referred to) was the son of Aristobulus and Berenice, and grandson of Herod the Great. He was sent to Rome on his father's execution, and was brought up with Drusus the son of Tiberius. On the death of Drusus, he found himself excluded from the emperor's presence, and was besides overwhelmed with debt. Returning to Palestine, he obtained through his sister Herodias the protection of Herod Antipas, who made him governor of Tiberias. But a quarrel soon took place, and, after strange vicissitudes and adventures, Agrippa returned to Italy. He attached himself to the young Caius (Caligula), and having been overheard to express a hope for his friend's speedy succession, he was thrown into prison by Tiberius, where he remained till the accession of Caligula, A. D. 37. The new emperor gave him the governments formerly held by the tetrarchs Philip and Lysanias, and bestowed on him the ensigns of royalty and other marks of favor, and he arrived in Palestine in the following year, after visiting Alexandria. The jealousy of Herod Antipas and his wife Herodias was excited by these distinctions, and they sailed to Rome in the hope of supplanting Agrippa in the emperor's favor. Agrippa was aware of their design, and anticipated it by a countercharge against Antipas of treasonable correspondence with the Parthians. Antipas failed to answer the accusation, and was banished to Gaul (A. D. 39), and his dominions were added to those already held by Agrippa. During the brief wild reign of Caligula, Agrippa continued his faithful friend, and used his influence on behalf of the Jews. Having paid the last honors to his patron's remains, he smoothed the path of his successor to the throne by his activity and discretion in carrying messages between the senate and the prætorian camp. Claudius rewarded him with the kingdom of Judea and Samaria, in addition to his tetrarchy, and thus the dominions of Herod the Great were reunited under his grandson (A. D. 41). S.

Herod Agrippa had courted the favor of the Jews. He had done much for them, and was preparing to do more. Josephus tells us that "he had begun to encompass Jerusalem with a wall, which, had it been brought to perfection, would have made it impracticable for the Romans to take it by siege; but his death, which happened at Cesarea, before he had raised the walls to their due height, prevented him." That part of the city, which this boundary was intended to inclose, was a suburb when Paul was converted. The work was not completed till the Jews were preparing for their final struggle with the Romans. H.

He was the only king after the Great Herod, and the last one that reigned in Jerusalem. His son Agrippa received only a limited and qualified sovereignty. In this persecution of the Church at Jerusalem, Herod simply sought popularity as a means of power. To please the Jews, and aid his own plans, he directed the murder of James. And for the same reason he proceeded to take Peter also. B.—In his recollection of James, no such idea obtruded itself in his mind, as that the martyred apostle had ascended as a "swift witness" against him to the throne of Heaven. Whether he might suppose the departed saint did go, we can not conjecture; but he thought he might send another the same road without danger of ever hearing of it again, except in the demoniac applauses of his mob. Peter would be easily found, and taken. He had not absconded from affright at the fate of his fellow apostle. Cowardice in behalf of his Lord had been shown once before; but that was the last time. The death of his great Master, and the love manifested toward Peter after he rose again, had devoted Peter to die for him, whenever fidelity to his cause should require the sacrifice. J. F.

3-5. Imprisonment of Peter and Prayer of the Church.—The arrest occurred early in the week following the paschal supper, during which only unleavened bread was eaten. By Jewish rules criminals could not be executed upon days of festival. Therefore Herod, intending a public execution, kept him until after the Passover feast was concluded. A quaternion was a detachment of four soldiers, constituting a watch. As there were four night-watches of three hours each, four quaternions were required. In the actual guard two were stationed at the gates, and two in the apartment with the prisoner. In Peter's case, a chain from either arm was linked to a soldier on either side. So securely "Peter was kept in prison."

"But prayer was made without ceasing of the Church unto God for him." This fact is thus prominently set over against the other. Peter's rescue was humanly impossible, as the disciples knew. But they also knew that nothing was impossible with God, and that Peter's danger grew out of his faithful ministry for God. And they believed therefore that God would somehow answer the prayer he had bidden them to offer. So they prayed, earnestly, importunately; desisting not day by day through those remaining days of the trying of their faith. And God, who had delayed both the extreme peril and deliverance of Peter, thus gave the Church opportunity to intercede, and, in the result, occasion to know the efficacy of prayer. The sudden killing of James prevented such intercession for him. The deferring of Peter's death was taken full advantage of, and in the only method of help or hope available to them.

6-11. Peter's Miraculous Release, and his Correct Judgment concerning it.—The time of this release is to be carefully noted. It was not only the night before Herod's proposed public murder, but it was in the fourth watch or during the last three hours of that night. This we know from the fact that the escape was not discovered until the morning, when the fourth watch was relieved. But last night, as it was known to be by Peter, with no outlook of human hope for the morrow, he had laid him down between the two soldiers, and was enjoying the peaceful sleep of God's beloved. Once he had heard the word: "What I do thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter." With Christ's doing, whatever it should be, he was content.

While thus quietly sleeping the sleep of faith, an angel of the Lord suddenly appeared beside him, and a supernatural light shone within the room. With strong grasp Peter is awaked and lifted to his feet, while his chains fall silently to the ground. Then, as bidden, he fastens his girdle, binds on his sandals, puts on his cloak or outer garment, and in half stupor follows the angel out. Between the first guard (of sleeping soldiers) and the second, and then through the outer iron gate, without human touch noiselessly opening before them, they pass. Onward through one street the silent angel accompanies the bewildered apostle, then suddenly disappears.

By the fresh night air aroused from his bewilderment, Peter at once discerns the divine hand and purpose in his deliverance. His trusted Lord had sent a releasing angel, and thus foiled the purpose of Herod and disappointed the murderous spirit of the Jews. For reasons which we may conjecture, he determines, before concealing himself from Herod's pursuit, to acquaint the disciples with the fact of his miraculous rescue. With this purpose he seeks the house of Mary, Mark's mother, one of the homes where Christian believers were wont to assemble for private worship. The Mark here referred to is the author of the second gospel, and son in the faith to Peter.

12-17. How Peter was received by the Gathered Disciples.—Far as it was into the night, these wrestling seekers were praying still. It was the last night and their last opportunity to pray. For many days and nights their pleas had been ascending, and no answer had come. But not content with asking and seeking, they continued, almost against hope, in knocking at the door of divine mercy, with their urgent entreaty for help. And now while they are still speaking, God's answer, in the person of the released apostle, stands knocking at their house door. Yet, strange to say, when first they are told this by the maid who had responded to the summons and heard Peter's voice, they did not, could not believe. It seemed to them too marvelous to be true. They knew not of the miracle, and expected none; but they knew that nothing save miracle could avail. In their amazement they fell back upon an old popular notion, and said it must be Peter's guardian angel assuming his guise.

But God's answer, Peter himself, continued knocking. So in a body, passing through the court to the gate, they open the small door and are amazed to behold the apostle. But he, instantly quieting their outburst of gladness, simply tells the story of his deliverance by the Lord, and they learn how their fervent intercessions have been answered. Their hearts are comforted, and their faith and patience strengthened. Thenceforth more earnestly they can pray; more faithfully labor or trustingly endure for a Lord so mighty and gracious.

With a message to James, our Lord's own brother, acquainting him with what occurred, Peter takes leave of these disciples, and, because he knows it is God's will, goes to some place of concealment. And it may be added that Peter now retires finally from whatever prominence he had previously had, while this James presides over the councils of the remaining apostles. B.

Peter's work is not ended. He will still labor much, till his last and fruitful labor of martyrdom; but since he has given to the evangelization of the world an impulse which will never be arrested, his part is no longer the same. If henceforth anything distinguishes him, if any preëminence can be claimed for him, it is that of humility. Who can read, who has ever read the letters of this holy apostle, without being struck with this character above all others? Where is the impetuous Simon who strikes the high priest's servant? Where the presumptuous Simon who dares to say to his Lord, "Though all should deny thee, yet will not I deny thee"? Where also is the Simon who denied his Master and his Friend? I now find only a man emptied of himself, and wholly full of his Saviour; a grave, meek, pious, modest servant of God and man; an admirable model of humility and candor. A. V.—He has achieved much—exactly that for which he was fitted. He has stood bravely in the front, and has both led and inspired the band of disciples in their aggressive work for the Master. But now his special mission is done. Another, more broadly qualified by nature and training, Christ will now take up, to do for Him another larger and as brave a work. B.

20-23. In the fourth year of his reign over the whole of Judea (A. D. 44) Agrippa celebrated some games at Cesarea in honor of the emperor. When he appeared in the theatre on the second day in a royal robe made entirely of silver stuff, which shone in the morning light, his flatterers saluted him as a god; and suddenly he was seized with terrible pains, and being carried from the theatre to the palace, died after five days' agony a loathsome death, like those of the great persecutors Antiochus Epiphanes and his own grandfather. The miraculous and judicial character of his death is distinctly affirmed by the sacred historian: "Immediately the angel of the Lord smote him, because he gave not God the glory." The Greeks of Sebaste and Cesarea, with his own soldiers, showed brutal exultation at his death, and the censure which the riot brought down from Claudius upon the Roman soldiers embittered their feelings toward the Jews to such a degree, that Josephus regards this as one of the chief causes of the Jewish war. S.—After his sudden and miserable death, his whole kingdom was again made a Roman province, ruled by procurators, two of whom, Claudius Felix and Porcius Festus, figure in the Acts of the Apostles. The last procurator was Gessius Florus, under whom the tragical fate of the Jewish nation, so long in preparation, was finally decided. P. S.

23. The angel of the Lord led forth Peter; the angel of the Lord struck Herod. That both acts were done by angels, mortals saw not; it was known only to the saints. Beng.—Luke, as a physician, was qualified to scrutinize natural causes, and was not at all likely to be credulous. He among the evangelists who was least likely to be carried away by a superstitious belief in supernatural agency, has been employed more than any other sacred writer to reveal to us the operations of invisible beings in the history of the Church. W.

24. The death of Herod relieved the Christians from persecution. But in their turn the Jews were troubled. The brief conciliatory rule of Herod was then finally exchanged for the rigorous tyranny of Roman governors. And the Jewish historian notes this providence in Herod's sudden death: that the third wall, which as planned by him would have made Jerusalem almost impregnable to the Roman assault, was left incomplete. So God rules! Peter lives and Herod dies. And the persecuted Church, delivered from the persecutor, again finds rest and prosperity. The Word of God grew and multiplied!

Suggested Thoughts.—Christ directs all events in the interest of his people. Neither human nor satanic scheme or endeavor can avail to thwart his purpose or shake his "all power in earth." So all things must work together for good both to the trusting believer and the praying Church. Yet he has his own way in actually bringing good to pass, and uses various ways. Not always one way, or the way that seems to us the wise and suitable way. For he suffers a John Baptist, a Stephen, and a James to be murdered that human malice may be gratified, while he interposes to rescue a Peter and Paul. Yet how clearly do we see that his high and only blessed purpose is equally accomplished by the martyrdom of those and the deliverance of these! And throughout the history of the Christian believer and Church, we read the single sure lesson: that his non-interference or his interference with human schemes is controlled by an unerring wisdom and an unflinching love.

An effective practical exposition have we here of Christ's teaching, that men should pray and not faint. Only one other prayer-meeting like this, in the importunity and persistence of the pleaders, do we find in this whole history. That one preceded and helped to bring the Pentecostal baptism. This one secured the very blessing they so fervently and continuously besought. And can any doubt that God hears and answers such prayer from every seeking and knocking two or three gathered in his name?

An assuring truth is beautifully suggested in this prison-visit of the angel to the sleeping apostle. Not indeed by conscious spirit-ministers, but by providential interpositions and spiritual suggestions, does every child of God partake his personal watch and guard, and experience many wonderful deliverances. At the end, rather in the beginning of the true life, we shall read his doings now unknown, and adoringly praise his always rescuing and finally delivering grace! B.

ACTS xii. 25 ; xiii. 1-18.

25 AND Barnabas and Saul returned from Jerusalem, when they had fulfilled their ministry, and took with them John, whose surname was Mark.

1 Now there were in the church that was at Antioch certain prophets and teachers ; as Barnabas, and Simeon that was called Niger, and Lucius of Cyrene, and Manaen, which 2 had been brought up with Herod the tetrarch, and Saul. As they ministered to the Lord, and fasted, the Holy Ghost said, Separate me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I 3 have called them. And when they had fasted and prayed, and laid their hands on them, they sent them away.

4 So they, being sent forth by the Holy Ghost, departed unto Seleucia ; and from thence 5 they sailed to Cyprus. And when they were at Salamis, they preached the word of God 6 in the synagogues of the Jews : and they had also John to their minister. And when they had gone through the isle unto Paphos, they found a certain sorcerer, a false prophet, a Jew, 7 whose name was Bar-jesus : which was with the deputy of the country, Sergius Paulus, a prudent man ; who called for Barnabas and Saul, and desired to hear the word of God. 8 But Elymas the sorcerer (for so is his name by interpretation) withstood them, seeking to 9 turn away the deputy from the faith. Then Saul, (who also is called Paul,) filled with the 10 Holy Ghost, set his eyes on him, and said, O full of all subtilty and all mischief, thou child of the devil, thou enemy of all righteousness, wilt thou not cease to pervert the right ways 11 of the Lord ? And now, behold, the hand of the Lord is upon thee, and thou shalt be blind, not seeing the sun for a season. And immediately there fell on him a mist and a 12 darkness ; and he went about seeking some to lead him by the hand. Then the deputy, 13 when he saw what was done, believed, being astonished at the doctrine of the Lord. Now when Paul and his company loosed from Paphos, they came to Perga in Pamphylia : and John departing from them returned to Jerusalem.

We enter upon the second great division of the Acts. The first (chs. 1-12) described the advent of the Holy Ghost ; and, under his inspiration, the founding of the Christian Church among the Jews of Jerusalem and Judea, and the extension of Christianity into Samaria and among the nearer Gentiles. The chief result among the heathen was the founding of a second prominent Christian Church among the Gentiles of Antioch in Syria. This had been mainly the work of Barnabas and Saul.

The second division of the Acts recounts the chief features of the fuller, more distinctive introduction of the gospel among the Gentiles of Asia Minor, Greece, and Rome. It follows, therefore, mainly the career of Paul, Christ's special messenger to these Gentile nations. By comparing with this history of Luke Paul's own statements in his epistles, that incomparably signal career may be fully understood. This second half of the book also divides itself naturally into the twelve years of Paul's active missionary work, and his five years of labor in captivity. The twelve years of liberty include his Three Missionary Journeys. Times and periods should be definitely marked as a basis for an intelligent study of these Journeys. The periods and intervals referred to cover a duration of years, where the brief fragmentary accounts seem to indicate months. The First Journey (chs. 12 and 14) probably extended over a period of two years. Then succeeded an interval of two years or longer, spent mainly with the mother Church of the Gentiles at Antioch. Toward the end of this interval occurred the council at Jerusalem, where the great question of the relation of Gentile Christianity to Judaism was decided (ch. 15). The Second Journey (chs. 16-18) occupied about three years ; and the Third (chs. 19, 20) almost four years. These are the most probable periods.

But it should be remembered that the Book of Acts furnishes no basis for a detailed chronology. The principal dates are largely hypothetical. Paul's conversion is set down by scholars all the way from 33 to 41 A. D. The dates 35 or 37 A. D. are most largely accepted. The interval between his conversion and his setting apart for labor among the Gentiles is also variously estimated. Assuming 46 A. D. as the latter date, this interval, spent in preparation for his great life-work, extended nearly or beyond ten years. B.—Not Jerusalem, but Antioch, not the Holy City of God's ancient people, but the profane city of the Greeks and Romans, is the place to which the student of sacred history is now directed. During the remainder of the Acts of the Apostles our attention is at least divided between Jerusalem and Antioch, until at last, after following Paul's many journeys, we come with him to Rome. H.

The relation of Paul to the two great Churches, the Jewish Christian of Jerusalem and the Gentile Christian of Antioch, should be carefully borne in mind. While his personal connection and his labors are exclusively with the Gentile Church, while Antioch is his point of departure and return, yet after every journey he goes also to Jerusalem, and recounts to the mother Church and its leaders the progress of the Divine work. Thus keeping up a close intercourse between the two great centers, he was himself a bond of union to the entire Christian Church.

1-3. The Call and Sending of the First Foreign Missionaries.—Antioch (in Syria), situated at the northeastern angle of the Mediterranean shore, long a flourishing city with a large mixed population, was now the eastern head-

Antioch. There was everything in the situation and circumstances of this city to make it a place of concourse for all classes and kinds of people. By its harbor of Seleucia it was in communication with all the trade of the Mediterranean; and, through the open country behind the Lebanon, it quarters of Imperial Rome. B.—Antioch was founded by Seleucus, and called after his father's name. He is said to have built in all nine Seleucias, sixteen Antiochs, and six Laodiceas. But by far the most famous of these cities was the Syrian was conveniently approached by the caravans from Mesopotamia and Arabia. It was almost an Oriental Rome, in which all the forms of the civilized life of the empire found some representative. Through the first two centuries of the Christian era, it was what Constantinople became afterward, "the Gate of the East." H.

As we have already learned, this great mart of the nations had readily received the gospel, and organized a strong, distinctively Gentile Church; the only one that compared in vigor and efficiency with the mother (Jewish) Church at Jerusalem. Naturally this Gentile Church at Antioch became the starting-point of missionary effort among the Gentiles. The self-development (of course under Divine influence) of this new movement appears in the simple account.

B.—We now hear, not of the mother Church only, but of churches in other parts. And in this multiplication of churches, let us not fail to observe how the Spirit, in his manifold gifts and strength, asserts his independence of mere official cooperation of men. The founding and ruling of the Church, the orderly assembly of believers, is bound to the appointed offices and officers in the Church; but the spread of the gospel from heart to heart, from the living voice to the pricking conscience, is not thus bound. Every Christian is not a church officer; but every Christian is a witness of Christ, and, if need so be, a missionary of Christ to his brethren. A.

It is while the Church and its leaders are engaged in worship and fasting for some special object, that the direction of the Holy Ghost comes to them. Christ's great commission they must often have pondered. The missionary spirit of the gospel, exemplified by the Church at Jerusalem, must have been begotten among them. Their new name of Christians must have impressed a new sense of responsibility for extending the truth and power of Christ among their own peoples. In a word, they must have reached a pondering, questioning state respecting their duty in this matter; and this great question may have been that which engaged them now in special worship and fasting, when the summons of the Holy Ghost was received. How the will of the divine Spirit was made known, does not appear. But it was distinctly communicated. A specific work is referred to, and definite persons are designated as divinely appointed agents in this work. Obedient to the direction, the Church at Antioch, in connection with another service of prayer and fasting, laid their hands on Barnabas and Saul, and sent them forth upon the first divinely organized mission to the Gentiles.

Of the five persons mentioned in the first verse, one, Manaen, is noted by Luke as having been in childhood the foster-brother of Herod Antipas, the murderer of the Baptist, and the mocker at the arraigned and bound Christ. Herod was now a dethroned, wretched exile upon the banks of the Rhone. The note is appended seemingly to emphasize the contrast in character, life, and destiny between the two foster-fellows—one a despiser, the other a disciple, of Christ.

In reference to the transaction narrated in the second and third verses, two things are to be carefully observed:

1. This was not Paul's call to the apostleship, but his summons by the Holy Ghost to the exercise of the gifts and functions of that office. The Scriptural facts pertaining to the apostolate of Paul and of the Twelve are strikingly similar. Christ personally called the Twelve, as by miraculous personal manifestation he called Paul. He trained and exercised the Twelve in a preliminary period of instruction and of itinerant practice in preaching, as he similarly trained and practiced Paul. Not until the Twelve were specially endowed with the gifts of the Holy Ghost, and were called by Him, did they enter upon the exercise of apostolic functions. And not until Paul was now similarly endowed and called by the Holy Ghost did his work as an apostle begin. Thus Paul's experience corresponds precisely with that of the Twelve. Only his natural gifts and acquired culture were superior, and his special training during his retirement and early ministry occupied a longer period. So that his whole preparation was more thorough and complete, as demanded by the higher, broader work with which he was intrusted by the Master.

2. In this transaction we see also the agency of the Church at Antioch joined with that of the Holy Ghost. This double agency, the human with the Divine, is employed simply and only in connection with a work. This action of the Church had reference to a work to be done by those previously appointed of God to the office. The act of laying on of hands was designed not to confer the Spirit nor to impart authority, but was a sign in recognition of the Spirit's appointment and of his designation to this mission. And for the wisest reasons, the same combined agencies are always demanded in the actual sending forth to the ministry of the gospel. A brotherhood of believers, either directly or through their official leaders and representatives, must have reasonable assurance of a Divine call to the office, before they can properly set apart and send forth any to actual service in the ministry of Christ. And none may rightly go forth to such ministry except through the warrant of such double sending of the Spirit and the Church. So it is said here, that the Church sent them away; yet it is immediately added, "they, being sent forth by the Holy Ghost, departed."

4, 5. Their Missionary Ministry is begun at Salamis in the Island of Cyprus.—From Seleucia, fifteen miles distant from Antioch, Barnabas and Saul sailed to Cyprus, landing at Salamis, a chief city on the eastern side. B.—As Antioch had been chosen as the second resting-place of the Church because of its Gentile character, it was natural that the missionaries should be guided by the Holy Ghost, not eastward, to the land of primitive history and of the springs of Judaism, but to the west, where lay the Gentile world with its intellect, and its arts, and its arms, to be won for the gospel of Christ. Westward—but whither? As they stood on the coast looking seaward, the native island of Barnabas lifted its blue hills in the horizon. The guidance of the Spirit fell in with the yearnings of the apostle's heart, and Salamis in Cyprus witnessed the opening of the first missionary teaching. A.

Cyprus lay in a through route to Asia Minor, which was the nearest unvisited sphere of missionary labor, and therefore the next in order according to Christ's command. Cyprus itself had long before, probably soon after Pentecost, received the gospel; and Christian disciples were there. Hence no note occurs of any stay or success there on the part of the two missionaries. Of necessity they passed through the island on their way to the mainland, and they labored as they went. They preached exclusively in the synagogues on this island. And everywhere it was Paul's custom to go first to these Jewish centers, and to stay there until his message was openly rejected. Two reasons he had for this course. There were the Jews, ever the objects of

Island of Cyprus. (About 140 miles long, with a breadth of 40 miles for its greater portion.)

God's first choice and care, and still, by Christ's command, the first recipients of the glad tidings. And in the synagogues were the Gentile proselytes: men who had renounced heathen notions and practices, and were seeking a knowledge of the true God. These proselytes formed a needed link for a ready transmission of the gospel to the Gentiles. For these reasons, the synagogues afforded the most suitable places and the best opportunities for their Christian ministry.

6-12. The Judgment upon Elymas the Sorcerer, and its Effect upon the Roman Deputy.—Paphos, on the western end of Cyprus, the city where Venus is fabled to have risen from the sea, and noted throughout Greek history as the temple center of her infamous worship, was now the residence of the Roman deputy, or proconsul. Here, and through this chief man, was opened the first door of access to the Gentile world.

Luke's accuracy in the use of the differing titles of the Roman provincial governors is instructive. In consolidating his imperial rule, Augustus, that he might leave some semblance of the old republican authority and yet retain exclusive control of the army, divided the numerous provinces into two classes. The government of one class—the provinces where a peaceful administration could be secured without soldiery—he relinquished to the Senate and people. In the title of the governors of these Senatorial provinces, Proconsul, was reproduced the name of Consul, which had long represented the Senate's administrative power. The second class of provinces was known as the Imperial, and of these Cesar retained absolute control. In these were quartered bodies of military under the command of Cesar's governor. As the Emperor's representative, this governor was called Proprator, from a name (Prætor) long the symbol of supreme personal authority and of military command. He was also called in the larger provinces (as in Syria) the Legate, or commissioner of the Emperor; and in subordinate districts (as in Judea) the Procurator, or high steward. All these distinctions are accurately noted by Luke in both "treatises." Here the term used indicates a proconsul of a senatorial province. And we learn that in 27 B. C. Cyprus had been relinquished by Augustus to the control of the Senate.

This Sergius Paulus is characterized as a man of intelligence. Yet, like many of the Roman patriars of his time, he was credulous because bred in superstition. Reaching out on every side for a larger knowledge of hidden things, he encouraged pretenders to occult learning and professors of the magic arts. Such a one is introduced to us here, a renegade Jew and an impostor, falsely claiming superhuman inspiration and the power of magical working. From him the deputy turns away to these new teachers, in his unsatisfied thirst for a fuller disclosure of truth. Seeing how strongly the proconsul is impressed by the words of the apostles, this Bar-jesus (in the Arabic form, Elymas), the magian or wise man (rather than sorcerer), interposed with sophistries and denials to counteract the effect of truth from heaven. But this form of opposition, like that of violent persecution, is also overruled by God as a means of greater good. Where truth and falsehood are in open conflict, as here, the result is never doubtful; for truth is God's, and He will maintain its supremacy.

An issue so sharply made, between the two respective agents of the Evil Spirit and of the Holy Ghost, needs at this important juncture an instant and decisive settlement. Therefore, by inspiration, Paul in the presence of the governor at once denounces this Bar-jesus, or son of the Saviour, as the child of the devil. This apostate Jew, who was accounted by cultured yet deceived Romans as a revealing seer and sage, the apostle charges with an excess of deceit and mischief; declaring that he is an enemy and perverter of all truth and righteousness. And he pronounces God's instant judgment upon his daring impiety in withstanding the truth. The fulfillment of this judgment of temporary blindness followed. So the evil spirit in the person of Elymas was vanquished by the good through the agency of Paul. And the punishment so suited to the offense—the seeking to blind others—suited too to the reformation of the offender, was also adapted to impress and convince the lookers-on. It so affected the governor that he received the word of Paul as the word of life. Whether he became a personal convert and Christian disciple, we are not informed ; but the inference that he did so acknowledge Christ is a reasonable one.

The fact, merely, of the apostle's change of name, from Saul to Paul, is here stated. So long as restricted to labor among the Jews, he retained the Hebrew name, Saul. Throughout his apostolic ministry to the Gentiles, he was known under the Latin and Hellenistic equivalent name of Paul. The change is noted here at the turning-point of his life and work, in direct connection with the first prominent Gentile convert. As double names are common in the New Testament among Jewish disciples, both names may have been his from infancy. But from thenceforth onward, upon the name and ministry of PAUL is concentrated the deepest thought, the highest, most grateful appreciation of Christian believers in every age.

13. From Cyprus to Perga. Return of John Mark.—From the island home of Barnabas they sailed northward to the mainland of Asia Minor ; up the river Cestrus seven miles to Perga, in the district or province of Pamphylia. This region adjoined Cilicia, in whose chief city Paul was born ; and in the principal portions of which he had previously labored among the Jews. It is no longer Barnabas and Saul, but Paul and his company, or those around him ; intimating his new central position and prominence, which continued to the end of his career.

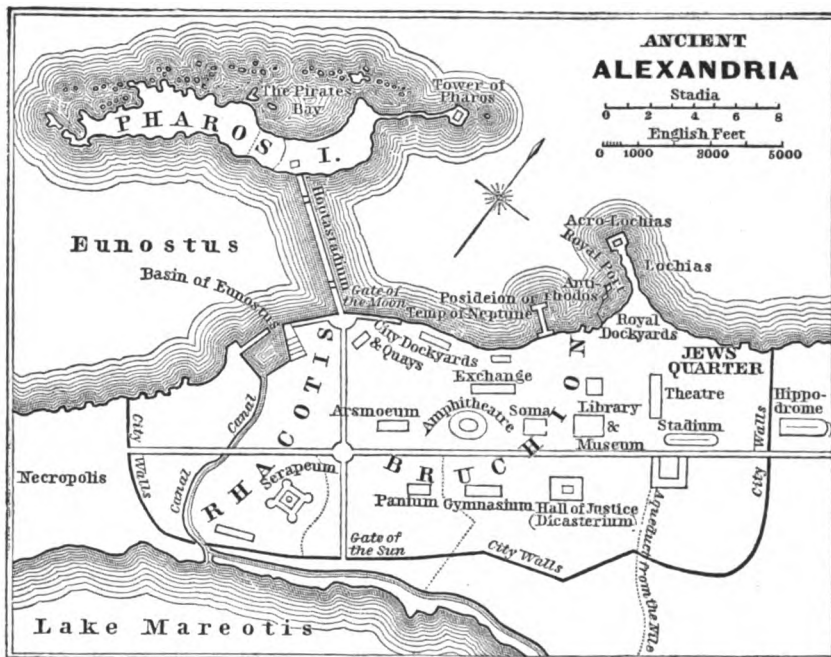

John, whose surname was Mark (the author of the gospel), had accompanied Barnabas and Saul on their return from Jerusalem to Antioch. As their assistant he had gone with them through Cyprus and as far as Perga. Now he leaves them for his mother's home at Jerusalem. Whether discouraged at the prospect of privation and peril, or dissatisfied with the transfer of leadership from his uncle, Barnabas, to the younger Paul, or whether the double attraction of an older and stronger attachment, to his mother and to Peter his father in the faith, drew him back to Jerusalem, can not be determined. That Barnabas justified his departure, while Paul regarded it as unjustifiable, we learn from the subsequent quarrel and separation of these two missionaries, occasioned by Mark's withdrawal. The incident with its sequel illustrates the old lesson of human infirmity as characterizing the best of Christian men. It is pleasant to know that afterward Mark worked so heartily with Paul that, at the close of his ministry, this apostle expressed his highest esteem for the evangelist, and the warmest appreciation of his helpfulness. B.

SUMMARY OF HISTORICAL FACTS BEARING UPON THE MISSIONARY CAREER OF PAUL.

1. Greek Element in the Providential Preparation.—Two of the monarchical lines, descended from Alexander's generals, were the Ptolemies, or the Greek kings of Egypt, and the Seleucidæ, or the Greek kings of Syria. Their respective capitals, Alexandria and Antioch, became the metropolitan centers of commercial and civilized life in the East. Both became the residences of Roman governors, and both were patriarchates of the primitive Church. But before they had received either the Roman discipline or the Christian doctrine, they had served their appointed purpose of spreading the Greek language and habits, of creating new lines of commercial intercourse by land and sea, and of centralizing in themselves the mercantile life of the Levant. The Acts of the Apostles remind us of the traffic of Antioch with Cyprus and the neighboring coasts, and of the sailing of Alexandrian corn-ships to the more distant harbors of Malta and Puteoli.

Of all the Greek elements which the cities of Antioch and Alexandria were the means of circulating, the spread of the language is the most important. That language, which is the richest and most delicate that the world has seen, became the language of theology. The Greek tongue became to the Christian more than it had been to the Roman or the Jew. H.—Those remains which have come down to us are especially rich in the expressions of spiritual truth, and in terms which are adapted to illustrate the Bible, so that, though the doctrines of the gospel are new and divine, hardly a term required to be modified in order to adapt this language to the purpose of expressing them. In the time of Christ whatever was written in Greek became accessible to all who, by their religion (as the Jews), or their intelligence (as the Greeks), or their power (as the Romans), gave character to their age, or conferred distinction on their nation. J. A.

2. The Roman Element.—Rome's dominion was not a pervading influence exerted by a restless and intellectual people, but it was the grasping power of an external government. The idea of law had grown up with the growth of the Romans ; and wherever they went they carried it with them. Wherever their armies were marching or encamping, there always attended them, like a mysterious presence, the spirit of the city of Rome. Universal conquest and permanent occupation were the ends at which they aimed. Strength and organization were the characteristics of their sway. Greek science and commerce were wafted by irregular winds from coast to coast ; but Roman legions, governors, and judges advanced along Roman roads, which pursued their undeviating course over plains and mountains, and bound the city to the farthest extremities of the provinces. When all parts of the civilized world were bound together in one empire—when one common organization pervaded the whole—when channels of communication were everywhere opened—when new facilities of traveling were provided—then the Messiah came. The Greek language had already been prepared as a medium for preserving and transmitting the doctrine ; the Roman Government was now prepared to help the progress even of that religion which it persecuted. The manner in which it spread through the provinces is well exemplified in the life of Paul : his right of citizenship rescued him in Judea and in Macedonia ; he converted one governor in Cyprus, was protected by another in Achaia, and was sent from Jerusalem to Rome by a third.

3. The Jewish Element: The Dispersion.—As the intellectual civilization of the Greeks and the organizing civilization of the Romans had, through a long series of remarkable events, been brought in contact with the religious civilization of the Hebrews, so the dispersion of the Jewish people made this contact almost universal in every part of the empire. Their dispersion began early, though early and late their attachment to Judea has always been the same. The first scattering of the Jews was compulsory, and began with the Assyrian exile, when, about the time of the building of Rome, natives of Galilee and Samaria were carried away by the Eastern monarchs; and this was followed by the Babylonian exile, when the tribes of Judah and Benjamin were removed at different epochs. H.—In Babylon and the neighboring region a multitude of them had remained after the close of the captivity. A colony of them had been planted at Alexandria by its founder, and there they became so numerous as to occupy two out of the five sections of the city, but were not confined to these quarters. In Egypt, in the first century of our era, there were not less than a million of Jews, constituting an eighth part of the population of the country. In the flourishing city of Cyrene they formed a large portion of the inhabitants. Nowhere, outside of Palestine, was the Jewish population more numerous than in Syria and Asia Minor. At Antioch they constituted a powerful body, and enjoyed there privileges analogous to those of their brethren at Alexandria. From Syria they passed over into Asia Minor, forming settlements in all the principal towns. Besides the natural emigration from Syria, Antiochus the Great had transplanted to that region two thousand Jewish families from Mesopotamia. Among other places, Ephesus and Tarsus were noted seats of Jewish communities. In Crete, Cyprus, and other islands, there were synagogues crowded with worshipers. From Asia the Jews had found their way into the cities of Macedonia and Greece. Athens, Corinth, Thessalonica, Philippi, are among the places where were Jewish settlements. Jews were found in Illyricum, and early penetrated to the northern coasts of the Black Sea. The Jewish prisoners brought by Pompey to Rome afterward received their freedom. The district across the Tiber was principally occupied by them. An embassy of Herod to Augustus is said to have been accompanied by eight thousand Jewish residents of Rome. Among other towns of Italy, Caprea, and especially Puteoli, are known to have had a Jewish population. Apart from permanent residents of Hebrew extraction, Jewish merchants made their way to every place in the Roman Empire where there was any hope of profit from trade. Thus the Palestinian community, though still the religious center of all the Jews, comprised within its limits only a portion of this ubiquitous nation. Capable of making a home for himself anywhere, the Jew was specially adapted to the state "which was to be built on the ruins of a hundred living polities." G. P. F.

Provinces of Asia Minor.

(There are twelve divisions of Asia Minor commonly recognized. Three were on its southern coast, Cilicia, Pamphylia, Lycia; three on its western, Caria, Lydia, Mysia; three on its northern, Bithynia, Paphlagonia, Pontus; and three in the interior, Cappadocia, Galatia, Phrygia. Caria, Lydia, and Mysia constituted the Roman province of Asia, and it is in this limited sense that the word Asia is used in the New Testament—e. g., Acts 2: 9; 16: 6, 7. The seven churches in Asia (Rev. 1: 4) accordingly were in this region, viz.: Ephesus, Smyrna, Pergamos, Thyatira, Sardis, Philadelphia, and Laodicea, though the last named was in Phrygia, and therefore farther inland than the rest. W. H. G.—After the Roman provincial system was established in Asia Minor, the boundaries of the provinces were variable. The two districts, Pisidia and Lycania, mentioned Acts 13 and 14, were politically attached to one or other of the contiguous provinces. Yet each had its chief town, which had been its capital: Antioch in Pisidia, and Iconium in Lycania. B.)

Acts xiii. 14-52.

14 BUT when they departed from Perga, they came to Antioch in Pisidia, and went into the 15 synagogue on the sabbath day, and sat down. And after the reading of the law and the prophets the rulers of the synagogue sent unto them, saying, Ye men and brethren, if ye 16 have any word of exhortation for the people, say on. Then Paul stood up, and beckoning 17 with his hand said, Men of Israel, and ye that fear God, give audience. The God of this people of Israel chose our fathers, and exalted the people when they dwelt as strangers in 18 the land of Egypt, and with an high arm brought he them out of it. And about the time of 19 forty years suffered he their manners in the wilderness. And when he had destroyed seven 20 nations in the land of Chanaan, he divided their land to them by lot. And after that he gave unto them judges about the space of four hundred and fifty years, until Samuel the 21 prophet. And afterward they desired a king: and God gave unto them Saul the son of 22 Cis, a man of the tribe of Benjamin, by the space of forty years. And when he had re-

23 moved him, he raised up unto them David to be their king; to whom also he gave testimony, and said, I have found David the son of Jesse, a man after mine own heart, which shall fulfil all my will. Of this man's seed hath God according to his promise raised unto Israel a Saviour, Jesus :

24 When John had first preached before his coming the baptism of repentance to all the 25 people of Israel. And as John fulfilled his course, he said, Whom think ye that I am? I am not he. But, behold, there cometh one after me, whose shoes of his feet I am not 26 worthy to loose. Men and brethren, children of the stock of Abraham, and whosoever 27 among you feareth God, to you is the word of this salvation sent. For they that dwell at Jerusalem, and their rulers, because they knew him not, nor yet the voices of the prophets 28 which are read every sabbath day, they have fulfilled them in condemning him. And though they found no cause of death in him, yet desired they Pilate that he should be slain.
29 And when they had fulfilled all that was written of him, they took him down from the tree, 30 and laid him in a sepulchre. But God raised him from the dead: and he was seen many 31 days of them which came up with him from Galilee to Jerusalem, who are his witnesses 32 unto the people. And we declare unto you glad tidings, how that the promise which was 33 made unto the fathers, God hath fulfilled the same unto us their children, in that he hath raised up Jesus again; as it is also written in the second psalm, Thou art my Son, this day 34 have I begotten thee. And as concerning that he raised him up from the dead, now no more to return to corruption, he said on this wise, I will give you the sure mercies of David.
35 Wherefore he saith also in another psalm, Thou shalt not suffer thine Holy One to see corrup-36 tion. For David, after he had served his own generation by the will of God, fell on 37 sleep, and was laid unto his fathers, and saw corruption: but he, whom God raised again, saw no corruption.

38 Be it known unto you therefore, men and brethren, that through this man is preached 39 unto you the forgiveness of sins: and by him all that believe are justified from all things, 40 from which ye could not be justified by the law of Moses. Beware therefore, lest that 41 come upon you, which is spoken of in the prophets; behold, ye despisers, and wonder, and perish: for I work a work in your days, a work which ye shall in no wise believe, though 42 a man declare it unto you. And when the Jews were gone out of the synagogue, the Gen-43 tiles besought that these words might be preached to them the next sabbath. Now when the congregation was broken up, many of the Jews and religious proselytes followed Paul and Barnabas: who, speaking to them, persuaded them to continue in the grace of God.

44 And the next sabbath day came almost the whole city together to hear the word of God.
45 But when the Jews saw the multitudes, they were filled with envy, and spake against those 46 things which were spoken by Paul, contradicting and blaspheming. Then Paul and Barnabas waxed bold, and said, It was necessary that the word of God should first have been spoken to you: but seeing ye put it from you, and judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting 47 life, lo, we turn to the Gentiles. For so hath the Lord commanded us, saying, I have set thee to be a light of the Gentiles, that thou shouldest be for salvation unto the ends of 48 the earth. And when the Gentiles heard this, they were glad, and glorified the word of 49 the Lord: and as many as were ordained to eternal life believed. And the word of the 50 Lord was published throughout all the region. But the Jews stirred up the devout and honourable women, and the chief men of the city, and raised persecution against Paul and 51 Barnabas, and expelled them out of their coasts. But they shook off the dust of their feet 52 against them, and came unto Iconium. And the disciples were filled with joy, and with the Holy Ghost.

THE promise goes beyond "pardon," and proclaims "justification" as the portion of every man who believes. When "justified" as well as "pardoned," we are taken up to the level of the unfallen and sinless; nay, we are treated according to the character and deservings of Him through whom the justification comes. We are made to stand where he stands, and to receive the righteous favor which he receives. Yes; we are justified from all things. Our whole person is accepted; and everything, great or small, that was against us is taken out of the way. All this simply in believing! Not working, nor feeling, nor striving, nor wrestling, but simple believing. It is our believing that introduces us into the condition of justified men; it is this believing that God acknowledges; it is this believing that the conscience responds to; for that which we believe is the one justifying thing, the one thing which is well-pleasing to God, and which pacifies the conscience. We have to do with a propitiation completed on the Cross. In crediting God's testimony to that propitiation, we have pardon; and in accepting the promise annexed to the testimony, we know that we have it; because God is true. Bonar.

14. The Pisidian Antioch lay a hundred miles north of Perga, on the central table-land. Like the Syrian Antioch, it was founded by Seleucus Nicator, one of the four successors to Alexander's divided kingdom, and named after his father, Antiochus. It was a considerable city, and had been made by Augustus a Roman colony. Its previous history, and the added distinction conferred upon it by the emperor, together with its connections with the east and west, rendered it a point of great importance in the extension and establishment of the Christian Church. Here, as in every considerable place in the Roman Empire, Jews formed part of the population, with Greeks, Romans, and natives. And, though few (as indicated by their single synagogue), they possessed great influence, and had made many proselytes, especially among Gentile women. This marked influence of the Jews appears in all the events of Paul's missionary career. On the first Sabbath in Antioch the Christian missionaries, as usual, first sought the synagogue. B.

15, 16. There are certain traditional peculiarities which have doubtless united together by a common resemblance the Jewish synagogues of all ages and countries. The arrangement for the women's places in a separate gallery, or behind a partition of lattice-work; the desk in the center, where the reader, like Ezra, may "open the book in the sight of all the people"; the carefully closed Ark (on the side of the building nearest to Jerusalem) for the preservation of the rolls or manuscripts of the law; the seats all round the building, whence "the eyes of all them that are in the synagogue" may be "fastened" on him who speaks; the "chief seats," which were appropriated to the "ruler" or "rulers" of the synagogue, according as its organization might be more or less complete—these are some of the features of a synagogue, which agree at once with the notices of Scripture, the descriptions in the Talmud, and the practice of modern Judaism. On their entrance into the building, the four-cornered Tallith was first placed like a veil over the head, or like a scarf over the shoulders. The prayers were then recited by an officer called the "Angel" or "Apostle" of the assembly. The sacred roll of manuscript was handed from the Ark to the Reader by the Chazan, or "minister," and then certain portions were read according to a fixed cycle, first from the Law and then from the Prophets. The Reader stood while thus employed, and all the congregation sat around. The manuscript was rolled up and returned to the Chazan. Then followed a pause, during which strangers or learned men who had "any word of consolation" or exhortation rose and addressed the meeting. And thus, after a pathetic enumeration of the sufferings of the chosen people or an allegorical exposition of some dark passage of Holy Writ, the worship was closed with a benediction and a solemn "Amen."

To such a worship in such a building a congregation came together at Antioch in Pisidia on the Sabbath which immediately succeeded the arrival of Paul and Barnabas. Proselytes came and seated themselves with the Jews; and among the Jewesses behind the lattice were "honorable women" of the colony. The two strangers entered the synagogue, and, wearing the Tallith, which was the badge of an Israelite, "sat down" with the rest. The prayers were recited, the extracts from "the Law and the Prophets" were read, the "Book" returned to the "Minister," and then we are told that "the rulers of the synagogue" sent to the new-comers, on whom many eyes had already been fixed, and invited them to address the assembly, if they had words of comfort or instruction to speak to their fellow Israelites. The very attitude of Paul, as he answered the invitation, is described to us. He "rose" from his seat, and, with the animated and emphatic gesture which he used on other occasions, "beckoned with his hand." II.

17-39. In its method, this first recorded discourse of Paul resembled that of Peter at Pentecost, and the defense of Stephen. Each of the three speaks as a Jew to Jews; takes the Jewish history and Scriptures as the basis of the doctrines advanced; specially refers to God's choice and conduct and care of Israel, and to the prophetic revelation of a Messiah to come and to suffer; and each declares that the Messiah has come, in the person of Jesus of Nazareth; that he has suffered death and has risen again through the power of God. Paul here outlines the history until David's reign; then abruptly turns from it because he has reached his theme, God's crowning mercy and promise to David, the actual advent of Messiah. He cites the Baptist's testimony (as one well known and accredited by all Jews as a prophet) to Christ's true and sole Messiahship. Then he preaches Jesus and the resurrection, and adds a clear announcement of the central doctrine of Christianity, justification by faith. More sharply than either Peter or Stephen, he contrasts the latter with justification by law.

26-37. "The Word of Salvation" includes the Crucifixion and Resurrection of the Messiah, Jesus.—To you the saving word is sent, he says emphatically, for your sacred prophecies, being exactly fulfilled in his death and resurrection, demonstrate that Jesus is indeed the long-desired Messiah and Redeemer. Yet, he adds with reference to both the crucifiers and the friendly buriers of Christ, unwittingly they fulfilled all that was written of him; and this although the words of the prophets were heard by them every Sabbath. He does not excuse the rulers' guilt, neither does he sharply denounce it. His aim seems to be to press upon his hearers their deeper responsibility in now receiving this knowledge which Christ's crucifiers did not so clearly possess.

With the statement of the two facts (of crucifixion and the resurrection as disclosed in their Scriptures), he proceeds with a broader sweep of thought and in warmer tones of personal feeling to press this word of salvation, or these glad tidings, upon them. Not only was this the tenor of prophetic disclosure, but the sacrificial death and the resurrection, the eternal life and reign of Jesus comprised the very substance and complete fulfillment of God's original and oft-repeated promise to the fathers. This grand point Peter and Stephen had made. From first to last Paul insists upon it. By sacrifice and ceremonial, by prophecy and promise, in history and psalm, through symbol and fact, through dark saying and plain, the entire Old Testament revelation comprises, as its one only theme, Messiah, the Son of God and Son of man, the self-moved offerer, the divinely appointed and accepted offering for the sin of man. His voluntary death, His self-resurrection, His quickening power and eternal sovereignty—these are included in the promise of mercy first to Adam, afterward to Abraham and his descendants, emphatically to David; these comprise the substance of all ancient revelation. They are the facts upon which we rest, and which make the Old Testament one promise of glad tidings, still of vital force and value to all who receive the Christ of God. So Paul teaches here, and so we must believe.

In verses 33 to 37, referring to prophetic promises in the psalms seemingly made to David and concerning him, he shows their higher reference to the resurrection of David's Lord and Son. As matching his own purpose here, in citing from the second psalm (v. 33), we may take Paul's assertion that Christ was "declared to be the Son of God with power by the resurrection of the dead." He shows from further passages that after resurrection Christ shall never die again (as David died and saw corruption), but will live and reign eternally. And in the light of this Messiah's unchangeableness of being, he illustrates the certainty of the mercies promised through him. In all these citations and statements, Paul is only adding to and enforcing the Scriptural proofs of Christ's resurrection and abiding life, because this was the main fact to be substantiated; first, as having been foretold, and next, as having been fulfilled. Upon this, as Paul elsewhere plainly asserts, hangs the entire truth of Christianity, and the sole hope of guilty man.

38, 39. Remission of Sins and Complete Justification from the Condemning Hold of Law, the Sure Result of Faith in this Crucified, Risen, and Reigning Redeemer.—In these and the previous verses we find the germ thoughts of the Epistles to the Romans and the Galatians. The manner in which Paul introduces this root doctrine of justification by faith is in keeping with its vital character. He uses a form of bold and earnest proclamation. He assumes the fact of their sinfulness. He says nothing directly of the way of forgiveness and justification. This he has distinctly hinted at in announcing Christ's death and resurrection as glad tidings, and as the fulfillment of God's great promise of mercy. But he emphasizes the fact that there is re- mission of sin, and deliverance from the law's condemnation, in Christ, through His achieved redemption.

Forgiveness and remission of sins "through this one" (not this man) had been already preached by Peter and others. But they had said nothing about being justified, about a sinner's being accounted righteous, or treated by God as though he were righteous. Righteousness was the great text and theme of the Pharisees. But until this convert from their ranks uttered these words (v. 39), the true relation of a sinner to the law of perfect righteousness had not been expressly stated by any Christian teacher.

Scholars are agreed in changing a translation (v. 39) which seems to teach that the law does justify from some things, and Christ makes up the deficiency. Contrary to this, Paul says: "From all [sins], from which ye could not be justified by the law of Moses, by Him every one who believes is justified." The law justifies from none! Christ justifies the believer from all! Therefore all effort to keep the law as a means of divine acceptance is both useless and evil. Faith, which Christ calls a work, "the work of God" (or that God commands), a simple utter reliance upon His mercy in Christ, this is our part and our only part in the supreme matter of being accounted righteous and so treated by Him.

And this grand vital principle of justification by the heart's faith, now first clearly proclaimed, really gave to the sacrificial system of Moses all its meaning and utility. The sin-offering, prescribed and presented under the law to expiate even the smaller offenses, implied as the condition of its efficacy an underlying sorrow for the offense, and a reliance upon the mercy that accepted a substitute-sufferer in the offender's place. So, strictly speaking and most truly, the law of itself could do nothing for forgiveness or justification. The lawgiver's act alone accepted a substitute for the offender. Thus the Old Testament and the New are in accord upon this vital matter. The Jew, standing upon the ceremonial law of Moses, finds there the New Testament principle of forgiveness through a substituted sacrifice. Only in the ancient offering the victim was a typical one, and a true spiritual deliverance lay in the offerer's faith that God would provide a real and sufficient sacrifice.

Thus far in this first discourse (of which we have at least a complete outline) Paul proves the facts of the gospel from their familiar Scriptures. Earnestly he proclaims Christ's sacrificial death, resurrection, and eternal life, as God's fulfilled promise of grace, and therefore as glad tidings. And he urges their acceptance of this word of salvation, their personal trust in Christ, in order that they may be delivered from the law's condemning power. Jesus Christ, he says, is the Messiah of ancient promise.

In exact fulfillment of your inspired prophecies, He lived and died, He rose and lives for ever! Then, believe in Him! Or, if you will not believe, then beware! His closing word of warning, which, like Peter, he foreknows will be needful, is taken from Hab. 1 : 5. The original prediction had been fulfilled by the Chaldees upon their fathers. He uses it again, thus strongly enforced by one fulfillment, to impress the tremendous peril impending over them. In little more than twenty years its second fulfillment came upon the whole Jewish people, for they renewed their rejection of God's mercy in the person and saving work of His own incarnate, risen, and reigning Son.

42, 43. The Earnest Request and the Private Conference that followed Paul's First Discourse.—According to the better reading, all who had heard (as they were leaving the synagogue) besought him to repeat his teaching on the next Sabbath. This request showed an intense interest on the part of the body of Jews and Gentile proselytes in the new doctrine of Paul. In many of both classes, so strong was their instantaneous faith, that they followed Paul and Barnabas to their tarrying-place, in order to receive further instruction. At once recognizing the grace of God that had wrought the faith, the missionaries simply but fervently exhorted these infant converts to continue trusting in and looking for the same Divine grace. This phrase, "grace of God," is here first presented in the large sense of reconciliation and redemption by Christ's saving work. In connection with a reliance upon this grace, the converts were also counseled to distrust and avoid self-righteous attempts at legal obedience. And the whole exhortation was in accordance with the great truths of Paul's discourse.

44, 45. The Immense Gathering of Pagan Gentiles, and the Consequent Envy and Malice of the Jews.—The intervening week had been one of general discussion of the strange doctrines, by all classes in the city. So, when the next Sabbath came, the apostles were greeted with an immense multitude of pagans anxious simply to hear the wonderful words which had been reported. They hungered for truth—"to hear the word of God"; for no mention is made of a single miracle, by which they might have been attracted. And this moving of almost a whole city was the effect of a single sermon, and of its widespread report by Gentile proselytes. Was not this ample assurance that God's time had come, and His purpose in the conversion of the Gentiles was now to be fulfilled?

But the Gentile multitudes, whose presence rejoiced the hearts of the missionaries and their true disciples, only stirred the Jews to envy. B.—Their spiritual pride and exclusive bigotry was immediately roused. They could not endure the notion of others being freely admitted to the same religious privileges with themselves. This was always the sin of the Jewish people. Instead of realizing their position in the world as the prophetic nation for the good of the whole earth, they indulged the self-exalting opinion, that God's highest blessings were only for themselves. H.—And yet their own prophets had declared that the Messiah, "the glory of his people Israel," was also "a light to lighten the Gentiles." Now, inflamed by jealous envy and arrogance, with passionate violence of speech, they railed at and so blasphemed "the word of God spoken by Paul."

46, 47. The First Plain Announcement of God's New "Election" of the Gentiles.—The apostles meet the calumnies and blasphemies of the fanatical Jews with bold and sharp reply. "This Messiah whom you reject," say they, "bade us first utter the word of salvation to you. But since you will not receive it, since by your own act in deliberately rejecting it, you count yourselves unworthy of eternal life, He bids us turn to those who are now heeding his call." The words of self-pronounced verdict have only the simple but terrible severity of truth. They do but anticipate the self-conviction of all once enlightened but finally lost souls in the day of final judgment. They have judged themselves unworthy of everlasting life!

Paul and Barnabas turned from the Jews to the Gentiles in Antioch. And in many other places, this turning was subsequently repeated, and similar scenes were enacted. And now, for more than eighteen hundred years, God's covenant people have turned from their own Messiah, and "through their fall salvation is come unto the Gentiles." Yet we know that God hath not utterly "cast away his people" (Rom. 11). They shall be restored to the faith and joy of God, and be incorporated into the grand spiritual kingdom of Messiah on the earth. And, as in the earlier ages they were chosen as the medium of conveying God's light and promises to the world, so in the later ages their conversion shall furnish a sure testimony to the consummation of all prophecy and promise, in the latter-day glory of Messiah as King over all peoples.

48, 49. This Antioch, also, became the center of a widespread and mighty Christian movement under the joint labors of the two apostles and their new disciples. "Throughout all that region the word of the Lord was published." By so extended and successful a work among the Gentiles, first in the city, and afterward in the country around Antioch, did the Holy Ghost honor the very outset of their mission.

As many as were ordained to eternal life believed. The word here employed signifies more than mere disposition or preference. It includes the idea of determination. And the passive form of the word shows that this determination is exercised upon the subject by another. That other can only be, clearly is, God, who "worketh in" the believer "to will and to do." The fact here asserted is the divine disposing of these Gentile believers to eternal life. In this, as in other fuller and more explicit teachings, the intimation is conveyed that all things pertaining to salvation, like all providences bearing upon the earthly life, are ordered and arranged according to the purpose and by the power of God. Believing, then, is the effect of no accident or whim of man, of no purpose originating with man, unmoved from without. "No man can come to me," said Christ, "except the Father draw him." Rightly apprehended and gratefully received, this is a most inspiring and comforting truth.

But the connected truth, indicated in the injunction

"Work out your own salvation," though not referred to here by Luke, always finds place in the exposition of God's working in us. For it intimates that the divine ordering neither annuls nor directly counteracts man's own agency in the matter of salvation, any more than in providences affecting the outward life. Every believer knows that he was won, not arbitrarily forced, to submission to the wiser, better will of God. Except the power of divine grace had first persuasively drawn his heart, he never would have submitted; so that gratitude was blended with gladness in his blessed experience of being "made willing." Both truths—God's determining or working in us, and our yielding yet working out our own salvation—are clearly revealed; the one to impress the supremacy of divine grace, the other to enforce the sense of human responsibility. And the opposite results, of faith and unbelief, may be thus summed up: God's determination, with which man's will is in unison, admits to the everlasting kingdom; while man's own sole inclination and decision excludes from the kingdom. And the personal consideration may be added, that though we can not harmonize the two revealed facts, of God's ordination to life and man's uncontrolled choice of life or death, yet any and every one may practically reconcile them by believing!

50-52. Persecution, instigated by the Jews of Antioch, led the Two Missionaries to Iconium.—This first great success aroused great opposition. So it was ever afterward. "A wide door and many adversaries," is Paul's terse statement of a uniform fact in his entire experience.

The chief cause of offense, in this and subsequent persecutions, was not the preaching of the Cross and the Resurrection. It was the extension, directly and without any condition, to the Gentiles of the divine privileges and promises exclusively claimed by the Jews. This enraged both Jews and proselytes, when they saw the Christian movement spreading widely and the Christian doctrine taking root among the people. It was easy to stir up the female proselytes, and natural to incite them to employ their great influence with the leading men to oppose this new and hated religion. And this fact, often repeated in Paul's history, finds singular corroboration in the statement of a writer (Strabo) familiar with the region of western Asia. He expressly states that in religious opinions the influence of the women was controlling with the men.

From the systematic persecution thus brought against the apostles, they retired to Iconium, on the western border of Lyconia, and on the confines of Pisidia, Galatia, and Phrygia. Not through fear, but in accordance with the express instructions of Christ, they withdrew, in companionship with their invisible Lord. But the persecution that compelled them to flee did not harm the Church they had planted. The same Lord who went with the rejoicing apostles to Iconium, remained with the new disciples at Antioch; so that they, too, were filled with joy in the Holy Ghost.

Persecution can not injure the cause or set back the course of truth. The periods of sorest trial have often been those of greatest progress to the Church. Opposition stimulates true Christian principle; it nerves courage and strengthens faith by evoking the prayer that brings the power of the Holy Ghost. B.

Section 213.

Acts xiv. 1-28.

1 AND it came to pass in Iconium, that they went both together into the synagogue of the 2 Jews, and so spake, that a great multitude both of the Jews and also of the Greeks be-
 3 lieved. But the unbelieving Jews stirred up the Gentiles, and made their minds evil affected 4 against the brethren. Long time therefore abode they speaking boldly in the Lord, which 5 gave testimony unto the word of his grace, and granted signs and wonders to be done by 6 their hands. But the multitude of the city was divided: and part held with the Jews, and 7 part with the apostles. And when there was an assault made both of the Gentiles, and also 8 of the Jews with their rulers, to use them despitefully, and to stone them, they were ware
 9 of it, and fled unto Lystra and Derbe, cities of Lycaonia, and unto the region that lieth 10 round about: and there they preached the gospel.

11 And there sat a certain man at Lystra, impotent in his feet, being a cripple from his 12 mother's womb, who never had walked: the same heard Paul speak: who stedfastly behold-
 13 ing him, and perceiving that he had faith to be healed, said with a loud voice, Stand upright 14 on thy feet. And he leaped and walked. And when the people saw what Paul had done, 15 they lifted up their voices, saying in the speech of Lycaonia, The gods are come down to 16 us in the likeness of men. And they called Barnabas, Jupiter; and Paul, Mercurius, be-17 cause he was the chief speaker. Then the priest of Jupiter, which was before their city, 18 brought oxen and garlands unto the gates, and would have done sacrifice with the people.

19 Which when the apostles, Barnabas and Paul, heard of, they rent their clothes, and ran in 20 among the people, crying out, and saying, Sirs, why do ye these things? We also are 21 men of like passions with you, and preach unto you that ye should turn from these vanities
 22 unto the living God, which made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and all things that are 23 therein: who in times past suffered all nations to walk in their own ways. Nevertheless he 24 left not himself without witness, in that he did good, and gave us rain from heaven, and 25 fruitful seasons, filling our hearts with food and gladness. And with these sayings scarce re-26 strained they the people, that they had not done sacrifice unto them.

27 And there came thither certain Jews from Antioch and Iconium, who persuaded the peo-28 ple, and, having stoned Paul, drew him out of the city, supposing he had been dead. How-29 beit, as the disciples stood round about him, he rose up, and came into the city: and the 30 next day he departed with Barnabas to Derbe. And when they had preached the gospel 31 to that city, and had taught many, they returned again to Lystra, and to Iconium, and 32 Antioch, confirming the souls of the disciples, and exhorting them to continue in the 33 faith, and that we must through much tribulation enter into the kingdom of God. And 34 when they had ordained them elders in every church, and had prayed with fasting, they 35 commended them to the Lord, on whom they believed. And after they had passed through-36 out Pisidia, they came to Pamphylia. And when they had preached the word in Perga, 37 they went down into Attalia: and thence sailed to Antioch, from whence they had been 38 recommended to the grace of God for the work which they fulfilled. And when they were 39 come, and had gathered the church together, they rehearsed all that God had done with 40 them, and how he had opened the door of faith unto the Gentiles. And there they abode 41 long time with the disciples.

STILL, as at first, through much tribulation we must enter into the kingdom of heaven. To that end even our glorious Leader, the Captain of our salvation, is "made perfect," not in the infinite and eternal perfection of his nature, but in the perfectness of his condescending incarnation and mediatorial sympathy—made perfect "through suffering." Sublime mystery of God! Gracious wonder of our redemption! Why should we complain of the sorrow that we ourselves, by our disobedience, have created? of the sorrow that ends, not begins, our real misery? the sorrow that is as much the needed pathway and natural preparation of the joy of immortality with our Lord—joy that no eye hath seen, nor ear heard, nor heart conceived—as the night is the needed preparation of the morning, or hardship the natural path from the wilderness of the far country to the peace of the Father's house? F. D. H.

1-4. The district of Lycaonia extends from the ridges of Mount Taurus and the borders of Cilicia on the south to the Cappadocian hills on the north. It is a bare and dreary region. Of the whole district, Iconium was properly the capital; and the plain round Iconium may be reckoned as its great central space, situated midway between Cilicia and Cappadocia. This plain is spoken of as the largest in Asia Minor. H.—Iconium was a populous city on the western border of Lycaonia, on a main line of communication between east and west. It has had a signal history since, and still exists as Konieh. Its extended connections and intrinsic importance led the apostles to remain for some months, until driven away by the persecuting Jews. (See map, p. 94.)

As at Antioch, the missionaries preached for a "long time" in the synagogue at Iconium. By the grace of Christ (here and throughout the Acts referred to as the Lord), they were enabled so to speak that a great multitude believed. More than this, the same Lord, in testimony of his presence, confirmed their words by miracles "done by their hands." Only here, and some years after at Ephesus, was this special confirmation of many miracles granted to Paul's ministry. In each of these cases, as in every single miracle, there was special call and fitness.

5-7. The wide division of sentiment among the entire population, which followed the long-continued faithful preaching of the apostles, shows what great results that preaching had wrought. Here the Jews succeeded in engaging the rulers and influential Gentiles in the persecution of Paul and Barnabas. Warned of the purpose to assault and stone them, the apostles fled to Lystra, in the interior wilds of Lycaonia. They fled, not from fear, but in obedience to their Lord's direction to continue their work elsewhere. But the seed was largely sown in Iconium. In some hearts it was left to grow; in others, the very persecution that drove the apostles away led to questionings and stirrings of conscience. So opposition helps, as well as hinders, a good cause. At Lystra, and afterward in Derbe, where were no Jews (therefore no synagogue), and but few of the more cultivated Greeks, "they preached the Gospel" for another considerable period. (See map, p. 94.)

healed by Peter, this one had never walked. Aside upon some thoroughfare, he was sitting—not begging, for he asked no alms. At that point, among others, Paul chanced to preach. The man not only heard, but his heart was opened, like Lydia's, to receive the words spoken by Paul. This the apostle saw, when his attention was drawn by the man's intent gaze. And it was in response to the faith in Christ which he discerned in the man's soul, that Paul, in the very spirit and manner of the Master, and under His inspiration, bade him test his faith by the attempt to stand upright. The test was sustained, and the man not only stood, but leaped and walked. The miracle was twofold: The withered members were made perfect, and without any previous practice he instantly put them to their highest exercise and use. So the man's faith led to the healing of the body, in addition to the saving of the soul. It was one of Christ's own familiar works, only done invisibly, through the instrumentality of his honored apostle.

11-13. Worship offered to Paul and Barnabas.—Besides the beneficent effects of the miracle upon the man himself, and in the assurance afforded to the new disciples, it greatly excited the rude superstitious people. Their gods were only deified men; and Jupiter, the mightiest among them, was the tutelary or protecting deity of their city. As was customary, they had honored him by erecting either temple or statue, or both, outside but near the main gate. Mercury was the frequent companion of Jupiter in his expeditions to the earth. According to a then current legend (given at length by Ovid), these two divinities had visited in disguise Lycaon, from whom the name of the district was derived. It was natural, therefore, that this people should think that Jupiter and Mercury had come again to them in the likeness, or disguised forms, of Barnabas and Paul.

14-18. The Missionaries' Intense Repulsion of such Worship, and Paul's Fervid Address.—Rending their garments, as the strongest, most convincing expression of grief and horror, they ran in among priests and people. Then, as soon as attention was gained, Paul first earnestly expostulates, and then preaches such a gospel as they could understand. "We, too, are but men like yourselves, subject to all manner of suffering and disease, and to death! We come not here to receive divine honor, but to tell you of the true God!" From their unreal gods—"their vanities"—he turns their thoughts to the one Jehovah. To these ignorant, uncultured heathen, who deified certain forces of nature, or counted as gods imperfect men, he declares a personal God. This God he reveals as living and life-giving—the architect and builder of the visible universe, the patient ruler and wise disposer of nations, the gracious author of providence, the giver of every good gift. Nature and providence "witness" to the being, the working, and the bounty of such a personal, creative God. This, as Paul afterward wrote (Rom. 1 : 18-21), left them without excuse for their atheism. To no further statement or appeal were they susceptible. No knowledge had they of the Jewish Scriptures. Nor with these rude people could Paul's reasoning upon the facts of natural religion take even that broader grasp with which afterward he sought to reach the more cultured Athenians. Yet, with all that the apostles did and said, they with difficulty checked the proposed offering of sacrifice.

19, 20. The Stoning of Paul and the Departure from Lystra.—The same Jews who had driven the missionaries out of Antioch and Iconium, hearing of their successes, followed them to Lystra. Here they accomplished what they had failed in doing before. Easily persuading these credulous and fickle Lycaonians that the apostles were deceivers, and thus securing their participation, these Jewish emissaries stoned Paul in the streets of Lystra, dragged his supposed lifeless body through the city gate, and cast it forth without the walls. At Iconium, where many miracles were wrought in confirmation of their teaching, they were protected from stoning. Here the one miracle, which had occasioned the paying of divine honors, was followed by this dishonoring treatment, as if to stamp a deeper conviction of the mere humanity of the man they would have worshiped.

They stoned Paul—not Barnabas. Signally is the controlling spirit and fervid zeal of the great Apostle manifest in this exclusive direction of the Jews' fury against Paul. In that affecting summary of his experiences (2 Cor. 11 : 25) he includes this: Once was I stoned! B.—Once he stoned another, and once he was stoned himself. What a crowd of memories must have rushed up when he felt his spirit swooning away under the stone shower! This would seem the echo of his own dread act. Stephen's heroic death must have left its mark deep on the heart of the converted Paul. Arnot.—As the disciples gathered, in grief and doubt, about his ruthlessly handled body, Paul rose up; and, for their confirmation in faith and courage, went with them again into the midst of his foes. That this was a merely natural recovery from so severe a stoning, is scarcely credible. Only God's special shielding protected that frail body from many a vital stroke. And only a supernatural restoration could instantly give back their use to the fearfully bruised members.

In this word, disciples, we have the first mention of converts in Lystra. Among these disciples, and probably one of Paul's converts at this visit, was Timothy. This we learn by comparing Acts 16 : 1 with 2 Tim. 3 : 10, 11, and 1 Tim. 1 : 2.

21-24. Conclusion of the First Missionary Journey.—Derbe, whither they went from Lystra, was the farthest eastern point they visited. Here they rested long, and preached in peace. And Paul's reference in 2 Tim. 3 agrees with the absence of any note by Luke of persecution in Derbe. After making many disciples, they returned homeward on the identical route of their previous journey as far as Perga. They could have taken the direct and much shorter route into the low plain of Cilicia, descending through the pass known as the "Cilician Gates," and have sailed from Tarsus to the Syrian Antioch. But the new disciples needed instruction, comfort, encouragement, and especially organization. Therefore they retrace their steps, and go again to the scenes of their persecution, to Lystra, Iconium, and Antioch (in Pisidia). B.—Their specific task this time was different. They set themselves on this occasion to confirm the souls of the converts, and exhort them as to their subsequent course. The Christians in those places were already born, but they needed to be nourished into strength. The first necessity is to see that they are in Christ, and the next to see that they grow strong in the Lord. Corresponding with their specific object, the burden of the missionaries' preaching this time is, "Continue in the faith." And for the rest,

ANCIENT LYSTRA.

(Lystra is identified with the ruins Bin-bir-Külisseh, at the base of a conical mountain of volcanic structure, named the Karadagh. S.—The present ruins extend over a space of a mile in length and about three quarters of a mile in breadth. Besides a countless number of ruined houses, the ruins of more than twenty large buildings may be counted. Some of these are not seriously injured. It is plainly evident that all these buildings were constructed from the materials of a still more ancient city, and one of great splendor. This home of Timothy is unique for situation, as it must have been beautiful. The view across the plain to the walls of Iconium is extremely picturesque, and the disciple of Paul had but to climb the cliffs above his own house, to enjoy a splendid view of Lycaonia and parts of Cappadocia. L. H. Adams, 1871.)

the warning word rings clearly out, "We must through much tribulation enter into the kingdom of God." Arnot.

This return journey through Pisidia and Pamphylia is memorable for the first record of the appointment of permanent officers, here called Elders, for the teaching and guidance, the comfort and government, of the churches. We have already had an incidental mention of such officers, even in the churches of Judea. Much more did the newly planted churches which Paul and Barnabas were leaving to themselves need to have the means of edification and order complete within themselves; and so they ordained them ELDERS in every church. v.

—Thus the young disciples were not left long without institutions and order. For edification, discipline, and defense, each community was constituted a corporation, and in each corporation elders were ordained. It was on the second visit of the missionaries that this was done. An interval was permitted to elapse that the fittest men might emerge; and already the rule, "Lay hands suddenly on no man," was practiced before it was prescribed. Arnot.

25-27. After tarrying also at Perga, to "preach the word," they sailed from the seaport Attalia, at the mouth of the Cestrus, direct for Antioch, their point of departure. Between two and three years had been occupied in this first missionary tour. Only some of the prominent events, enough to show the character and details of the entire work, are recorded in these two brief chapters. The breadth and depth of the sowing, and the reach and force of the results directly and ultimately achieved, can not be gathered from this mere outline.

The mother Gentile Church, now comprising several churches, was convened to hear "all that God had done with 'its missionaries,' and how he had opened the door of faith unto the Gentiles." This was the first missionary meeting. And the whole Church had concern enough to come together and hear the new and marvelous story. Their interest was intensified by the fact that it was their own venture, as well as the first that had been undertaken among the Gentiles, and that it was a saving effort in behalf of their own peoples. Both the commission of Christ and the call of the Holy Ghost still make the missionary enterprise the cause of the Church, and still put its efficient support upon the conscience and heart of all Christian disciples. The rehearsal of the missionary's work has lost none of its interest to a true-hearted believer or Church. As the Divine agent who supervises and gives success to missions, the Holy Spirit still opens the door of faith unto all peoples to whom He sends preachers of the truth.

28. In Antioch, Paul and Barnabas returned to their old ministry, and remained quietly at their toil for about two years. B.

Section 214.

ACTS XV. 1-29.

- 1 AND certain men which came down from Judæa taught the brethren, and said, Except ye
- 2 be circumcised after the manner of Moses, ye cannot be saved. When therefore Paul and
- 3 Barnabas had no small dissension and disputation with them, they determined that Paul and
- 4 elders about this question. And being brought on their way by the church, they passed
- 5 through Phenice and Samaria, declaring the conversion of the Gentiles: and they caused
- 6 great joy unto all the brethren.
- 7 And when they were come to Jerusalem, they were received of the church, and of the
- 8 apostles and elders, and they declared all things that God had done with them. But there
- 9 rose up certain of the sect of the Pharisees which believed, saying, That it was needful to
- 10 circumcise them, and to command them to keep the law of Moses. And the apostles and
- 11 elders came together for to consider of this matter. And when there had been much dis-
- 12 puting, Peter rose up, and said unto them, Men and brethren, ye know how that a good
- 13 while ago God made choice among us, that the Gentiles by my mouth should hear the word
- 14 of the gospel, and believe. And God, which knoweth the hearts, bare them witness, giving
- 15 them the Holy Ghost, even as he did unto us; and put no difference between us and them,
- 16 purifying their hearts by faith. Now therefore why tempt ye God, to put a yoke upon the
- 17 neck of the disciples, which neither our fathers nor we were able to bear? But we believe
- 18 that through the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ we shall be saved, even as they. Then all
- 19 the multitude kept silence, and gave audience to Barnabas and Paul, declaring what mira-
- 20 cles and wonders God had wrought among the Gentiles by them.
- 21 And after they had held their peace, James answered, saying, Men and brethren, hearken
- 22 unto me: Simeon hath declared how God at the first did visit the Gentiles, to take out of
- 23 them a people for his name. And to this agree the words of the prophets; as it is written,
- 24 After this I will return, and will build again the tabernacle of David, which is fallen down;
- 25 and I will build again the ruins thereof, and I will set it up: that the residue of men might
- 26 seek after the Lord, and all the Gentiles, upon whom my name is called, saith the Lord,
- 27 who doeth all these things. Known unto God are all his works from the beginning of the
- 28 world. Wherefore my sentence is, that we trouble not them, which from among the Gen-

20 tiles are turned to God : but that we write unto them, that they abstain from pollutions of 21 idols, and from fornication, and from things strangled, and from blood. For Moses of old time hath in every city them that preach him, being read in the synagogues every sabbath day.

22 Then pleased it the apostles and elders, with the whole church, to send chosen men of their own company to Antioch with Paul and Barnabas ; namely, Judas surnamed Barsabas, 23 and Silas, chief men among the brethren : and they wrote letters by them after this manner ; The apostles and elders and brethren send greeting unto the brethren which are of the 24 Gentiles in Antioch and Syria and Cilicia : forasmuch as we have heard, that certain which went out from us have troubled you with words, subverting your souls, saying, Ye 25 must be circumcised, and keep the law : to whom we gave no such commandment : it seemed good unto us, being assembled with one accord, to send chosen men unto you with 26 our beloved Barabas and Paul, men that have hazarded their lives for the name of our 27 Lord Jesus Christ. We have sent therefore Judas and Silas, who shall also tell you the same 28 things by mouth. For it seemed good to the Holy Ghost, and to us, to lay upon you no 29 greater burden than these necessary things ; That ye abstain from meats offered to idols, and from blood, and from things strangled, and from fornication : from which if ye keep yourselves, ye shall do well. Fare ye well.

1, 2. The issue raised, first at Antioch (v. 1) and afterward at Jerusalem (v. 5), was vital to Christian faith and experience. Its correct decision involved the very continuance of Christianity in the world. The conflict here begun has never ceased through the ages. Whether salvation is of grace alone, or of grace and human works combined, was, has always been, still is, the question at issue. The result in the one case is spiritual liberty and peace ; in the other, bondage to a formal lifeless ritual, and disquiet in self-righteous working. The issue was rightly decided here ; but sixteen centuries later it had to be decided again, through the apostolic Reformers.

Antioch was the center and life-spring of the evangelical movement among the Gentiles. The form of the question, here first raised, pertained to the relation of these Gentiles to the ancient Jewish ritual. Especially it turned upon the necessity of their circumcision, as the initial rite of admission into the kingdom of God. The parties, who at Antioch made the broad and positive assertion that this rite was an essential condition of salvation, were false brethren ; so Paul declares (Gal. 2). Professed members of the Christian flock, they were yet actuated by nothing higher or other than the baleful spirit of Jewish proselytism. All the way from Jerusalem to Antioch they had come on a self-prompted mission, not to preach the gospel to those who had it not, nor to rejoice with those already rejoicing in the Christian hope, but to counteract the effects of a gospel faithfully preached.

Instantly and sharply Paul (Gal. 2) resisted the intrusion and antagonized the efforts of these false brethren. As fearlessly as before he had encountered the assaults of Jews without, he now meets this new attack from Jews within the fold. He knew that the Jewish believers might properly continue for a time to honor the rite of circumcision as a long familiar obligation ; but that it never had been designed for and could not now be imposed upon Gentile believers. He knew, moreover, that this particular demand was a mere introduction to a larger claim—even the whole cumbrous ceremonial of the law of Moses. To accept this ritual law would be to perpetuate the old covenant upon the ruin of the new. Christ, he knew, had declared the old to be outworn and useless, not to be patched upon with the new and living. The old yoke and burden of ceremonial, Christ had replaced with fresh, glad, living truth, to be learned of Him. By this truth, He had said, the receiving soul would be made free and find rest in Him ! These Judaizing proselyters would take away this freedom and rest. They would despoil the gospel of Christ of all that made it a gospel—a proclamation of glad tidings. They would subvert the foundation of the Christian scheme, by denying the sufficiency of faith in Christ as the sole complete condition of salvation. And Paul further knew that the perpetuation of the Jewish spirit of exclusivism, by making Gentile believers into Jews, would continue to foster among all, Jews and Gentiles, the pride and arrogance which had for centuries cursed and destroyed God's ancient people.

So much at least, as to the first raising of this question at Antioch, we may gather from Paul's own narrative to the Galatians. He sought no counsel, for he needed none to instruct him, and took small part in the after conference. But the question had a vital concern to all believers, then and thenceforth. Many of the Syrian Christians were troubled and unsettled by these persistent Judaizing teachers. For their comfort, nay more, for the future being, not merely the well-being and peace, of the Church in that and in every age, a wise and authoritative decision was essential. So the Church at Antioch and its two great leaders obeyed a special Divine direction to seek such decision from the apostles and the mother Church of the Jews at Jerusalem.

3, 4. A deputation, including Paul and Barnabas, was cordially received at Jerusalem, and the story of the two missionaries rehearsed. This was the first personal interview of the apostles (except Peter and James, Gal. 1 : 18, 19) with Paul, although fourteen years or more had elapsed since his conversion. He speaks (Gal. 2 : 9) of a private interview, in which the great leaders, Peter, John, and James, gave to Barnabas and himself the right hand of fellowship. At this interview, doubtless, Paul narrated for their information the efforts of the Judaizers at Antioch, and how he had successfully opposed them.

5, 6. Very soon the same question was formally presented to the apostolic body. This second time it was brought forward and more broadly stated by comparatively honest Pharisaic believers. "It was essential," they claimed, "that the obligation to observe all the ceremonial law of Moses should be enforced upon all Christian believers, Gentile and Jew." At once the apostles met the issue as one demanding careful and solemn consideration. They assumed no reliance upon their infallibility as apostles, but invited the whole body of Jewish believers to confer with them upon the matter. Only thus could the deliberation be thorough, the decision unanimous and effective.

7-9. Much discussion followed the statement of the question. The sincere Jewish objectors to Paul's free reception of the Gentiles could make this strong case: "God had appointed the ceremonial institutes of Moses, especially circumcision, as a sign of covenant with himself and a seal of admission into his kingdom. He had never repealed these ordinances. Nor had Christ formally abrogated them. Nay, in his person and his teaching he had recognized and honored them." To these points, mainly true, the sufficient answer would be this: "God's appointment of the Mosaic ritual was exclusively for the nation he had chosen, not for the Gentiles. The ceremonial observances were designed exclusively to teach and influence that people, to make Himself known and his saving purpose in Christ, to lead them to obedience and worship, and so fit them for earth and heaven. This he would do by these special symbols, for introductory and temporary use. But, through the misleading blindness and long disobedience of that people, that which he had devised for good they had perverted to evil. All this Christ had abundantly affirmed, and so emphatically implied the repeal of these misused, now actually useless, ceremonies. More than this, He had declared that the truth should make them free from the yoke of ordinances; that true worship was heart worship, without reference to the Temple. And, as a final chief point, the whole law of sacrifice was abrogated by its fulfillment in the death of Christ."

Such might have been the main points of argument presented on either side in the protracted discussion which preceded the address of Peter. Without any assumption of superiority, Peter clearly presents three facts as the unanswerable grounds of a right decision in the matter. The first was that God himself had "a good while ago" introduced the innovation complained of. Fourteen years before, in connection with Peter's special ministry to Cornelius and his company, God, who knew the hearts of those Roman Gentiles, in response to the simple faith he saw in their hearts, had given them the Holy Ghost, his very Pentecostal gift to Jewish believers. He had thus disregarded and so broken down the dividing wall of long effete and meaningless ordinances. Nay, more, to show that God himself had substituted faith for circumcision, Peter affirms that God had purified their hearts by faith; had taken away (without circumcision and by faith) that uncleanness whose taking away had been before only symbolized by circumcision.

10. The second fact (based upon the first), Peter asserts under the form of a direct charge against the Jewish objectors. "You are tempting God, in seeking to put this yoke, which neither you nor your fathers could bear, upon these Gentile disciples, to whom it has never been commanded. Not merely undirected and useless work is this, but by it you are hindering and imperiling, instead of aiding, their salvation." They and their fathers had long felt the law of Moses to be an intolerable burden. Its ceremonials were wearisome and meaningless, and in its moral precepts broken and sanctions incurred they could find no relief for a guilty conscience, no hope of eternal life. The law—they knew by experience—could give the knowledge of sin, but not the knowledge of salvation.

11. With the third fact, he completes their overthrow. Simply, faithfully, as taught by the Spirit of Christ, he declares that for them as Jews, as well as for the Gentiles, the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ is the only thing sufficient, and it alone is sufficient for salvation and eternal life. Thus Peter reaches Paul's conclusion. He too affirms that the Jewish rites, though appointed and long honored of God, are now not essential, not longer binding even upon the Jew. Nay, they are hindering and hurtful; impediments in the way of the gospel.

12. The simple narration of Barnabas and Paul follows the unanswerable facts and appeal of Peter. Paul entered into no argument, nor did he directly touch the question at issue. He only told what wonders of grace God had wrought among the Gentiles, at their hands—how his Spirit had been poured forth—what multitudes had believed, and proved their faith to be divine. And this statement of the effects following upon the simple testimony to the crucified, risen, and reigning Jesus, without word of Temple or sacrifice, of ablution or circumcision, or of any outward ordinance of the Hebrew economy, this was all the part that Paul took in the great Conference at Jerusalem. But his fervent words were intently heeded, and wrought a deep impression upon "the multitude."

13-21. James, "the Lord's brother" (Gal. 1 : 19), to whom Christ specially disclosed himself after his resurrection, closed the discussion. B.—From this time he appears as the head of the Church at Jerusalem, having virtually the character and standing of an apostle. G. P. F.—His high repute for wisdom and excellence had long given him a foremost place in the Church of Jerusalem; while the austere tone of his piety and his strong sympathy with Jewish legalism and prejudice gave him the greatest weight with the Christian Pharisees. His address accorded with these peculiarities of character. He refers to Peter by his Hebrew name, and to the testimony of the Old Testament prophets upon the question before them. Appealing particularly to the prophecy of Amos, he confirms by the word of God the facts of God's working, narrated by Peter and Paul. The passage cited speaks of the typical kingdom of David, and the once stately temple structure as now fallen; and of the spiritual kingdom and Church of the "greater David" that shall rise upon the ruins. It declares that a worldwide, all-inclusive, permanent Christianity shall succeed to the narrow, temporary Jewish system; and so implies that the Jewish is only the preparation for the Christian. And God, the foreknowing and foreplanning, had ordained this from the beginning. His ultimate plan included a Church in which Gentile as well as Jew should receive salvation by faith in the name of his Christ. So, infers James, it is in accordance with this purpose declared by the prophets, that God is now "taking out of the Gentiles a people for his name." Therefore, he concludes, we may not interfere with His work among the Gentiles, by troubling them with ceremonials that He has laid aside.

Thus, in harmony with Peter, James conclusively advocates the exemption of the Gentile Christians from the ritual burdens of the Mosaic law. Only upon certain matters bearing upon educated prejudices and unrecognized sin, he recommends a frank expression of opinion; and this in aid both of Jewish and Gentile believers. The result, embodied in the letter, was the fruit of honest and thorough consideration of the working and the word of God, by good and inspired men. The conference was conducted in the fear of God, without bigotry or assumption on the part of any, but with the simple desire of all to ascertain and declare the mind of God.

22-29. Points in the Letter to the Gentile Churches.—This first written document of the New Testament was necessary, in order that the judgment of the Apostolic Church upon so vital a matter might be accurately conveyed to the entire Gentile world. It was borne by trustworthy messengers—Silas (called Silvanus by Paul) and Judas Barsabas. It was addressed to the Gentile Christians of Syria and Cilicia.

The introduction—much the longest portion—expresses a strong judgment respecting the original parties to the issue now decided by the apostles and brethren. The Pharisaic opponents of Paul and Barnabas are characterized as troublers and subverters of souls—thus sustaining all that Paul says of them to the Galatians. Their demand of circumcision and other legal observances as essential to salvation is declared to be soul-destructive, and their mission wholly unauthorized. For Barnabas and Paul the letter expresses only warm affection, and a deep appreciation of the suffering and self-sacrifice in which they were the pioneers of the great missionary host of Christ. The 28th and 29th verses contain the formal decision of the question submitted. B.

The decision of the Holy Spirit, given them as leaders of the Church, is laid down as the primary and decisive determination on the matter; and their own formal decision follows, as giving utterance and scope to his will and command. A.—The apostles, and those joining with them in this act, claim for their own decision a divine authority, as having been suggested or inspired by the Holy Ghost. J. A. A.—By this decision, the apostles and Church at Jerusalem—the natural guardians of whatever it might have been right to preserve in the ancient dispensation—gave their solemn and final approval to that version of the gospel which Paul had preached by the revelation given to him. The emancipation of the Gentile converts from Jewish rites involved far more than their personal liberty. It abolished that separation of the race of Israel from the other nations, of which circumcision was the sign and seal; and, in place of the divine favor of which they boasted as the sons of Abraham, acceptance with God was offered to Jew and Gentile in common through the new spiritual bond of faith in Christ. And, as the speech of Peter declares, this view of the gospel was of no less vital moment to the Jew than to the Gentile. If the Jewish believers were thrown back on the Jewish law, and gave up the free and absolute grace of God, the Law became a mere burden, just as heavy to the Jew as it would be to the Gentile. The only hope for the Jew was in a Saviour who must be the Saviour of mankind. S.

Four things they recommend the Gentile Christians to abstain from. Three of these touched merely the law of charity and kindness as between Gentile and Jew. They were: the use of meats that had been offered in sacrifice to idols; the blood of slaughtered animals, often used at idol feasts; and things strangled, or cattle that had not been slaughtered but suffocated in their blood. There were two reasons for the prohibition of these things, which in themselves were not sinful. First and chiefly, out of proper regard to the educated prejudices of the Jews, who detested and were scandalized by these idol sacrifices and methods of preparing them. Secondly, the restrictions were greatly helpful to the Gentiles also. They aided in disentangling them from the old connections of heathenism, and in breaking the force of life-long idolatrous customs. The fourth prohibition respects a positive sin, yet is here classed with things indifferent. No more striking proof than this do we find of the utter lapse of morality itself out of the heathen systems of religion. For no form of personal impurity was in these systems counted a sin. Obviously upon this point there was necessity for the instruction of Gentile believers, and the awakening of a conscience of sin respecting this matter of "fornication." And proper deference to the Jews also required this restriction, for they were scrupulously sensitive to the crime of unchastity. B.

This letter is a model of Christian toleration. It is not weighted with anathemas: it does not even use the tone of command: it is not the promulgation of a decree. After explaining the cause of the disputation, it goes no further than to tell the churches they would do well to conform to the resolutions passed at Jerusalem. The letter recognizes the inspiration of the Holy Spirit as shared by all who took part in the council. De P.

Section 215.

ACTS xv. 30-41; xvi. 1-12.

30 So when they were dismissed, they came to Antioch: and when they had gathered the 31 multitude together, they delivered the epistle: which when they had read, they rejoiced for 32 the consolation. And Judas and Silas, being prophets also themselves, exhorted the brethren 33 with many words, and confirmed them. And after they had tarried there a space, they 34 were let go in peace from the brethren unto the apostles. Notwithstanding it pleased Silas 35 to abide there still. Paul also and Barnabas continued in Antioch, teaching and preaching the word of the Lord, with many others also.

36 And some days after Paul said unto Barnabas, Let us go again and visit our brethren in 37 every city where we have preached the word of the Lord, and see how they do. And 38 Barnabas determined to take with them John, whose surname was Mark. But Paul thought not good to take him with them, who departed from them from Pamphylia, and went not 39 with them to the work. And the contention was so sharp between them, that they departed asunder one from the other: and so Barnabas took Mark, and sailed unto Cyprus; 40 and Paul chose Silas, and departed, being recommended by the brethren unto the grace of 41 God. And he went through Syria and Cilicia, confirming the churches.

1 Then came he to Derbe and Lystra: and, behold, a certain disciple was there, named Timotheus, the son of a certain woman, which was a Jewess, and believed; but his father
2 was a Greek: which was well reported of by the brethren that were at Lystra and Iconium.
3 Him would Paul have to go forth with him; and took and circumcised him because of the 4 Jews which were in those quarters: for they knew all that his father was a Greek. And as they went through the cities, they delivered them the decrees for to keep, that were 5 ordained of the apostles and elders which were at Jerusalem. And so were the churches established in the faith, and increased in number daily.

6 Now when they had gone throughout Phrygia and the region of Galatia, and were for-7 bidden of the Holy Ghost to preach the word in Asia, after they were come to Mysia, they 8 assayed to go into Bithynia: but the Spirit suffered them not. And they passing by Mysia 9 came down to Troas. And a vision appeared to Paul in the night; There stood a man of 10 Macedonia, and prayed him, saying, Come over into Macedonia, and help us. And after he had seen the vision, immediately we endeavored to go into Macedonia, assuredly gathering 11 that the Lord had called us for to preach the gospel unto them. Therefore loosing from 12 Troas, we came with a straight course to Samothracia, and the next day to Neapolis; and from thence to Philippi, which is the chief city of that part of Macedonia, and a colony: and we were in that city abiding certain days.

THE collision of natural affection in Barnabas with the somewhat unchastened, untempered zeal of Paul produced a contention between them. Sharp words passed and mutual recriminations, and the feelings of both parties were exasperated—alas! so much so that they found it impossible to work together; they must henceforth choose different spheres of duty. How? Are these apostles? Are these two of God's most eminent saints? Are these two eminent pillars of the Church of Christ? Yes, apostles, and saints, and pillars, not as our fancy portrays them, nor as they are now, in the calm and deep repose of Paradise, but as they were in the struggles and collisions of daily life. E. M. G.—Since this incident did occur, it is good that it is recorded; since, if it gives us much to lament, it gives us not a little to learn. It humbles us to perceive the relatively small, but not the less disfiguring, blemish on such revered countenances. Frequently the best men are sadly inconsistent; and, even in the most eminent Christian, nature at times is stronger than education! And this first dispute of which we read in the annals of God's kingdom, by what a countless number of others has it been followed in later ages, frequently from causes yet more trifling. Van O.

30, 31. The Reading of the Letter, and its Happy Effects upon the Gentile Christians.—It was not the requisitions of the apostolical epistle that excited joy at Antioch, but the comforting assurance that their faith was not vain, or their souls in jeopardy. J. A. A.—The Gentiles were confirmed in their freedom from the ceremonial law; and the yoke of that law was broken for the Jewish believers. Unity and peace were established between Jew and Gentile; and both were indoctrinated anew, with fresh authority from the Holy Ghost, in the blessed simplicity and pure spirituality of the Gospel of Christ.

Thus, once and for all time, was decided the question of spiritual liberty or bondage, of grace or works. The full points and reasonings of the decision are found in Paul's matchless Epistles to the Romans, the Corinthians, and the Galatians. And the world has needed them. For centuries without them, it relapsed into a civilized idolatry and barbarism. Brought again into the light at the Reformation, they have proved their power afresh for these three hundred years. And they are needed, above all needs of humanity beside, in all their blessed power to-day!

35. Returning from Jerusalem with Silas and Judas, Paul and Barnabas resumed for a short period their customary labors in Antioch and the adjacent region of Syria.

Gal. 2 : 11-21. Peter's Temporary Weakness and Defection at Antioch.—During this interval, according to the order of Paul's narrative, occurred that strange conduct of Peter, for which Paul felt constrained publicly to rebuke the older apostle. With the thrice-uttered monitory question and solemn charge of his risen Lord graven on his soul, with all the special help and continuous inworking of the Holy Ghost, and even after many years of unflinching boldness under the severest tests of fidelity, yet here, for a very brief period, we find Peter enacting over again the old cowardice and dissimulation. This he did by disowning his own recent intense protest in the Council; by trampling under foot the Gospel principles respecting social intercourse with Gentiles, which he had so long and so signally illustrated in his practice. On his first arrival at Antioch he fellowshipped freely with Gentile believers. But to gratify certain brethren by complying with their strong Jewish prejudices—and this out of mere deference to their high position in the Church at Jerusalem—Peter withdrew from the society of the Gentiles. There was here no question of a wise expediency, or of proper consideration for tender consciences, respecting things non-essential. As it had been long years before, his yielding was prompted solely by a weak fear of man. And not only did he withdraw, but he led others, including even Barnabas, to withdraw with him; and Paul charges them all with "playing the hypocrite" in the matter. Such conduct was peculiarly reprehensible, as promoting a divisive influence at this most critical period in the introduction of Christianity. It was a positive sanction, by one who had long been the foremost of the Apostles, of the very heresy that the Jewish council had just condemned; viz.: that circumcision, and not faith, was essential to salvation. And this heresy was now, in every place, assaulting and endangering the life of the infant Church.

While Paul's rebuke was personal, it went argu-mentatively to the very heart of the question at issue. In its complete statement of the essential principles of the Gospel as compared with the Law, it presents a grand epitome of his chief Epistles. That the rebuke was rightly received, and was effectual in reinforcing Peter's courage and faith, and so restoring him to fidelity, is evident. For in one of his own letters he refers to "the Epistles of our beloved brother Paul," "Epistles in one page of which his own censure is recorded." But, temporary as was this defection of one so thoroughly taught and tried, it is a strange sad story. It impresses a fact and points a warning that may well be pondered by the best, the strongest, and most active Christian soul!

36-39. The Quarrel between Paul and Barnabas.—This second painful occurrence followed not long after. It was a sharp personal discussion, in which each had some reason on his side, yet both were faulty. They only proved that they were, as they had said to the Lystrans, men of like passions as others. The plain story of imperfection indicates an authentic and honest record. It suggests a strong presumption of the truth of the narrative, as well as the genuine earnestness and positive convictions of the men. Good men they were; both set apart by the Holy Ghost; old friends and long work-fellows in eminent service, signally honored and prospered of God. Yet, in connection with the proposed renewal of this very work for God and man, they quarreled—nay, more, they finally parted asunder.

It was a matter bearing upon personal peculiarities that led to the quarrel. Paul's ever unyielding principle could make no allowance for what seemed to be, and probably was, weakness in John Mark. Barnabas, who had just before himself yielded to Peter's wrong example, could more readily overlook Mark's weakness. His love, too, to his young kinsman, who had now returned from Jerusalem ready for toil, and his strong desire to have Mark permanently engaged in Christian work, joined possibly with some remaining vigor of the old nature, led him to persist to the point of entire separation from Paul.

But God overruled the result to double the work and the workmen. Instead of two went forth four; and into two fields of labor, instead of one. And no bitterness was left behind, for we find Paul afterward speaking of Barnabas as his equal in active and successful toil; and of Mark as his "fellow-laborer," "profitable to the ministry," and a "comfort" to himself. We may add, that good men as well as earnest missionaries have differed ever since. And, as here, God has forborne with their imperfections, and in many cases He has wrought a greater good out of their personal differences.

While we have no record of the labors of Barnabas and Mark in Cyprus (as we have none of the many other laborers—apostles and disciples), the ultimate marked success of the gospel in Cyprus may justly be attributed in great part to their faithful and efficient ministry.

40, 41. The Second Missionary Journey of Paul.—More than two years had elapsed since his return from the First Journey. The Second was begun A. D. 51, and occupied between three and four years, including eighteen months at Corinth, until A. D. 54. The account is included in chapters 15 : 40, 41 to 18 : 22. The 41st verse, with the first twelve verses of chapter 16, merely outline a very long course of travel and labor, covering many months. With Silas, he goes through the provinces of Syria (in part) and Cilicia, Phrygia and Galatia, visiting their chief cities, and tarrying again in Derbe, Lystra, Iconium, and the neighboring Antioch. At length, from Troas, on the coast, he crosses to Europe, and preaches first at Philippi in Macedonia. A fact of special interest, to be noted here, is that Paul had no further thought in starting out than to visit the churches already established, in the field previously visited by Barnabas and himself. From place to place, and definitely from Asia to Europe, he was led by the Holy Spirit; and, as he was directed, he went. B.

41. Syria and Cilicia. In consequence of the range of Mount Taurus, the Eastern (or "Flat") Cilicia has a greater geographical affinity with Syria than with Asia Minor. Hence "Syria and Cilicia" appears in history almost as a generic geographical term, the more important district being mentioned first. Within the limits of this region Saul's activities were first exercised in studying and in teaching at Tarsus, and in founding those Churches which were afterward greeted in the Apostolic letter from Jerusalem as the brethren "in Antioch, and Syria, and Cilicia," and which Paul himself confirmed after his separation from Barnabas, traveling through "Syria and Cilicia." H. (See map, p. 94.)

1-5. Timothy ordained and joined to Paul's Missionary Company.—Paul had reached the familiar region of Derbe, Lystra, and Iconium, ascending into Lycaonia from Cilicia through the pass known as the Cilician Gates, a great fissure in the Taurus Range, extending eighty miles north and south. Living in Lystra, Timothy had probably been converted under the ministry of Paul, four or five years before. From his mother and grandmother he had received impressions of truth in earliest childhood. And since his conversion to Christ he had specially commended himself to the brethren in the three cities of Lystra, Iconium, and Antioch (2 Tim. 2 : 10, 11). This "good report from those without" (1 Tim. 3 : 7), together with Paul's own impression of his Christian character, and of his fitness for ministry in the Gospel, led the apostle, under divine guidance, to impress him into Christ's service. Gladly and gratefully Timothy gave himself to missionary toil, and, "after he had made a good confession before many witnesses," was solemnly set apart by the laying on of the hands of Paul and of the elders in those churches. And from thenceforth the relation between the apostle and this youthful disciple was most intimate and tender. A son, indeed, in the depth and constancy of Paul's affection, as well as "in the faith," was this earnest, single-hearted Timothy accounted by the apostle; as many touching passages in his two Letters amply prove.

Paul had two sufficient reasons for circumcising Timothy, before inducting him into the ministry: the chief one was that as an uncircumcised Jew Timothy could not be admitted into the synagogues, nor listened to with respect by the unconverted Jews. Besides this positive necessity, no principle was compromised in the case of Timothy. Further, Paul was willing to avail himself of this opportunity (as he did of one other, Acts 21) practically to correct certain misrepresentations that his enemies had made against him—the same that had been made against the Master: that he had despised and blasphemed the law of Moses. And it is to be noted that Paul's refusal to circumcise Titus, while at Jerusalem (Gal. 2 : 3-5), was perfectly consistent with his action here. For Titus was a Greek—a heathen, born; with no claim to the Jewish rite or privilege. Those who demanded his circumcision did it upon the express grounds that the Gentiles must become Jews before they could become Christians; that the burden of ceremonials must be assumed, and especially circumcision, as an essential condition of salvation. All this was in direct contradiction of the principles affirmed by the Council: that the Gentiles were free from the yoke of the Mosaic Law; and that faith, not circumcision, was the only essential to salvation. In the case of Titus, Paul was intolerant in defense of vital principles. In the case of Timothy, he was tolerant of mere prejudices, that he might help the more effectually to remove them; that unconverted Jews might not be repelled from the Christian teacher and the Christian truth. In this case, he "became unto the Jews as a Jew, that he might gain the Jews." And that no inconsistency was thought of or recognized in this action we know by the statement immediately following, respecting the decrees of the Council.

6-8. After preaching throughout the Region of Phrygia and Galatia, they pass over Asia to Troas.—Under the names of Phrygia and Galatia, whose boundaries are entirely indefinite, the central tableland region of Asia Minor is here referred to. At this time Paul must have planted the churches of Galatia, though Luke makes no record here. For these churches are referred to as confirmed by Paul in his next succeeding journey (Acts 18 : 23). B.

Luke makes no mention of any of Paul's Epistles, or even of the fact that he wrote a single Epistle; and yet, in dictating the Acts by the agency of Luke, the Holy Spirit appears to have his divine eye on what had been already given, or would be hereafter given, by himself to the world in those Epistles by the hand of Paul. Here is the ground of the argument handled by Dr. Paiey in his "Horræ Paulinæ." The Acts and the Epistles are from one Spirit. No wonder that there is a beautiful harmony among them, more deeply felt because not the result of effort and art, but of oneness of origin from the Spirit of truth. W.

How they were forbidden by the Spirit of Christ to preach in Asia—the Roman province bordering upon the Ægean Sea—and how hindered from going northeastward into the larger province of Bithynia, we are not informed. The curiosity that desires to investigate such a question is wholly ungratified by the Scripture. Paul was made to understand the mind of the Spirit, and—the only real point of rational interest—he obeyed it! And, to every one cherishing the same obedient spirit, the mind of God will in some assured way be made known. Why their proposed movements were thus divinely hedged round on every side save that of the sea, is clearly intimated in the summons that so soon followed: to cross the sea, and enter Europe! So plainly it appears that the Gospel's first marked entrance into Europe was definitely directed by the Lord Christ.

9, 10. Paul's Vision at Troas.—Alexandria Troas, this seaport and free city, upon or near the site of ancient Troy, had been named. B.—Nearly four centuries had passed since the Macedonian conqueror crossed the narrow strait of the Hellespont, to overthrow the great despotism that enthralled Asia; and now, near that plain of Troy, on which Alexander stayed to indulge the dream of rivaling the fame of his ancestor, Achilles, at the very city named in the conqueror's honor, Paul beheld in vision another "man of Macedonia," uttering the cry of the western world suffering beneath the despotism of sin, and calling to the soldiers of the Cross, "Come over and help us." The power which had led Europe to the armed conquest of Asia was the first to invite conquest from the spiritual force of which Asia had been the primeval cradle. S.—This vision is still perpetuated. The cry of humanity in its sense of need—its guilt and wretchedness, its helpless, hopeless despair—is still sounding now from East to West, as then from West to East. It comes from every heathen continent, and from the many islands, to the Church of every region, and to the Christian of every name. B.—And it has been abundantly shown that it is death to a Church or a Christian either not to hear this cry, or, having heard it, not to heed it. Riddle.

Northern Shores of the Aegean Sea. (Note Troas, in the province of Asia; the seaport Neapolis, at the head of the Strymonic Gulf; Philippi, on the Via Egnatia; Thessalonica, at the head of the Thracian Gulf; and Berea.)

Luke, "the beloved physician" and "the brother whose praise is in all the Churches," who, in his native place, Antioch, had labored with Paul, joined the three missionaries at Troas. Although the historian of all these events, and the companion of Paul in a large part of his journeying, he nowhere alludes to his presence otherwise than by the words "we" and "us" in the narrative.

11, 12. From Troas across the Aegean to Neapolis and Philippi.—Paul's "immediate endeavor to go into Macedonia" was succeeded by finding a vessel about to sail for Neapolis. B.—And these four men go on board the vessel—Paul, with his fervent soul and his strong intellect; Silas, with his zeal and his prophetic gifts; Luke, with his scholarly culture and professional accomplishments; and Timothy, with his youthful earnestness and as yet undeveloped powers for work. These four men, guided by the Divine Spirit, come to Europe! And that ship has in it the seeds of all that is to be developed in the religion and learning, the philosophy, legislation, art, science, and everything else that has made European nations the acknowledged regal masters of the world. T. B.—The very elements prospered this outward voyage; so that their course was direct, by Tenedos, Imbros, and Samothracia; and the eighty miles was accomplished in two days.

Macedonia was previously a prominent kingdom of ancient Greece, now a Roman province. It had been a military kingdom, and its cities had not received the culture of Athens, nor shared the commercial prosperity of Corinth. The truth, therefore, had a readier reception, and found fewer obstacles than afterward in those cities.

From Neapolis, a Macedonian harbor on the Strymonic Gulf, they followed for ten miles one of the great Roman roads, over a lofty ridge extending from Mount Pangæum, and then descending into the plain of Philippi. Upon this plain, b. c. 42, Anthony and Augustus (afterward emperor), in a final, decisive battle, had defeated Brutus and Cassius. As a monument of that signal victory, Augustus had planted a Roman colony upon, or near, the site of the older Macedonian city. Of the border-tract of Eastern Macedonia, which formed the barrier against Thrace with its barbarous hordes, Philippi was the chief city. As a colony, settled with freedmen and veteran soldiers, organized as to its government, laws and social customs on the model of imperial Rome, and as a frontier defensive post, its privileges and its distinction were great. B.—And now a Jewish apostle came to the same place, to win a greater victory than that of Philippi, and to found a more durable empire than that of Augustus. H.

Section 216.

Acts xvi. 13-40.

13 AND on the sabbath we went out of the city by a river side, where prayer was wont to 14 be made; and we sat down, and spake unto the women which resorted thither. And a certain woman named Lydia, a seller of purple, of the city of Thyatira, which worshipped God, heard us: whose heart the Lord opened, that she attended unto the things which were 15 spoken of Paul. And when she was baptized, and her household, she besought us, saying,
If ye have judged me to be faithful to the Lord, come into my house, and abide there.
And she constrained us.

16 And it came to pass, as we went to prayer, a certain damsel possessed with a spirit of 17 divination met us, which brought her masters much gain by soothsaying: the same followed Paul and us, and cried, saying, These men are the servants of the most high God, which 18 shew unto us the way of salvation. And this did she many days. But Paul, being grieved, turned and said to the spirit, I command thee in the name of Jesus Christ to come out of 19 her. And he came out the same hour. And when her masters saw that the hope of their gains was gone, they caught Paul and Silas, and drew them into the marketplace unto the 20 rulers, and brought them to the magistrates, saying, These men, being Jews, do exceedingly 21 trouble our city, and teach customs, which are not lawful for us to receive, neither to ob-
22 serve, being Romans. And the multitude rose up together against them: and the magis-23 trates rent off their clothes, and commanded to beat them. And when they had laid many 24 stripes upon them, they cast them into prison, charging the jailor to keep them safely: who, having received such a charge, thrust them into the inner prison, and made their feet fast in the stocks.

25 And at midnight Paul and Silas prayed, and sang praises unto God: and the prisoners 26 heard them. And suddenly there was a great earthquake, so that the foundations of the prison were shaken: and immediately all the doors were opened, and every one's bands 27 were loosed. And the keeper of the prison awaking out of his sleep, and seeing the prison doors open, he drew out his sword, and would have killed himself, supposing that the pris-28 oners had been fled. But Paul cried with a loud voice, saying, Do thyself no harm: for we 29 are all here. Then he called for a light, and sprang in, and came trembling, and fell down 30 before Paul and Silas, and brought them out, and said, Sirs, what must I do to be saved?
31 And they said, Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved, and thy house.
32 And they spake unto him the word of the Lord, and to all that were in his house. And he 33 took them the same hour of the night, and washed their stripes; and was baptized, he and 34 all his, straightway. And when he had brought them into his house, he set meat before them, and rejoiced, believing in God with all his house.

35 And when it was day, the magistrates sent the serjeants, saying, Let those men go. And 36 the keeper of the prison told this saying to Paul, The magistrates have sent to let you go:
37 now therefore depart, and go in peace. But Paul said unto them, They have beaten us openly uncondemned, being Romans, and have cast us into prison; and now do they thrust 38 us out privily? nay verily; but let them come themselves and fetch us out. And the serjeants told these words unto the magistrates: and they feared, when they heard that they 39 were Romans. And they came and besought them, and brought them out, and desired them 40 to depart out of the city. And they went out of the prison, and entered into the house of Lydia: and when they had seen the brethren, they comforted them, and departed.

ON the same page of Scripture there is the record of two most remarkable conversions, as different from each other as any two processes of mind, leading to the same result, can by possibility be. Lydia, the purple-seller of Thyatira, became a Christian through the gentle opening of the heart, as by the quiet river-side she attended to the things which were spoken of Paul. The Philippian jailer is converted, on the other hand, in a manner such as might be expected from the previous habits of ignorance and vice in which, we may reasonably suppose, he had been sunk. The critical, all-important question for all of us is, whether we be indeed Christ's at present, and are following the lead of his Spirit; if so, how we were brought to Him, whether by the quiet drawings of gratitude and love, or by the gradual growth of reflectiveness and our experience of life's hollowness, or by the trepidations of alarm, is but of little moment. E. M. G.

Strike from the world's history what has been done for Jesus' sake—go back along the track of time, and erase the deeds that have been wrought, the self-denials undergone, the books written, the lives lived, the martyrdoms endured, the stern missions begun and prosecuted, and how poor would the world be! Strike out the love to Jesus that human souls have felt, and all that it has prompted them to do, and what a waste would the past eighteen centuries present! The blackest pages of human history have been illumined by some deeds of true glory that love to Jesus has begotten. When wickedness has been most rampant, there have ever been some who have sung their songs in the night, irradiated the moral gloom with their light, and been ready to seal their affection by their blood. J. D.

13. In Europe, as in Asia, Paul preaches chiefly in the cities and large towns, that a deeper and broader impression may be made at the first, and the truth scattered more widely afterward. For, in ancient as in modern times, the populous centers exercised a controlling influence over social and religious customs. But the first announcement of the gospel in Europe—in Philippi—was remarkable both as to the place and the hearers. Nothing could have been more simple and unassuming. In the city was no synagogue. Nor did Paul find an opening for highway preaching. But out of the city, by a still river-side, in a spot where a few godly women, Jewish proselytes, were accustomed to meet and pray together on the Sabbath, the apostle began his work in Europe. It was only a quiet talk about Christ, while speaker and hearers sat together in a little group. But, like the Master at Jacob's well, Paul throws into this simple ministry as much earnestness of purpose and thoroughness of instruction as afterward he employed in addressing the vast multitude of cultured Athenians. And this unreported conversation produced a rich harvest, while the grand discourse at Athens was almost barren of fruit.

14. A woman was Paul's first European convert; from Thyatira, a city in the province of "Asia." So that the first convert in Greece is from the very province in Asia Minor where the Spirit had forbidden them to preach. And the Lord opened her heart; the same Lord that had sent his ambassadors from Asia into Europe. The process of her conversion seems also very natural and simple. Her heart, once closed, is now opened; not by force, but in a way suited to a free intelligent nature. For it was opened to truth, which contained only high, pure, divine, blessed motive. It was opened to hear, to heed, to receive gladly with all the grasp of intellect and heart, with all the energy of will in self-consecration, the truths of life, "the things spoken of Paul." B.—The Lord had laid words on Paul's lips suited to find entrance to her heart; He has bestowed on her the listening ear to receive the voice of truth, the opened eye to see its light. And where now the last doubt gives way, and it is given her by grace to believe in Christ, how completely is sketched forth the blessed change which has had place first in her mind, but thereafter in her whole life and destiny! Van O.

15. Then followed the confession of her new faith, her baptism, and her grateful offer of hospitality and Christian service. Altogether the story is an attractive and instructive Christian idyl. B.—With the baptism of Lydia that of her "household" was associated. Whether we are to understand by this term her children, her slaves, or workpeople, or all these collectively, can not easily be decided. But we have here an example of that family religion to which Paul often alludes in his Epistles. The "connections of Chloë," the "household of Stephanas," the "church in the house" of Aquila and Priscilla, are parallel cases. H.

Christianity adopted and shared the distinguishing characteristic of Judaism as a family religion. The children of Jews were accounted heirs of the covenant. And it would seem that, if Jewish Christians had been denied this same relation, they would have demanded it, and a great controversy must then have arisen. Whether there were or not infants in any of the several baptized households can not certainly be determined. But the unexplained and unqualified mention of households surely implies that infants were included. B.—Who can believe that not one infant was found in all these families, and that Jews, accustomed to the circumcision, and Gentiles, accustomed to the lustration of infants, should not have also brought them to baptism? Beng.—The practice of infant baptism does not rest on inference but on the continuity and identity of the covenant of grace to Jew and Christian, the sign only of admission being altered. A.

And we have here the first example of that Christian hospitality which was so emphatically enjoined, and so lovingly practiced, in the Apostolic Church. The scenes by the river-side, and in the house of Lydia, are beautiful prophecies of the holy influence which women, elevated by Christianity to their true position, and enabled by divine grace to wear "the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit," have now for centuries exerted over domestic happiness and the growth of piety and peace. H.

16-21. For the first time in Paul's experience opposition and persecution came directly and exclusively from the Gentiles. The motive, too, was entirely disconnected with his religious teaching. It came from human hate produced by disappointed selfishness; and this was occasioned by a humane action. B.—A poor bond-girl, possessed with a spirit which was supposed to inspire oracles like those uttered by the Pythoness at Delphi, drove a gainful trade for her masters in the oracles which she vended, probably to the wild natives who frequented the market outside the city walls. As Paul and his companions went out to the place of prayer, she followed them with the continued cry, "These men are the servants of the most high God, which shew unto us the way of salvation." S.—Repeating this for many days, her words must have become known throughout the city. At length Paul, in the very spirit of the Master (of compassion for the possessed and of indignation toward the satanic possessor) and after His manner, under His inspiration and in His name, commanded the evil spirit to come out of her. The whole account—Paul's spirit and words, and Luke's statement of the consequent fact (that "he came out the same hour")—shows that she was a demoniac, or "one possessed with a devil." Though the evil spirit in her, whether by constraint or with malicious purpose, gave true testimony to the missionaries, yet the source whence it came would taint the testimony itself. Therefore Paul, like his Master, would none of it. B.

The whole history of the Acts shows that the direct agency of the Evil Spirit is made subservient to the cause of Christ. In the case of Ananias (5 : 3-5) he is made to preach to the world a perpetual warning against the sin of sacrilege; in the case of Simon Magus (8 : 20), against the sin of simony. In the case of Elymas at Paphos (13 : 10-12), Satan is defeated and Christ is glorified. Satan meets the apostle in Philippi, and flatters him by the mouth of her whom he had possessed. But his adulations are rejected, and he is cast out, and the Gentile world is taught that the spirit in their divination and oracles is a spirit of darkness.

19. The hope of their gains was gone. A clew to the powerful motive of persecutions against Christianity. Both the persecutions from Heathenism, mentioned in the Acts, are from this source. In the account of both, the word craft occurs; here, and in 19 : 24, 25. As Blunt remarks: "The Priesthood, in all its branches, contemplated the advance of Christianity with dismay.

It emptied their temples, curtailed their sacrifices, reduced their profits, exposed their frauds." 20. Being Jews. Christianity was hated as Judaism by the heathens, and as worse than heathenism by the Jews. It had to contend against Judaism and Heathenism, and it triumphed over both. W.

The owners' investment had lost its value, and the law had no remedy to meet the case. Caring nothing for their own souls, they cared not for this one now released from such terrible thralldom. Their gains were their supreme thought and care. Since these were hopelessly gone, in their rage they sought revenge by stirring up the ignorant populace, who had a superstitious interest in the girl's sooth-saying, to assault the strangers and drag them into the forum. There, before the magistrates (the Duumviri, or prætors), concealing the facts, they cunningly resort to another charge. Referring to Paul and Silas only as Jews, they accuse them of introducing customs not lawful for Romans to receive. Their charge had a color of reason in the laws which prohibited Romans from forsaking their religion. But its chief force and its success with the magistrates lay in the facts: that the Jews had been just then expelled from Rome, and that Philippi, a Roman colony—i. e., a Rome in miniature—may and ought to imitate the metropolis. This race-prejudice, and just enacted example of intolerance, instantly won the magistrates to an illegal and iniquitous compliance with the will of the mob.

22-24. The Scourging and Imprisonment of Paul and Silas.—By command of the two magistrates, the lictors rent off with violence the garments so that the flesh was bare, and laid many stripes upon them. B.—It is difficult for us to estimate the severity of this punishment. The victim was beaten on the naked flesh with thick rods by trained professional executioners. The insignia of a Roman ruler consisted of a bunch of rods tied together like a sheaf, and an axe protruding from the end of the bundle. The rods symbolized secondary, and the axe capital, punishment. Arnot.

No inquiry was instituted, no time or means of defense afforded; not even the opportunity to plead their Roman citizenship. This fact Paul would not now thrust upon them for many good reasons; all of them for the furtherance of the gospel, as we hereafter see. One may be referred to here. Paul, like his Lord, opened not his mouth before these persecutors. "As seeing Him who is invisible," he endured that severe Roman scourging that he might illustrate to those believers, and to all thereafter, the spirit of self-sacrifice and the force of trust under the fire of suffering. At Corinth, not long after, writing to the Thessalonians, he recalls this cruel experience, "how we were shamefully entreated at Philippi."

Then, with their backs lacerated, they are thrown into prison; and, as if more dangerous and guilty than other criminals, their feet are painfully distended and shut up immovably in "the stocks." By this unrelieved position of constraint and distention the pain of their bruised bodies is intensified. Yet through the afternoon, and up to the midnight hour, their faith and fortitude held firm.

25, 26. Their Praying Song in the Night, and the Consequent Earthquake.—They prayed in song to God. Their song was prayer, their prayer was song. What they sang we may infer. For David's trustful utterances would well suit their needs and their hearts. Yet not these alone; for theirs was a larger knowledge, a richer experience of a realized Lord and Comforter. And out of that revealed experience, how readily their souls could pour themselves out in trustful rejoicing and fervent intercession! Their praising prayer was a sermon, too, to a strange congregation; for the prisoners heard. What was its ultimate effect, we know not. But none of those listeners used the opportunity for escape, when unnaturally the earth was shaken, and supernaturally the doors were opened and their chains loosed. They must have felt what we know: that there was a connection between these marvels and the sublime utterances of praise and supplication that preceded them. Right well are we here and in this, assured that God is the hearer and answerer of prayer.

27, 28. The Prison-Keeper's Suicide hindered by Paul.—By the stern Roman law, death was the penalty of a jailer's unwatchfulness and the escape of his prisoners. Finding the doors wide open and inferring that the prisoners had fled, in his proud Roman despair he was about to take his own life, as the only honorable alternative for retrieving the disgrace. Suicide, among the Romans, was accounted not only lawful, but under irretrievable misfortune was regarded as a virtue. B.—And this very city, Philippi, had been famous in the annals of suicide. Here Cassius, unable to survive defeat, covered his face in the empty tent, and ordered his freedmen to strike the blow. Here Brutus bade adieu to his friends, exclaiming, "Certainly we must fly, yet not with the feet, but with the hands." And many of their adherents ended their last struggle for the republic by self-inflicted death. H.

The same prison lamps that revealed to the keeper the open doors would, through those doors, reveal the jailer to Paul, and his purpose would be conjectured by the drawing of his sword. And now the eager sympathy of the apostle's heart on the instant coöperated with God's purpose in the earthquake and the supernaturally opened doors. That purpose was not the release of the prisoners, but the awakening of the jailer's conscience so that a saving impression might be made upon his hardened heart. Paul's loud, impassioned cry was but the seconding of God's saving purpose toward the man. And with what sublime emphasis did that cry, forced out of Paul's Christlike, loving heart, Do thyself no harm! sum up the supreme design of Christ's infinite love, as expressed in his redemption and revealed through his gospel.

29-32. The Keeper's Question and Paul's Answer. The Word pressed home upon Opened Hearts.—The instant revulsion of feeling consequent upon such an appeal, enforced by the assurance that none had fled, joined with the earthquake shock and the evidences of miraculous visitation—all combined to arouse in his conscience a new and overwhelming fear. It was not a dread of temporal danger; for all was quiet now, and his armed assistants were at his side. It was the kindling of sensibility, through a fear wrought in his callous spiritual nature by these startling tokens of a Divine presence and an unseen world. Impelled by this fear, out of the depths of his aroused soul, as he cast himself at the feet of Paul and Silas, came the intense yearning cry, "What must I do to be saved?" Those oft-repeated and widely-reported words of the frenzied girl must have left an impression upon his ignorant, superstitious nature. He now felt, in his confused, amazed terror, "These men must be servants of the most high God, to show the way of salvation." And so the question forms itself to the inward craving of his consciously lost soul: "To be saved, what must I do?"

That this was his condition and this his meaning, the answer of the faithful men of God clearly shows. Sirs, or Lords, he had called them, as in his heathen thought he prostrated himself in almost worship before them. Believe, is their answer, not in us, but in the one only LORD, Jesus Christ! and thou shalt be saved! They saw, in his trembling and in his despairing cry, his strong conviction of sin, his craving for deliverance, his yearning to know and willingness to do what was demanded of him; and they said all that could be said to any wretched, sinful soul of man. They put into their answer the whole gospel. They declared all that is essential to human salvation. They demand no "doing" of the man save faith, or trust: faith in the Person of Christ—trust in His redeeming work. And who this Christ was, what saving work He had done, what it was to trust this Saviour and to receive Him, Paul instantly went on to tell this eagerly listening man, and the members of his household who were now gathered around them. There was no magical suddenness in these conversions. From this summary text, the Word of the Lord—about the Lord—was clearly spoken to all; and they, like Lydia, with hearts now opened by the Lord, heard and heeded, believed and rejoiced.

33, 34. The Good Works that follow the Transformed Keeper's Faith.—The rude, harsh, almost brutal nature becomes at once tender and sympathetic. Before they apply the baptismal water, to seal by outward sign his sacramentum or oath of allegiance to his new spiritual Lord, he washes their wounds left by the scourge. Then in humble, thankful gladness of spirit he makes them welcome guests at his table and in his home. And this change from previous reckless inhumanity to kind treatment and generous hospitality gave full assurance of the inward change wrought in his heart. These first-offering duties fulfilled, were the fruit and proof of that faith which worketh by love.

35-40. The Release of the Missionaries, and their Departure from Philippi.—Early the next morning the magistrates—as the result either of reflection upon their hasty and illegal procedure or of relapse into indifference about the matter—sent a message, in careless or contemptuous tone, dismissing the prisoners. This message was joyfully communicated by the keeper to Paul. But now the Christian principle, properly self-respecting and mindful of the ends of human justice, stands manfully for the vindication of outraged personal rights. Yet not merely for their own sake. For Christ's sake they had silently borne the suffering; but for Christianity's sake they make the protest against the infraction of law by its appointed administrators. Paul's main object was to honor and help Christianity; to secure respect and protection for the Christian believers in Philippi. These believers he would encourage and embolden to fidelity. Upon the magistrates and people he would impress a higher estimate and respect for the Christian movement. All this he effectually accomplished by proclaiming their Roman citizenship; by denouncing the injustice of a punishment without trial and condemnation; and by demanding an acknowledgment of the inflicted wrong as open, and a release as public, as had been their arrest and imprisonment.

Very willing were these now alarmed magistrates to humble themselves by coming to the prison; and publicly to confess their own injustice by personally entreating these Roman citizens to come forth to liberty. For Roman law, so harsh to others, was very partial to the interests and jealous for the rights of Roman citizens. And that law, under penalty of death to the magistrate infringing it absolutely forbade the application of the scourge to the person of a Roman, and that a Roman should be punished without trial and judgment.

Thus the Christian leaders were justified before all; and in their persons Christianity was honored. Through these occurrences and the apostle's generous forbearance in declining all appeal to Rome against the magistrates, the infant Church at Philippi started upon high vantage-ground in the compelled respect of the rulers and people. Beginning with these two households—of Lydia and the nameless prison-keeper—it seems to have well maintained the spirit and teaching of the great Apostle.

Going from the prison as innocent men, for their own dignity's sake as well as to leave parting words of instruction and comfort with the new disciples, they tarried awhile at the house of Lydia. Then, leaving these first Macedonian converts to the care of Luke (and, perhaps, Timothy), Paul and Silas set forth on their journey. B.—We do not see Luke again in the Apostle's company till the third missionary journey and the second visit to Macedonia. At this exact point of separation, we observe that he drops the style of an eye-witness and resumes that of a historian, until the second time of meeting, after which he writes as an eye-witness till the arrival at Rome and the very close of the Acts. He appears again on a voyage from Philippi to Troas (Acts 20 : 56), as now he has appeared on a voyage from Troas to Philippi. H.

Of all the churches which Paul founded, the Philippians seem to have been the most free from fault, and the most attached to himself. In the Epistle which he wrote to them we find no censure and much praise; and so zealous was their love for Paul, that they alone (of all the churches which he founded) forced him from the very beginning to accept their contributions for his support. We might suppose from this that they were a wealthy church; yet Paul tells us that "in the heavy trial which had proved their steadfastness, the fullness of their joy had overflowed out of the depth of their poverty, in the richness of their liberality." C.

Section 217.

Acts xvii. 1-15.

1 Now when they had passed through Amphipolis and Apollonia, they came to Thessalonica, where was a synagogue of the Jews: and Paul, as his manner was, went in unto them, 3 and three sabbath days reasoned with them out of the scriptures, opening and alleging, that Christ must needs have suffered, and risen again from the dead ; and that this Jesus, whom I preach unto you, is Christ. And some of them believed, and consorted with Paul and Silas ; and of the devout Greeks a great multitude, and of the chief women not a few. But the Jews which believed not, moved with envy, took unto them certain lewd fellows of the baser sort, and gathered a company, and set all the city on an uproar, and assaulted the house of Jason, and sought to bring them out to the people. And when they found them not, they drew Jason and certain brethren unto the rulers of the city, crying, These that have turned the world upside down are come hither also : whom Jason hath received : and these all do contrary to the decrees of Cæsar, saying that there is another king, one Jesus. And they troubled the people and the rulers of the city, when they heard these things. And when they had taken security of Jason, and of the other, they let them go. And the brethren immediately sent away Paul and Silas by night unto Berea : who coming thither went into the synagogue of the Jews. These were more noble than those in Thessalonica, in that they received the word with all readiness of mind, and searched the scriptures daily, whether those things were so. Therefore many of them believed ; also of honourable women which were Greeks, and of men, not a few. But when the Jews of Thessalonica had knowledge that the word of God was preached of Paul at Berea, they came thither also, and stirred up the people. And then immediately the brethren sent away Paul to go as it were to the sea : but Silas and Timotheus abode there still. And they that conducted Paul brought him unto Athens : and receiving a commandment unto Silas and Timotheus for to come to him with all speed, they departed.

WHAT true nobleness is and how it manifests itself, according to God's estimate, is here disclosed by the Holy Ghost. It is that open-heartedness that searches, and ponders, and receives God's own word of instruction and direction. It is that childlike receptiveness of heart that not only believes and trusts in God, but habitually delights in his truth and tests his promises. The truth of God is adapted to the whole spiritual being, and is the only thing that meets and satisfies all its needs. As its reception is necessary to the knowledge of God, so the heart-appropriation of its promises is essential to their actual experience. Therefore, of all searching and study, this in itself best rewards the soul ; while it alone, through an inwrought faith and hope, insures the rich return of God's continual blessing. B.

I believe that the Bible is to be understood and received in the plain and obvious meaning of its passages ; since I can not persuade myself that a book intended for the instruction and conversion of the whole world should cover its true meaning in such mystery and doubt that none but critics and philosophers can discover it ; and that he is the most accomplished Christian scholar who hath been educated at the feet of Jesus. Daniel Webster.

THE vast territory subject to Rome was covered with a network of magnificent roads, which moved in straight lines, crossing mountains and bridging rivers, binding together the most remote cities, and connecting them all with the capital. The deep ruts, worn in the hard, basaltic pavement, and still visible even in places far from the metropolis, show to what extent they were used. Five main lines went out from Rome to the extremities of the empire. These, with their branches running in whatever direction public convenience required, were connected at the seaports with the routes of maritime travel. A journey might have been made upon Roman highways, interrupted only by brief trips upon the sea, from Alexandria to Carthage, thence through Spain and France, and northward to the Scottish border ; then back through Leyden, Cologne, Milan, eastward by land to Constantinople and Antioch, and thence to Alexandria ; and the distance traversed would have exceeded seven thousand miles. The traveler could measure his progress by the mile-stones along all these roads. G. P. F.

1-4. At Thessalonica Paul preaches Christ and founds a Church.—From Philippi to Thessalonica—one hundred miles a little south of west—Paul traversed one of the great Roman roads. The Via Egnatia extended across Macedonia nearly east and west, five hundred miles, from the Adriatic to the river Hebrus in Thrace. Thessalonica was about midway between these points. Amphipolis, an historic city, thirty-three miles from Philippi and Apollonia, a further thirty miles, were convenient tarrying places on the three days' journey ; the third bringing them thirty-seven miles to Thessalonica. (See map, p. 112.)

Thessalonica, at the head of the Thermaic Gulf, was then the capital and chief city of the Roman province of Macedonia. Originally called Thermae, it was renamed by Cassander, who rebuilt it in honor of his wife Thessalonica, the sister of Alexander the Great. This name had been given her by Philip as a memorial of a signal victory in Thessaly. Fronting the sea, built in successive tiers upon a steep, rocky ascent, it was a beautiful city; and, under the Romans, a populous and wealthy commercial center. B.—Before the founding of Constantinople, it shared the trade of the Ægean with Ephesus and Corinth. Through the middle ages, it never ceased to be important; and it is at the present day, under the name Salonica, the second city in European Turkey. The reason of this continued preëminence is, found in its geographical position :

on the inner bend of the Thermaic Gulf; on the sea-margin of a vast plain watered by several rivers; and at the entrance of the pass which commands the approach to the other great Macedonian level. We see at once how appropriate a place it was for one of the starting-points of the Gospel in Europe; and we can appreciate the force of Paul's expression a few months later, when he says that from them "the word of the Lord had sounded forth like a trumpet, not only in Macedonia and Achaia, but in every place." H.—Attracted by the great advantages for trade, the number of Jews was large; and it has remained so until the present day, when it is estimated at nearly one third in a population of seventy thousand.

Into their synagogue, "as his manner, or custom, was," Paul went upon the first Sabbath after his arrival. His theme was Christ—a suffering Messiah—and one risen from the dead. His sole authority, his only ground both of argument and appeal, was the Jewish Scriptures. As at Antioch (ch. 13) so here—and everywhere—always "out of the Scriptures," he "opens" or explains, and "alleges" or proclaims, "Christ crucified, the power of God and the wisdom of God unto salvation to every one that believeth." His basis of statement, like his Master's, is, "It is written." And responsive to the risen Master's expression to the two disciples on the road, "Ought not Christ to have suffered?" is this of Paul, "that Christ must needs have suffered!" Doubtless, too, responsive to the Master's proof from "Moses and the Prophets" was Paul's unfolding of the Christ; in the types, the sacrifices, the promises and the prophecies of the old covenant. The meaning of the ought and the must needs, as applied to Christ's suffering, was explained, as he has reasoned it in his Epistles: that God might be just and yet the justifier of the sinner, penitent and believing in Jesus.

Three weeks he continued his ministry in the synagogue. Then, although a few of the Jews believed, the greater number arrayed themselves against Paul. Compelled to desist from preaching in their synagogue, he remained for a considerable period—at least three or four months—laboring among the Gentiles, and with great success. Besides the few Jews, "a great multitude" of Greek proselytes, and many of the "chief women," believed, and were divinely led to cast in their lot with Paul and Silas. In so comparatively brief a period was created and organized that Church of the Thessalonians to whom not long after Paul addressed his two Epistles. As we learn from these Epistles, a chief topic of his preaching at this time had been the second coming of Christ in regal majesty. It is not, therefore, surprising that the unbelieving Jews (who had listened to purpose) should instigate the mob to accuse these Christians of setting up another king, one Jesus.

5-9. Jason and Other Disciples dragged before the Rulers and accused, but released on Bail.—The Jews were again the persecutors, and from the same cause as at Antioch—envy that the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs to the promises of God. Yet their pride neither disdained nor scrupled to employ the worst elements of the populace, the vagabond and vile idlers around the market-place. This rabble they stirred up to gather at the house of Jason and demand the surrender of Paul and Silas. When these could not be discovered, they seized the disciples found in the house and dragged them before the rulers. Their exaggerated statement respecting Paul and Silas, in the introduction to their charge against Jason and the rest, affords striking evidence of the widespread and deep impression made by the Gospel in the few years of Paul's ministry. "These men have turned the world upside down!" is the testimony by which, while designing to calumniate and injure these preachers of Jesus, they only prove their fidelity and success. The charge is the old one against Christ—of disloyalty to Cæsar. Yet the loyalty of these accusing Jews, like those before Pilate, was only a cloak and pretense.

The charge had a peculiar significance in Thessalonica. For it was, by special favor of the Roman emperors, a free city, with elective magistrates and a representative legislature. And these high privileges of self-government were conditioned upon strict fidelity to Rome. Hence the charge of committing or inciting treason would be jealously heeded by magistrates and people. But unlike the magistrates (prætors) of Philippi, who yielded to the mob's demands, these rulers, or politarchs (a term meaning "governors of the citizens," also accurately used by Luke, and a title still existing in an inscription upon an entrance archway), acted as became their judicial character. Either they received the explanation that Christ had given Pilate of His kingship over the empire of truth with the heart as the sphere of his rule, or they were satisfied that no treason was intended. For they released Jason and his companions, after receiving security for their pledge that no more trouble should ensue. Partly in compliance with this pledge, but chiefly for the safety of Paul and Silas, and the prosperity of the infant Church, "the brethren immediately sent them away by night to Berea."

10-12. The Berean Jews compare the Apostle's Preaching with the Word of God. Their Consequent Faith.—In Berea Paul keeps up "his manner" of going first to the synagogue, notwithstanding his discouraging reception by the Thessalonian Jews. This city, forty-five miles southwest of Thessalonica, still remains under the name of Verria, with a population of eighteen or twenty thousand.

The record of the Jews of Berea—a considerable body—is most honorable. The mass of the nation, especially the highest in office and culture, had everywhere before rejected the claims of Christ without investigation, through contempt and pride. These Bereans were characterized by a far different temper and a nobler spirit. What Christ had vainly urged upon the Jews at Jerusalem (John 6 : 39), they did; and as a body for the first time was this "searching" done in the spirit of candid and earnest inquiry. Their nobleness—so is their spirit characterized by the Holy Ghost—was evinced in a mind attent to hear and awake to perceive, and a heart willing to receive the new truths and thoroughly to investigate their authority and their claims. Therefore, day by day, as Paul taught, they tested his teaching by its agreement with the Scriptures to which he appealed. Thus going to the divine source, without any bias of prejudice or partisanship, they honestly sought for truth, applied their minds to its test, and formed their own judgment upon the evidence divinely furnished. So they most honored the Word, and best seconded the efforts of its preachers. And so searching, as Christ commanded, they found, as Christ had promised: they believed! Would that all thoughtful souls were thus noble! Would that preachers in the study and the pulpit, hearers in the pew, and readers in the home, were all free from the unconscious trammels of preconceived opinions, of educated prejudice or trained partisanship, respecting the truths of the Divine Word! Would that all were habituated to simple, honest, earnest, prayerful search to know nothing but the mind of God, as disclosed in the Scriptures He has given us by inspiration.

13, 14. Paul sent away from Berea, because of Persecution stirred up by Jews from Thessalonica.—Only a few weeks, at the most, did he probably remain in Berea. During this period he sought, but was unable, to revisit Thessalonica (1 Thes. 2 : 18). With the same spirit and purpose as in his First Journey he was pursued to Lystra, the envious, hating Jews sought to break up his good work in Berea. And they employed their usual method, of instigating the people to mob violence. But the "brethren" anticipated their plans by sending away Paul. Many of them escorted him (not "as it were," but) even down to the sea, as the quicker and safer way of escape, and the more direct and expeditious route to some place of destination. Some went with him as far as Athens, and returned with his message to Silas and Timothy. B.

That the apostle had no deliberate purpose of going to Athens seems clear from the statement that the brethren at Berea sent him away to go to the sea; and then his conductors, guided no doubt by circumstances, such as what vessels happened to be sailing, brought him to Athens. The distinctive divine call which appointed him the Apostle of the Gentiles is made all the clearer from the slowness, not to say reluctance, with which he is urged on from Jerusalem to Cilicia and Syria, from Asia Minor to Europe, from the Jewish settlements in Macedonia to Athens and Corinth, as if the voice were repeated at every step, "Depart! for I will send thee far hence unto the Gentiles." Paul was no rash adventurer, rushing forward in his own strength to the conflict with Greek philosophy and Roman force. S.

Of the future of this Berean church we are not informed. Silas remained with it for a considerable period longer. And Timothy took part in his care of it, until Paul sent the youthful evangelist (in his stead) to exhort and confirm in their faith the Thessalonian believers. But the noble character of its members, their remarkable freedom from prejudice, and their instant hearty acceptance of the Word, seem to authorize the belief that theirs was an unusually attractive history; developing no peculiarities of doctrine or practice that required a distinctive epistle from their great Christian founder. B.

ACTS xvii. 16-34.

16 Now while Paul waited for them at Athens, his spirit was stirred in him, when he saw 17 the city wholly given to idolatry. Therefore disputed he in the synagogue with the Jews, 18 and with the devout persons, and in the market daily with them that met with him. Then certain philosophers of the Epicureans, and of the Stoics, encountered him. And some said, What will this babbler say? other some, He seemeth to be a setter forth of strange 19 gods: because he preached unto them Jesus, and the resurrection. And they took him, and brought him unto Areopagus, saying, May we know what this new doctrine, whereof 20 thou speakest, is? For thou bringest certain strange things to our ears: we would know 21 therefore what these things mean. (For all the Athenians and strangers which were there spent their time in nothing else, but either to tell, or to hear some new thing.) 22 Then Paul stood in the midst of Mars' hill, and said, Ye men of Athens, I perceive that 23 in all things ye are too superstitious. For as I passed by, and beheld your devotions, I found an altar with this inscription, TO THE UNKNOWN GOD. Whom therefore ye 24 ignorantly worship, him declare I unto you. God that made the world and all things therein, seeing that he is Lord of heaven and earth, dwelleth not in temples made with 25 hands; neither is worshipped with men's hands, as though he needed anything, seeing he 26 giveth to all life, and breath, and all things; and hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth, and hath determined the times before appointed, 27 and the bounds of their habitation; that they should seek the Lord, if haply they might 28 feel after him, and find him, though he be not far from every one of us: for in him we live, and move, and have our being; as certain also of your own poets have said, For we 29 are also his offspring. Forasmuch then as we are the offspring of God, we ought not to think that the Godhead is like unto gold, or silver, or stone, graven by art and man's de-30 vice. And the times of this ignorance God winked at; but now commandeth all men 31 every where to repent: because he hath appointed a day, in the which he will judge the world in righteousness by that man whom he hath ordained; whereof he hath given assurance unto all men, in that he hath raised him from the dead.
 32 And when they heard of the resurrection of the dead, some mocked: and others said, 33 We will hear thee again of this matter. So Paul departed from among them. Howbeit 34 certain men clave unto him, and believed: among the which was Dionysius the Areopagite, and a woman named Damaris, and others with them.

By no means so strange to the ear of the ancient world was the doctrine of the future life, and of the resurrection of the body, as was this doctrine, That Truth is every man's concernment, every man's right, and every man's most necessary possession. The apostolic voice, sounding throughout the ancient world, and calling upon "all men everywhere to repent, and to believe the gospel," besides its direct religious import, carried an inevitable, though latent inference, which has effected the greatest of all the revolutions that have marked the intellectual condition of mankind. This challenge to repent and to believe awakened in every bosom a sense of responsibility altogether new, putting as it did every human being in a position of direct relationship to God, the Judge of all, and fixing in the minds of all a deep conviction that the difference between truth and error is of infinite consequence to men individually. Never, until it was proclaimed by the apostles, had it been surmised, either by Greek or Jew, that Truth, sacred Truth, the brightest daughter of the skies, might be vulgarized, and offered to the acceptance of the mass of mankind. In the ancient world, Truth, whether theological or physical, was, like the costly perfumes of the East, an exquisite luxury, which should be found only within marble palaces. But in the modern world, and this vast change is attributable mainly to the spread of Christianity, truth has become, like the very breezes of heaven, common property, and is everywhere sweet, salutary, free. I. T.

THE order and course of Paul's Second Journey is easily remembered by noting its three geographical divisions—the first including Asia Minor; the second, Macedonia, with the cities of Philippi, Thessalonica, and Berea; the third (upon which we now enter), Greece, then called Achaia. Athens and Corinth were its principal cities. (See map, p. 129.)

16, 17. Athens, forty-six miles east of Corinth, was situated three to four miles from the coast of the Saronic Gulf, though connected by a wall-inclosure with its seaport, Piræus. It had long been distinguished above other ancient cities in art and philosophy, in learning and culture; noted, too, for its statesmen and warriors. Even in its subject and

1. The Agora, or market, upon a low level in a central locality—a place of concourse for traffic, for worship, and for public discourse or discussion. 2. The Museum, upon a hill (south of the Agora). 3. The Pnyx, an inclosed rocky eminence (on the west of the Agora) where political assemblages met. 4. The Acropolis, a towering temple-crowned height on the east, with a table summit (1,000 by 500 feet), long appropriated to the structures and offices of worship. 5. Another separate rocky eminence (on the north of the Agora, between the Pnyx and the Acropolis), the Areopagus, or Mars Hill—so called from the legendary trial of that god. A flight of sixteen steps, cut in the stone, led up from the Agora to the Areopagus. Here was the seat of the supreme tribunal, which sentenced eminent State criminals, and adjudicated upon questions of religion. No other place was so appropriate for the proposed theme of Paul's discourse.

All these five centers of popular interest were still great sanctuaries of art, religion, and history. They were still resplendent with temple-structures, porticoes, and altars; edifices of the rarest architectural beauty, consecrated to the gods and to the glory of declining condition under the Romans, it was still outwardly magnificent—still famous for its trophies of art, its schools of science and philosophy. It was still the university of the world, and its people retained all their pride of knowledge and culture.

There were mainly five great centers of public attraction, centers of renowned historic transactions.

They were filled with the master-pieces of statuary, by Phidias and his creative successors, representing all mythical and imaginary divinities, and all memorable persons and events in the long brilliant history of this widely known and famous city. But all this glory of art and history was perverted to the uses and corrupting effects of idolatrous worship. Appreciating, as Paul could, the grandeur and beauty of its architecture and sculptures, the high culture and renowned deeds represented in its monumental statuary, his heart was yet profoundly saddened by the waste and misuse of these products of genius in their subservience to a worship which was the medium of all selfish and vile gratification. Destitute of all knowledge of God and of sin, without any high aim or object in living, their religious sentiments, beliefs, and ceremonies of worship, nay more, the very ministry of art, taste, and culture, encouraged and wrought only a shameless profligacy. The popular estimate of the character of their gods was such that Seneca said, "that no other effect could possibly be produced, but that all shame on account of sin must be taken away from men, if they believe in such gods."

Beholding the multitude of idols, to which such a character was attributed and such worship rendered, no wonder that Paul's spirit was stirred within him. No wonder that with the Jews in the synagogue, and with the Greeks in the Agora or market, he reasoned (not disputed), and preached his old theme—Jesus and the Resurrection.

18-21. Here, first, Christianity came in contact with human philosophy: especially with the two systems most at variance with its pure and elevating principles. Daily, for many days, he entered this new arena, where men congregated for worship or gossip, for trade or discussion; and in temple, bazaar, or cloister, boldly avowed and pressed home the Christian truth upon all of every creed and class who would listen. Of the four great schools of philosophy, which had their origin and seat in the city of Socrates, only the representatives of two seem to have here encountered Paul. No reference is made to disciples of the two more distinguished philosophers, Plato and Aristotle; the former, as pupil of Socrates, founder of the Lyceum, and the latter of the Academy. B.—It is observable that no mention is here made of the Peripatetics, Academics, or Platonists, whose doctrines were not so much opposed to Christianity as those of the Stoics and Epicureans. Indeed, they may be said to have in some degree prepared the better part of the world for the reception of the gospel. W.

In a remarkable conception respecting the Teacher from heaven whom the world needs, occurs this prophetic utterance of Plato: "This just person must be poor, and void of all qualifications but those of virtue alone. A wicked world will not bear his instructions and reproofs; and therefore, within three or four years after he begins to preach, he should be persecuted, imprisoned, scourged, and at last be put to death." B.

Plan of Athens, showing the Agora, or Market, the Pnyx, the Arcopagus, the Acropolis, and the Museum.

Epicureans, or Philosophers of the Garden, owed their name to Epicurus, who died at Athens in B. C. 270, leaving his house and garden to be the constant seat of his philosophy; which was accordingly maintained there till the time of which we are now reading. He taught that the highest good and great end of existence was serene enjoyment, which his followers interpreted as meaning pleasure, and that often of the grossest kind. He ascribed the creation of the world to chance; and, although he acknowledged the existence of the gods, described them as indifferent to human interests and human conduct. The Stoics, or Philosophers of the Porch, were so called from the Stoa Pæcile, or Painted Porch, adjoining one of the Athenian squares or markets, where their founder taught at the same time with Epicurus. The Stoics acknowledged the supremacy of moral good, and even affected to deny the difference between pain and pleasure. They also acknowledged a supreme God and a providence; but the former confounded with the world or universe, the latter governed by a fatal necessity. In later times, the Epicurean system was a favorite with the Greeks, and the Stoical with the Romans, as suiting their national characters respectively; but each had adherents in both races. J. A. A.—In Epicureanism, it was man's sensual nature which arrayed itself against the claims of the gospel; in Stoicism, it was his self-righteousness and pride of intellect ; and it is difficult to say which of the two systems rendered its votaries the more indisposed to embrace the truth. Hackett.

With mixed curiosity and scorn, Paul was heard by these disciples of Epicurus and Zeno. Some called him "babblers," literally, a bird that picks up seeds ; then, a scrap-beggar about the marketplace ; and last, a reporter of idle tales picked up anywhere. Others, according to the Greek notion of peopling all worlds with spiritual powers or demons, said, He is telling us of new demons or deities. Still they were so much interested in Paul's teaching that they asked him to address them more formally and at length, from the inclosure of the Areopagus adjoining, and led him up the stony steps to a rock-hewn platform. B.

He had brought the new truth, to proclaim it in this capital of men's intellectual life. In his person, on his landing at the Piræus, the morning light of the new age rose on a second continent. Yet everything about him was appallingly bleak, every face was unfriendly. Any courage less valiant than that of the Son of God in his heart must have quailed before the overpowering splendor and despotism of the old heathenism, in the very stronghold of its dominion. Athens was the brain of the world. The apostle had come to it, as fearless of its sophistries and arrogance as he had been of the swords and dungeons of Syria. He had come to say : "You classic Greeks, artists, poets, philosophers, are seeking after wisdom ; but the foolishness of God is wiser than the wisest of you. One

God made you ; one Saviour died for you. Your Olympus is a fiction. I preach unto you Christ, and him crucified, the wisdom of God and the power of God ; your Saviour, if you will be saved." How right that this should have been spoken from the Athenian Areopagus, the hill-top of that luminous center of the old pagan civilization : where Stoics and Epicureans and soldiers—philosophy and pleasure and power—Alexandria and Corinth and Rome, and the three continents, could hear ! F. D. H.

Not only in Athens, but no doubt often in his circuit through Greece and its colonies, he stood surrounded by the sarcastic curiosity of Stoics, Epicureans, and Academicians. He knew, on such occasions, in what spirit he was listened to, as a busy and babbling zealot of the Jewish superstition. He could penetrate—nay, he could feel a sympathy with the erudite scorn of his auditors : he understood the sentiment with which men of high culture give ear, for a moment, to a tale of wonder which they have condemned as absurd before it is commenced. In the oblique glance of the half-closed eye, in the sneer that played on the lip, he read the mind and the malice of every sophist. He could mentally change positions with his auditors, and at the moment while uttering the "strange things" of the gospel could feel as they felt—the harsh and abhorrent character both of the principles and of the facts which he had to announce—Jesus, the Galilean teacher—crucified—raised to life—constituted Lord and Judge of men, and now giving repentance for remission of sins. This was his burden, at Antioch, at Ephesus, at Nicopolis, at Corinth, and at Athens! I. T.

22, 23. The Introduction and Theme of Paul's Discourse on Mars Hill.—The outlook upon the city from the memorable rocky height upon which he stood, the character of his audience, and the special purpose for which they were now gathered about him, help us to some just appreciation of the courage of the man, and of his wonderful skill in shaping his discourse. In it we find a rare combination of prudence and courtesy, of wisdom, fidelity, and boldness. Never was Paul's own counsel to Timothy (2 Tim. 2 : 24), especially its one particular, apt to teach, more signally illustrated than in this introduction and in the plan of his address. He does not (as our translation unhappily expresses it) charge them with being "superstitious" or with "ignorantly" worshipping. He simply speaks of their exceeding devoutness or reverence for their gods; and characterizes their worship by borrowing the very term inscribed on their altar. As a wise and model reformer, he knows that truth expels error as light banishes darkness. He seizes his opportunity, not to denounce heathen priestcraft and impure worship, but to proclaim the true God and explain true worship. With a divine guidance he masters the peril of his position by turning its very difficulties into a means of education and of conviction. As often before, in the manner of Christ, he uses things familiar to the Athenians to teach them great and sublime truths they had never apprehended. With this purpose and in this spirit he refers to the multitude of altars (not devotions, but objects of devotion), and takes his theme from an inscription upon one: (literally) To GOD UNKNOWABLE. This God, whom they unknowingly worshiped, and whom they thought to be unknowable, Paul proclaims to them. And he addresses them as men of intelligence, and of capable judgment, in all things showing them proper respect and courtesy. B.

The religion of the Greek had in it a kind of attractiveness, but it took all the grandeur out of the universe. Instead of seeing the supreme God and Father everywhere and in all things—shining in the beauty, dazzling in the glory, giving in the fruitfulness, speaking in the truth—he saw himself imaged there. It was man's universe, not Jehovah's. He humanized the clouds, the forests, the rivers, the seas; peopled them with deities and half deities, with satyrs and fauns, with muses and nymphs, each of which represented some side of man's nature. He set upon everything his own image and super-scription. If there was any real and mighty God, any power irresistibly making for righteousness and yet overflowing with love, the Greek had pushed him afar off and out. At best there remained but a horrible dream of God in his conception of all-comprehending and relentless fate. The altar "to the unknown God" became the only Greek altar which was in any sense an altar to the true God. D. S. G.—Paul declared the unknown God, whom the Athenians ignorantly worshiped, to be the great Creator of the world, in whom and by whom all things were made, and exist. From the visible proofs of his providence, in his government of the world, he leads them to the consideration of his spiritual nature; and thus condemns the idolatrous worship of the Athenians, while he gradually unfolds to his philosophical audience the important truths of their accountableness and immortality, which were demonstrated by the fact of Christ's resurrection from the dead. G. T.

24, 25. God, the Creator, Ruler, and Life of the Universe needeth no Service of Men's Hands.—The independent, unlimited, absolute source and controller of all manifest existences is separate from and superior to all. In this implied statement, without directly controverting the polytheism of the Greeks, or particular notions of Epicurean or Stoic, Paul yet overturns the main points of all their systems. For he announces a personal God, against the Greek belief in material deities; he declares "the unity of the Godhead, against Polytheism; the creation of all things by him, against the Epicurean theory of a fortuitous concourse of atoms; of his government of the world, against the Stoical doctrine of Fate and the Epicurean notion of indifference" (Wordsworth).

With temples on every side, majestic and beautiful, but structures of human hands, he yet boldly asserts (as Stephen before him to the Jews) that in hand-made temples the Lord—the Master—of heaven and earth does not dwell; to them he is not confined. Nay, more, with thousands of altars smoking with offerings, and ten thousand idol-shrines laden with costly gifts and with food and drink, from those who thus supplied their dependent deities' needs, Paul as boldly announces the new and elevating truth, that the Maker and Giver of all needs no ministry of those He has made. And amid innumerable forms of idol gods, wrought in gold and silver and stone with every ingenious device of finest human art, he hesitates not to tell them that the Godhead is not to be conceived of or symbolized under such graven or chiseled forms. So boldly and wisely Paul disclosed the positive and fundamental conceptions relating to the one only living and true God. Having thus declared the unity of God, with his creatorship and control of the universe, he turns to consider the corresponding unity of man, and his place and work in God's plan. B.

Up to a certain point in this high view of the Supreme Being, the Philosopher of the Garden, as well as of the Porch, might listen with wonder and admiration. It soared, indeed, high above the vulgar religion; but in the lofty and serene Deity, who disdained to dwell in the earthly temple, and needed nothing from the hand of man, the Epicurean might almost suppose that he heard the language of his own teacher. But the next sentence, which asserted the providence of God as the active, creative energy—as the conservative, the ruling, the ordaining principle—annihilated at once the atomic theory, and the government of blind chance, to which Epicurus ascribed the origin and preservation of the universe. Milman.—And when the Stoic heard the apostle say that we ought to rise to the contemplation of the Deity without the intervention of earthly objects, and that we live and move and have our being in him—it might have seemed like an echo of his own thought—until the proud philosopher learned that it was no pantheistic diffusion of power and order of which the apostle spoke, but a living center of government and love—that the world was ruled, not by the iron necessity of Fate, but by the providence of a personal God—and that from the proudest philosopher repentance and meek submission were sternly exacted. H.

26-29. Mankind one in Nature, limited and controlled as to Time and Place; yet Children of God, supplied by his Providence, and designed for his Companionship.—Heathenism had never attained the conception of unity in the origin or in the history of the race. According to the common belief, different races or nations had a different origin, and each its independent mission and history. Humanity had no common ties of interest, association, and destiny. This erroneous belief, which suggested and fostered the idea of many gods, Paul corrects by the assertion that God had made all nations of one blood. Especially he cuts up by the root the conceit of the Athenians that they came of an aboriginal stock, and were thus distinct from and superior to all others. B.—The Greeks were a fine race of men; and they knew it. They trusted in themselves that they were intellectually and physically beautiful, and despised others. Mankind were divided in their conception into two great sections—Greeks and Barbarians. They would not admit a community of race with other peoples. Arnot.—Paul tells them that they belong to the one race, made and controlled by the one God; that this God is not far from them; that he can be sought and found by them; nay, more, that he has made them in order that they might seek his fellowship, and so find that supreme good for which their souls had long been craving and unconsciously groping. B.

Till Christ came, this majestic fact in our condition, that our little human tent here is overarched by an infinite heaven of light and love which really opens and pours down a living influence upon us, scarcely anywhere broke through the pagan shadows. Here and there, in some half-awakened soul, there was a religious dream or guess—some glimmer of the light that was to rise on rich and poor alike—some Athenian thinker, such as Paul found “feeling after God, if haply he might find him”—some solitary flash like the Stoic maxim, “Deny thyself and aspire,” almost worthy of the Son of man—some morning-star like the reason of Plato. But these harbingers of the day only cast slender streaks on a few hill-tops, showing how broad and deep the darkness lay on all the lands below. F. D. H.

Not far from any one of us. Paul purposely calls this to mind in addressing the men of Athens, who were accustomed to represent their gods as in Olympic rest and self-satisfaction, throning it high above earth and her puny inhabitants. He was really within reach of their hand; they had not to climb to the height of heaven, or to descend into the depths of earth, but merely to look within their own bosoms, in order to discover unmistakable traces of him. Van O.

Then he advances to the idea of the fatherhood of God. To conciliate their minds toward this grand truth, he cites one of the many vague conceptions of this fatherly relation (of Jove), found in passages of the Greek mythical poetry. The words quoted are found in an astronomical poem of Aratus, a native of Soli in Paul's own province of Cilicia; and also in a hymn to Jupiter by Cleanthes of Lycia.

The point which Paul makes (v. 29) of our childhood to God, as proving image-worship to be irrational, is presented in the same conciliatory spirit. “As we are the offspring of God, we ought not to think,” etc. But he puts his point clearly and strongly. If we, possessing such intellectual and spiritual forces, are sprung from Him, we must conceive of God as something other and higher than a mere metal or stone image. This human spirit can not proceed from the stone or metal forms which human hands have shaped. Human hands can not create the Creator of this breathing, moving, living fabric of body and soul.

30, 31. Their Past Ignorance God had overlooked; but now, in the Light from the Incarnation, the Cross, and the Resurrection of Christ, all are enjoined to Repentance and Trust; and Disobedience must encounter only Stern Condemnation.—Two further instances of Paul's moderation and forbearance occur in the simple phrase; "the times of this ignorance." One, that the weightiest charge he makes against corrupt heathenism is its ignorance. The other, that he does not make even this a personal charge against his listeners; he only includes them in a general way with the cultured heathen of many centuries. Yet, though so courteous and conciliatory, he is faithful. For he does charge these intelligent and polished Athenians with ignorance. And, while intimating that God forbore with (not "winked at"—a figure the word will not bear) the ignorance of past generations, suffering it to pass without special interference of his grace or reproof, sending no messengers to them as he did to the Jews, yet, in God's name, he now commands their repentance, as sharing the common guilt of men. In his previous daily preaching, the apostle had taught some of them about repentance and faith in the crucified and risen Christ. Now he presses the obligation upon all to confess and turn from sin; and enforces God's command by the great, decisive fact that they, with all mankind, must stand before Christ in an appointed day of judgment. And, in completion of his appeal, he adds, that Christ, now impliedly the Saviour, is proven by the resurrection to be then the Judge! B.

There is a day appointed wherein the Son of man will appear in sensible glory, and exercise his judicial power upon angels and men. He is now "seated at the right hand of the Majesty on high," and the celestial spheres are under his feet: universal nature feels the power of his scepter: he reigns in the hearts of the saints by his Word and Spirit, and restrains the fury of his enemies in what degrees he pleases; but still his servants are in distress, and his rebellious enemies insolently break his laws; and the curtains of heaven conceal his glory from us: therefore a time is prefixed when in the face of the world he will make an eternal difference by rewards and punishments between the righteous and the wicked, and his government shall have its complete and glorious issue. Bates.

32-34. Results of Paul's Discourse to the as- sembled Athenians.—Wise, forbearing, and conciliatory as was his address, the indirect preaching of personal guilt, accountability, and condemnation to the haughty self-righteous Stoic and the pleasure-seeking Epicurean, and especially the mention of a resurrection—counted by all classes an impossible absurdity—at once broke up the audience, and "Paul departed from among them." B.

Paul rightly divided that day the Word of Truth, and the Word divided the hearers into distinct and well-defined groups; into mockers, hesitators, and cleaving believers. The mockers, whether socially higher or lower, were in spirit the hardest and coldest of the company. They were fast and free livers. They enjoyed life, and kept the thought of death away. They went away laughing at the truth of God and the God of truth. The hesitators, convinced in their consciences that the testimony of the apostle had all the air of truth, did not dare to scoff; but, wedded to their own ease and pleasure, they were not willing to take up the cross and follow Christ. Accordingly they made a respectful apology to the preacher and went away. The third class cleaved to him and believed; that is, while this man's lips were the channel through which the Word of Life reached them, the ultimate longing of their hearts—their ultimate grasp—reached and rested on Christ crucified, whom Paul preached. They cleaved to Paul, but they believed in Christ. Arnot.

A few converts were gained; but one of the large and intelligent class whom he had aimed to reach. With his name is intimated his membership of that most ancient Athenian tribunal comprising only men of the highest integrity and greatest distinction. The lesson of this failure was of great value to Paul; and he has written it in full in the first three of his Epistles. Among communities of the ignorant, the hardened, and even the wealthy and profligate, as in Asia Minor and Macedonia, and afterward in Corinth and Ephesus, the gospel found ready and abundant entrance. But in this city, which represented the highest attainments in human wisdom and genius, it could obtain no foothold. Paul's utter failure here to found a church of Christ not only showed that "the world by wisdom knew not God," but that mere human wisdom is the mightiest hindrance to the introduction of the knowledge of God, and to the acceptance of a gracious salvation.

In every age, the same two states of mind comprise the chief hindrances to the entrance and converting energy of the truth of God. On the one hand, a worldly heart and the love of pleasure, exemplified by the Sadducees among the Jews and the Epicureans among the Greeks. On the other, the pride of reason and of self-righteousness, exemplified by the Pharisees and the Stoics. Behind these two hindering states of mind and helping to produce them, were the two leading heresies of ancient and modern times: one—the doctrine of the Stoics—that confounds God with his entire creation, or pantheism; the other—that of the Epicureans—which denies a God in creation, or materialism. B.

God can dwell only in himself, where he was before he made the world. He is Himself his temple. Nevertheless, he has built as many temples for himself as there are living hearts that love him; in these he desires to dwell, to be known, and to be adored. Aug.

In every age, those who in any measure realize the force of truth are to be classified as were Paul's hearers in Athens: those who dare deride it; those who hesitate and put off obedience to its demands; and those who take it to their hearts. B.

Section 219.

Acts xviii. 1-22.

- 1 AFTER these things Paul departed from Athens, and came to Corinth; and found a certain Jew named Aquila, born in Pontus, lately come from Italy, with his wife Priscilla; (because that Claudius had commanded all Jews to depart from Rome:) and came unto them.
- 2 And because he was of the same craft, he abode with them, and wrought: for by their occupation they were tentmakers. And he reasoned in the synagogue every sabbath, and persuaded the Jews and the Greeks. And when Silas and Timotheus were come from Macedonia, Paul was pressed in the spirit, and testified to the Jews that Jesus was Christ.
- 3 And when they opposed themselves, and blasphemed, he shook his raiment, and said unto them, Your blood be upon your own heads; I am clean: from henceforth I will go unto the Gentiles.
- 4 And he departed thence, and entered into a certain man's house, named Justus, one that worshipped God, whose house joined hard to the synagogue. And Crispus, the chief ruler of the synagogue, believed on the Lord with all his house; and many of the Corinthians hearing believed, and were baptized. Then spake the Lord to Paul in the night by a vision,
- 5 Be not afraid, but speak, and hold not thy peace: for I am with thee, and no man shall set on thee to hurt thee: for I have much people in this city. And he continued there a year and six months, teaching the word of God among them.
- 6 And when Gallio was the deputy of Achaia, the Jews made insurrection with one accord against Paul, and brought him to the judgment seat, saying, This fellow persuadeth men to worship God contrary to the law. And when Paul was now about to open his mouth, Gallio said unto the Jews, If it were a matter of wrong or wicked lewdness, O ye Jews, reason would that I should bear with you: but if it be a question of words and names, and of your law, look ye to it; for I will be no judge of such matters. And he drave them from the judgment seat. Then all the Greeks took Sosthenes, the chief ruler of the synagogue, and beat him before the judgment seat. And Gallio cared for none of those things.
- 7 And Paul after this tarried there yet a good while, and then took his leave of the brethren, and sailed thence into Syria, and with him Priscilla and Aquila; having shorn his head in Cenchrea: for he had a vow. And he came to Ephesus, and left them there: but he himself entered into the synagogue, and reasoned with the Jews. When they desired him to tarry longer time with them, he consented not; but bade them farewell, saying, I must by all means keep this feast that cometh in Jerusalem: but I will return again unto you, if God will. And he sailed from Ephesus. And when he had landed at Cæsarea, and gone up, and saluted the church, he went down to Antioch.

PAUL does not forget, even when he is living for the higher aim, the care meanwhile necessary for the things of this world. Faith in the earthly task, not less than in the heavenly calling, is here shown in its true nature and in its high significance. The preacher of the gospel and the tent-maker are not two distinct persons, but one and the same; in a higher and lower sphere, animated by the same principle, and with the question on his lips: "Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?" He shuns not to declare the whole counsel of God; but there is in Corinth no more faithful, honest, conscientious artisan than he. Van O.—The having a trade, besides enabling him to present an example of quiet industry to his converts, gave him scope for the exercise of self-denial and almsgiving. The extra work and weariness which the trade entailed was a means of keeping under his body and bringing it into subjection; while the money which it brought in to him was employed in relieving the wants of others as well as his own; for he says to the elders of Ephesus: "Ye yourselves know that these hands have ministered unto my necessities, and to them that were with me. I have showed you all things, how that so laboring ye ought to support the weak." E. M. G.

Let none be ashamed who follow a trade; but only let those be ashamed who live to no purpose, and are idle. The souls of those who are always at work are purer and stronger; for the idler speaks and does many vain things. But he who labors aright does not easily allow anything useless, either in work, word, or thought, for his soul is always directed to a life of labor. For we are the disciples of the fishermen, of the publicans, of the tent-makers, of Him who was brought up in the carpenter's house. Chrys.

1. Paul finally withdraws from Athens and goes to Corinth.—After his brief work and its scanty results, he goes from intellectual but idle Athens, with nothing living but its memories of past eminence, to busy, bustling, crowded Corinth. Forty-five miles apart, both cities were in Greece, or the Roman province of Achaia. This province comprised the mainland south of Macedonia, and the peninsula called Peloponnesus, or island of Pelops.

A neck of land, itself a barren plain, about four miles across at the narrowest part, joined the peninsula with the mainland. Called the Isthmus (afterward giving a name to similar strips of connecting land), it was washed on the western side by the

Greece Proper and Peloponnesus. (Note the positions of Athens and Corinth; the Saronic Gulf, between the two cities; the Gulf of Corinth, west and north of Corinth; and the Isthmus, between the two Gulfs.)

Gulf of Corinth, flowing in from the Adriatic Sea ; and on the eastern by the Saronic Gulf, a great inlet of the Ægean Sea. Across the northern end of the Isthmus ran a mountain ridge, having only three defiles, or passes. The southern end was also protected by a ridge (on the east and middle), and by a lofty rock-citadel rising abruptly to a height of two thousand feet, called the Acrocorinthus. Between the ridge and the rocky height was a ravine, and on either gulf side a level place. At the base of the northern slope of the Acrocorinthus, "just within the Isthmus, on a table-land descending in terraces to the low plain," lay the city of Corinth. By two seaports—Lechæum on the Western Sea, and Cenchrea on the Eastern—it could send forth its ships westward and eastward into all waters, and to all the ports of the known then world. And to save time and avoid peril, vessels from either port were borne over the narrow Isthmus, thus affording larger opportunity for interchange of commodities in the transit and tarry.

The ancient city, i. e., the Grecian Corinth, had had a memorable history. It had colonized the shores of the Ionian and Ægean Seas with noted cities. It had established an early historic fame for success in arts and arms, and in manufacture, as well as for commercial greatness and prosperity. But the Greek Corinth lasted only until b. c. 146. B. —In that year, by an insult to the ambassadors of Rome, it drew down that terrible destruction which Cicero describes as the extinction of the "light of Greece." Excepting the temples and the buildings on the Acrocorinthus, the city lay in ruins for a century, till it was rebuilt by Julius Cesar in b. c. 46, and the new Colonia Julia Corinthus was made the capital of the Roman province of Achaia.

Corinth and the Acrocorinthus.

and the residence of the proconsul. Rapidly recovering its ancient wealth, as a place of great commercial and manufacturing enterprise, it regained also its infamous celebrity as the most dissolute of Greek cities, and a chief seat of the worship of Aphrodite; while at the same time it was second only to Athens in intellectual activity. S.—It is now an inconsiderable town of two thousand inhabitants with few remnants of the splendid buildings which gave name to the Corinthian order of architecture J. A. A.

Not only by its intense activity and its world-extended commerce was Corinth fitted to be a Christian center, but its people comprised the three main elements upon whom the apostle sought to impress the truths of the gospel. There were in largest numbers the native Greeks of every class and degree of culture. As a Roman colony, there were also a great number of Romans, as is intimated by the Latin names in Rom. 16, that epistle being written from Corinth during Paul's second visit. And that a chief settlement of Jews was at Corinth, we know from its commercial distinction, and their universal prominence as world-traders, and from Paul's Epistles to the Corinthians. And at this time many had been banished from Rome by Claudius. For these reasons, Paul was guided in the selection of Corinth as the first great center of European Christianity. B.—Corinth claims a conspicuous distinction as the residence of the apostle during his most critical contests, both with Jews and Greeks, in defense of the very essence of the gospel; as the place whence he wrote his first apostolic letters—the two Epistles to the Thessalonians; as the Church to which he addressed those other two epistles, which not only contain the fullest directions on matters of Christian faith and practice, but which reiterate, in terms unequaled in human language for simplicity and force, the one great central truth of the whole gospel—Jesus Christ and Him Crucified. S.—From Corinth also, upon his second visit (and third journey), he wrote his most elaborate and instructive Epistle to the Romans.

2, 3. Takes up his Abode with Aquila and Priscilla.—Though natives of Pontus in Northeastern Asia Minor, these Jews had resided in Rome, until recently expelled thence with others by Claudius, the fourth Roman emperor. But we find a kind Providence in that edict of Claudius that drove these childless, well-to-do tent-makers with their sympathetic, refined natures from Rome to Corinth. This was God's care of Paul's personal comfort, and his arrangement for the missionary's self-supporting toil. Thus, during the most effective and trying period of his whole career, with the "open door" for the gospel and the "many adversaries," Paul had a home, congenial fellowship, and what he also greatly needed then, a means of invigorating, physical toil and of independent subsistence.

Tent-making he had been taught as a trade in early life, in accordance with universal Jewish usage. This was based upon the idea that without some means of honest livelihood the temptation might arise to knavery or theft. "Teach thy son the law, and teach him a trade!" was the Talmudic instruction to fathers. The latter custom still obtains in the East, and to some extent in Germany and Russia. We may add that the use of tents was and still is very great in those regions; and tent-making has always been a large and important business. The material—still largely used—was a cloth of goat's hair, which was obtained chiefly from Paul's native province of Cilicia. From the fact that Aquila had a house in Corinth, and afterward another in Ephesus (1 Cor. 16 : 19), and one also in Rome (Rom. 16 : 3-5), it would seem that he conducted an extended and prosperous business, at the same time laboring with his own hands. So that his example, as well as that of Paul, affords a signal illustration of the precept: Not slothful in business; fervent in spirit; serving the Lord! They showed that daily labor, hand-toil or brain-toil (both equally honorable), consists perfectly with and helps to promote spirituality of mind and consecration of heart.

It is further to be noted that Paul had other and special reasons in laboring for his own support among the Greeks of Corinth and Achaia. It was not a pride of personal independence that led him to forego in his own behalf the Christian law of ministerial support upon which he so earnestly insists in writing to these very Corinthians (1 Cor. 9 : 7-14). But he "would not be burdensome to them"; nor would he give opportunity to selfish, sharp-eyed Greeks, in or out of the Church, to charge him with seeking theirs and not them. Lest we should hinder the gospel of Christ, summed up his assigned reasons for declining support from the feeble, partially instructed Corinthian Church.

4-6. His Brief Ministry in the Synagogue, and how brought to a Close.—Until the arrival of Silas and Timothy—probably for some weeks—he wrought daily through the week, and on the Sabbath earnestly preached in the synagogue to Jews and Greeks. During this period, until after the encouraging vision and words of Christ (vs. 9, 10), Paul seems to have passed through something like Elijah's one experience of excited depression, though without any corresponding act of defection. Speaking of this period, he tells the Corinthians that he was with them in weakness, and in fear, and in much trembling; while the tone of both Epistles implies his intensely moved yet depressed frame of mind at this time. And the occurrence in the synagogue, with the special manifestation of Christ immediately following, confirms an impression derived from these Epistles, that the whole of this first Corinthian visit was a time of ordeal and crisis, a period the most active, trying, and decisive in his entire apostolic career.

Yet this depressed state of mind did not arise from personal timidity, for of this, like Elijah, he had none. But his utter failure in Athens, the vastness of that brilliant but most flagrant corruption in the midst of which he stood alone for God, his deep sense of impotence to cope with such tremendous forces of evil, the hardened perversity of the Jews against the truth and their virulent hatred against himself, and his own felt desolation and utter loneliness although naturally so self-reliant—these combined causes stirred all his soul within him. In this excited yet depressed condition Silas and Timothy found him; and, while relieving his loneliness with their human sympathy and spiritual fellowship, they stimulated his spirit the more by their encouraging news from the Churches of Thessalonica and Berea.

As Christ was straitened till his baptism of suffering was accomplished, so Paul, under this state of unworldly excitement, was straitened in his work of testimony for Christ. And this intense pressure of spirit wrought itself out in direct fervent appeals to the Jews—to God's own people, who ought to have heeded. But almost as one man, with only a single known exception, they opposed Paul and blasphemed their own Messiah, Jesus. And, under the same intense sense of crisis, the apostle symbolically protests, as their prophets were wont to do, by shaking his raiment; emphatically asserts his own clearance from the guilt of their destruction; and, with warning solemnity, places that guilt upon themselves.

7, 8. Forsakes the Synagogue, and preaches in the Court of Justus's House.—As before, at Antioch of Pisidia, Paul departs from the Jewish house of worship. But he goes not far, and with him goes the synagogue's chief ruler as a Christian disciple. In an adjoining house, gladly opened to him by another convert to Christ—a Roman proselyte named Justus—he resumes his fervent faithful ministry. In this new preaching-place, accessible to all of every race and creed and station, many Corinthians were drawn in to hear the truth; and many, besides Crispus and Justus, believed, and confessed Christ in their baptism. B.—From this, as well as several other passages, we find that, when the parents, or heads of households, became Christian believers, so did their children. All were baptized together. So, in one place, we read of “the church which is in the house of Nymphas”; showing that such a group of believers, comprising parents and their children, might constitute a church of itself. How much beauty and sanctity there would be in such a spectacle—a church in each house—and how mightily the world would gain in Christian order, purity, and power, if it were generally realized! F. D. H.

9, 10. The Manifestation and Encouraging Charge of Christ.—This vision and the subsequent prosecution before Gallio seem to have occurred very soon after Paul's departure from the synagogue; and while he was still “in weakness and fear and much trembling.” Discerning this state of His apostle's heart and the sense of insufficiency that was enfeebling his faith, and foreknowing the greatness of his labor and conflict in the protracted ministry before him, Christ, by this miraculous appearance and word, forearms while forewarning Paul. B.—“I have much people in this city”—serving now at heathen altars, slaves now of the grossest vices, nevertheless they are my people; and here you are to abide, from these vile dust-heaps to gather out my jewels—they have not chosen me, but I have chosen them; not for their merits, but out of my mercy chosen them before the foundation of Corinth, or of the world itself. If God's ways are equal, unless there was one rule for the sinners of Corinth and another for us, none are chosen from regard to their merits, or saved through their own ability—salvation being all of grace, pure and undeserved. T. G.

Enough for this single-hearted worker and trustful disciple were the two simple clear declarations of his Master: I am with thee, and I have much peo- ple in this city! No longer could he fear, or would he hold his peace. We believe and therefore speak! were among his after words to this very people (2 Cor. 4 : 7-13), verified beforehand in his present large and blessed experience among them. And his Lord's assurance of abundant success was with him only a stronger stimulus to persistent exertion.

11. Summary of Eighteen Months' Ministry in Corinth.—His labor was great, his encouragements and discouragements were many and signal. A large church was formed in Corinth, and smaller ones in Cenchrea and at other points in Achaia; for here, as everywhere, his ministry reached to many of the places accessible from the capital. Meanwhile Paul failed not to keep up communication with the infant churches of Macedonia. During this period, too, were written the Two EPISTLES TO THE THESSALONIANS. These were the first written Epistles; and the first of Paul's nine Letters to Churches, though the last in the order of our New Testament. Of these two Epistles, the first was prepared and sent soon after Timothy's arrival at Corinth with encouraging intelligence from the church at Thessalonica. Some months later, after receiving further information, the apostle sent the Second Letter to emphasize and confirm the instructions of the First. These Epistles furnish hints of his state of mind: his zealous absorption and success in his labors, his determination of self-support, and his keen sensitiveness to the hostile spirit of the Jews. B.—It is notorious that the order of the Epistles in the New Testament is not their real or chronological order. The mere placing of them in their true sequence throws considerable light upon the history; and, happily, the time of the composition of the more important Epistles can be stated with sufficient certainty. S.

12-17. Prosecution of Paul before Gallio.—This immediately followed the night-vision and promise of Christ; and in the result that promise was verified. The Jews were the persecutors. They assaulted Paul and brought him to the judgment seat of the proconsul Gallio. The accusation was the same for which Paul and Silas had been illegally scourged and imprisoned at Philippi. But Gallio (the brother of Seneca) had intelligence to discern the truth of the case, and courage to declare an independent judgment upon it. Like Lysias and Festus afterward, he refused to adjudicate upon religious questions outside of their bearing upon Roman law. In his decision, he ruled out the charge which the Jews had made. Not only this, but Paul's accusers were disgracefully driven from the judgment-seat. Even further than this, when the Greeks present immediately turned upon these accusing Jews and beat their leader Sosthenes, the new ruler of the synagogue, Gallio suffered it to be done in his presence.

And so, as Christ had said, "no man set on Paul to hurt him." His work went on not only without hindrance, but the influence of Greeks and Romans thus indirectly favored the Church and its teacher.

18-22. Conclusion of the Second Missionary Journey.—His work in Corinth for the time was done. Having entered the city alone, after eighteen months of bold, fervent toil, he left it with many converts and an organized church. Another organization in Cenchrea, and congregations of disciples at other points in Achaia, were additional fruits of his labor. B.

Much importance should not be attached to the fact, incidentally mentioned here, that he had his head shorn in Cenchrea, before embarking, on account of a vow. Paul's idea of liberty under the gospel did not go the length of forbidding liberty. He bore witness that those who made any of these observances their righteousness before God, shut themselves out from Christ ; but, when any one was justified through faith in the Redeemer, Paul and his fellow-apostles allowed the convert unlimited liberty to observe or not observe the Jewish ceremonial. Arnot.—With the Greeks it was usual only for slaves to wear the hair cut short ; and to have appeared with it cut short at Corinth among the Greek Christians might have exposed him to ridicule and his preaching to contempt. He acted with prudence, therefore, in not cutting off his hair till he was on the point of quitting Greece. W.

From the eastern harbor of Corinth, by the great route of commerce, he crossed over the Ægean to Ephesus, the emporium of the Asian coast. Here a few days' preaching proved so acceptable to the Jews that they prayed him to tarry. But he promised to return to them ; and, leaving Aquila and Priscilla in Ephesus, sailed to Cesarea. After a brief visit to Jerusalem, a greeting and report to the apostles and the Church, Paul returned for the last time to Antioch. About three years, from A. D. 51 to 54, this Second Journey had extended. B.

ACTS xviii. 23-28 ; xix. 1-20.

23 AND after he had spent some time there, he departed, and went over all the country of Galatia and Phrygia in order, strengthening all the disciples.

24 And a certain Jew named Apollos, born at Alexandria, an eloquent man, and mighty in the scriptures, came to Ephesus. This man was instructed in the way of the Lord ; and being fervent in the spirit, he spake and taught diligently the things of the Lord, knowing 26 only the baptism of John. And he began to speak boldly in the synagogue : whom when Aquila and Priscilla had heard, they took him unto them, and expounded unto him the way
27 of God more perfectly. And when he was disposed to pass into Achaia, the brethren wrote, exhorting the disciples to receive him : who, when he was come, helped them much which 28 had believed through grace : for he mightily convinced the Jews, and that publicly, shewing by the Scriptures that Jesus was Christ.

1 And it came to pass, that, while Apollos was at Corinth, Paul having passed through the
2 upper coasts came to Ephesus : and finding certain disciples, he said unto them, Have ye received the Holy Ghost since ye believed ? And they said unto him, We have not so much 3 as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost. And he said unto them, Unto what then were 4 ye baptized ? And they said, Unto John's baptism. Then said Paul, John verily baptized with the baptism of repentance, saying unto the people, that they should believe on him 5 which should come after him, that is, on Christ Jesus. When they heard this, they were 6 baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus. And when Paul had laid his hands upon them, 7 the Holy Ghost came on them ; and they spake with tongues, and prophesied. And all the 8 men were about twelve. And he went into the synagogue, and spake boldly for the space 9 of three months, disputing and persuading the things concerning the kingdom of God. But when divers were hardened, and believed not, but spake evil of that way before the multitude, he departed from them, and separated the disciples, disputing daily in the school of 10 one Tyrannus. And this continued by the space of two years ; so that all they which dwelt in Asia heard the word of the Lord Jesus, both Jews and Greeks.

11 And God wrought special miracles by the hands of Paul : so that from his body were 12 brought unto the sick handkerchiefs or aprons, and the diseases departed from them, and

13 the evil spirits went out of them. Then certain of the vagabond Jews, exorcists, took upon them to call over them which had evil spirits the name of the Lord Jesus, saying, We 14 adjure you by Jesus whom Paul preacheth. And there were seven sons of one Sceva, a Jew, 15 and chief of the priests, which did so. And the evil spirit answered and said, Jesus I know, 16 and Paul I know; but who are ye? And the man in whom the evil spirit was leaped on them, and overcame them, and prevailed against them, so that they fled out of that house 17 naked and wounded. And this was known to all the Jews and Greeks also dwelling at Ephe-18 sus; and fear fell on them all, and the name of the Lord Jesus was magnified. And many 19 that believed came, and confessed, and shewed their deeds. Many of them also which used curious arts brought their books together, and burned them before all men: and they counted 20 the price of them, and found it fifty thousand pieces of silver. So mightily grew the word of God and prevailed.

THE surface of our reading has immensely enlarged, but not the limits of human life. Our morning newspaper must be scanned; we must sweep the whole horizon, and be posted in the world's news. And then the race is working out great problems; thinkers are flinging their thoughts to the winds for the revolving arms of the printing press, and we must keep pace with the march of advanced thought. Many of the books are professedly religious, and so commend themselves to our consciences, and so piquant and palatable as to commend themselves to our taste. Thus, all unwittingly, while we believe in the Bible, praise it, we only read it by snatches. We fail to feed upon it with the keenness of relish and thoroughness of digestion essential to our highest profit. Hence arises a generation eloquent about the Scriptures, but not mighty in them. An.

The great question which we should be anxious to be able to answer in the affirmative is this, "Are we receiving the Holy Ghost since we believed?" Have we been ever since, and are we still, receiving the Holy Ghost? O blessed above all blessedness, if we can say that this is true of us! O blessed with a blessedness most complete, if we only do not too entirely abandon ourselves to enjoy it! Elect of God; holy and beloved; justified and sanctified; there is nothing in all the world that could impair or destroy such happiness, except we ourselves, in evil hour, believed it to be out of the reach of danger. T. A.

23. Commencement of Paul's Third Missionary Journey.—Recall the chief periods of Paul's apostolic career thus far: The First Journey of two years or more in Asia Minor; an interval of more than two years in Antioch and Syria; the Second Journey of three years or more through Asia Minor, Macedonia, and Achaia; and an interval of a few months at Antioch. Now he undertakes his Third and last Missionary Journey; again through Asia Minor, tarrying only among the churches in Phrygia and Galatia, abiding in Ephesus, and then visiting Macedonia and Achaia. The period of this final circuit (recorded Acts 18 : 23 to 21 : 17) covered about four years, from the summer or fall of A. D. 54 onward. During this period Paul wrote the Epistles to the Corinthians, to the Galatians, and to the Romans.

24-28. An Episode concerning Apollos.—With a few glimpses, Luke here introduces a remarkably fine natural and Christian character, and a history though brief yet rich in instructive suggestions. Apollos, like Paul, was chosen by Christ for his great and special work. He was taken out of the very region where, and from the class by whom, the Old Testament Scriptures had been translated three centuries before into the now world-language. Taught all the learning and trained in the culture of the schools of Alexandria, he had applied all his acquired resources with his great natural gifts to the study of his own Scriptures. Through some undisclosed teacher, the testimony of the Baptist to Christ and some of the leading facts of Christ's life and ministry had been brought to his knowledge. Enough he had heard to trace the correspondences of that Life with the Old Testament prophecy and promise; and to produce a conviction that Jesus of Nazareth was the expected Messiah. Though uninformed of the eventful issue of that Life, and of the marvels of Pentecost that followed the Ascension, his faith yet fastened itself, like Abraham's, to a dimly revealed Deliverer. To this Redeemer he consecrated himself and all his culture. Under divine prompting, he became a self-appointed evangelist of the Messiah; telling in fervent words all the gospel he knew, the gospel of the Prophets as fulfilled.

While Paul is traversing the provinces of Phrygia and Galatia, Apollos is led by the same Spirit to Ephesus, where Aquila and Priscilla had been some time abiding. No wonder that these tent-makers were intensely stirred when this man of bright intellect and burning zeal suddenly appeared in the synagogue at Ephesus; and, like another John, seemed by his eloquence and might of Scriptural truth to be preparing the way of the Lord. For, partially taught as he was, note Luke's description (vs. 24, 25) of his qualifications and his spirit. An eloquent man—one who could understand his subject and his occasion;

who could grasp and use his points of argument and appeal with clearness, force, and fervor; mighty in the Scriptures, in the substance and spirit, not in the letter, of the truth of God; instructed in the way of the Lord, so instructed only by the Lord's own Spirit; servent in the spirit, with a soul kindled and ever aglow with a Godlike love for God and man; he spake and taught diligently the things of the Lord—in private and public, without weariness or ceasing, unfolding and impressing the Scriptures of truth, those Old Testament Scriptures which Paul afterward affirmed, "are able to make wise unto salvation." These particulars may well be pondered, if we would learn the true secret of an evangelist's success. Quick to discern these divine gifts and the missionary spirit of Apollos, yet perceiving how defective was his knowledge of the gospel, the tent-makers sought to instruct him in the fullness of the truth which they had received from Paul. They recognized as their vocation, if not to preach, to teach more perfectly this divinely called preacher.

Again, by this teaching, as often before in this apostolic age, God honors the common priesthood of believers. While the apostles, and after them other appointed ministers, had due honor and a definite vocation, yet, in emergencies and for special purposes, unordained disciples ministered the Word and the ordinances. So, after Stephen's martyrdom, the scattered members of the infant Church went everywhere preaching the Word. So an obscure believer was Christ's messenger to Saul, to declare the truth and admit to the Christian fellowship. And in this case of Apollos, two simple disciples, and one a wo-

God as magnified in his thorough and beautiful Christian spirit. And if we trace through his subsequent history, and read all that Paul wrote concerning him, we find an absence of self-assertion, a retiring modesty, a spirit of humble, earnest helpfulness, blended with boldness and intense fervor. Watering that which Paul had planted, building upon Paul's foundation in Corinth, yet, when a party would form itself around himself as a Christian leader distinct from Paul, he withdraws to Ephesus, and toils thenceforth under the counsel and guidance of the veteran apostle.

Simply but clearly are the two chief functions of the gospel preacher intimated in connection with the work of Apollos at Corinth (vs. 27, 28). He helped them much which had believed through grace; and he mightily convinced those that were unbelieving.

1. At the End of a Considerable Journey, Paul settles down in Ephesus.—Timothy seems to have accompanied Paul throughout this Third Circuit; Titus in the earlier, and Luke in the later part. The route from Antioch was, as in the previous journey, over the Cilician plain, through the "Gates," the noted pass of the Taurus Range, into the high table-land of Lycaonia; thence through Cappadocia into Galatia, and then through Phrygia to the Ægean coast. Besides confirming and strengthening the churches everywhere throughout this journey, as specially charged by the apostles and brethren in Jerusalem he took order for future collections in behalf of the poorer Christians in Judea. Paul declares that he was "forward to do" this, that the helpfulness of Gentile to Jewish Christians might promote a closer spiritual unity and fellowship between them.

To Ephesus Paul now comes, in accordance with his previous promise (18 : 21). And Ephesus proved to be his working-center during the greater portion of this Third missionary tour, as Corinth had been during the larger half of the Second. For Ephesus, like Corinth, was a great world-center of commerce, population, and influence.

These two cities shared the highest position of prominence and power with Rome and Antioch. And in all these world-centers Paul planted an effective and aggressive Christianity. B.

man, were guided to this needed ministry of instruction by the Spirit of Christ.

The manner in which their joint ministry of help and guidance was accepted and acted upon by Apollos furnishes yet further evidence of the grace of extends to the Egean, which is watered by two of the long western rivers, the Hermus and the Meander, and which is celebrated through an extended period of classical history, and is sacred to us as the scene of the churches of the Apocalypse. Laodicea is in the basin of the Meander; Smyrna, Thyatira, Sardis, and Philadelphia are in that of the Hermus; Pergamus is further to the north, on the Caicus. Between the Hermus and the Meander is a smaller river, named the Cayster. And here, in the level valley of the Cayster, in a situation preëminent among the excellent positions which the Ionians chose for their cities, Ephesus was built, on some hills near the sea. H. (See map, p. 94.)

Originally the royal city of the kings of Ionia, it passed successively under the control of Persia and Lydia, until B. C. 129, when under the Roman rule it was made the capital of the province of Asia. Upon the great line of commerce east and west, the meeting place of vessels from all points of the Mediterranean, connected by great roads with the interior markets of the East, the most central point between east and west, it naturally drew together Jew and Greek, Roman and Oriental. It was, moreover, a free city, though the mass of its population was Oriental in origin and in worship. Reason enough we discern why Paul should tarry so long and toil so ardently here!

2-7. The Holy Ghost falls upon Twelve Disciples of John the Baptist.—Christian disciples they were, for the word is only used of such, and because Paul recognizes them as believers. Like Apollos, these men had not heard of the descent of the Holy Ghost. To Paul's question, "Did ye receive the Holy Ghost?" (referring not to the regenerating power, but to the extraordinary gifts which then so frequently followed conversion), they replied: "We did not even hear whether the Holy Ghost is," i. e., is given; whether these miraculous gifts have appeared. They had understood and practiced repentance toward God, and some vague yet real faith in the Lord Jesus Christ; but they had not heard Christ's disclosures about "another Comforter, the Holy Ghost," nor had they experienced his special Pentecostal gifts. John had taught Christ's true Messiahship. This was his central truth: Behold the Lamb of God! So much these men knew, when they were initiated by baptism into the religion which John taught. That religion included as its two main doctrines repentance or reformation of heart and life, and trust in that Lamb of God of whom John was the forerunner and herald.

After brief colloquy with these believers in the Messiah, Paul made clear what was vague, and fully unfolded Christ's career to His Ascension, and the sending of the Holy Ghost ten days thereafter. And now, with vastly enlarged vision of spiritual truth, and with deepened faith, "they were baptized into" (as better representing the chief idea of incorporation) "the name of the Lord Jesus." Again, as before, the laying on of the apostle's hands was followed with the miraculous gifts (the speaking with other tongues, and by special inspiration, i. e., "prophesying") of the Holy Ghost. And upon these twelve disciples Paul laid the foundation of the great Church of the Ephesians.

This singular incident (we note in passing), as well as the similar history of Apollos, shows how slowly the knowledge of the essential facts of Christianity was spread abroad. It further indicates the depth and force of the impression made upon the whole Jewish people by the brief yet powerful ministry of the Baptist. Nearly thirty years had now elapsed since his beheading by Herod, yet at two widely separated points we find so rich and precious fruit of his faithful testimony. B.—The incident is also important as showing that those who are in a truly believing state of mind believe more or less of Christian truth according to their opportunities of knowledge. Abraham's faith was probably as strong as that of Paul, but not so extensive. This gives us great hope for those who are ignorant, but not for those who reject the truth when made known. If one has "faith" he will hold "the faith" as soon as he can properly discover it; without "faith," holding "the faith" is a dead orthodoxy. Riddle.

8-10. Three Months in the Synagogue on the Sabbath, then Two Years in the School of Tyrannus daily, Paul preaches the Word of the Lord Jesus.—Though Aquila and Priscilla are not mentioned here, we have seen them so lately instructing Apollos, and we find them so soon again sending salutations to Corinth in the apostle's letter from Ephesus (1 Cor. 16), that we can not but believe he met his old associates. It is even probable that he again worked with them at the same trade: for in the address to the Ephesian elders (20 : 34) he stated that "his own hands had ministered to his necessities"; and in writing to the Corinthians he says (1 Cor. 4 : 11, 12) that such toil had continued even "to that hour." H.

First, three months in the synagogue he spoke boldly. His theme, as at Thessalonica, was that of the Baptist. It was that doctrine of the kingdom of God which was the key to Christ's whole ministry. To the Jews, who were still looking for a visible world-empire, he faithfully declared and pressed home the truth respecting "the kingdom of God within them," as the condition of entrance into the final glory of the everlasting kingdom. But his bold fidelity was offensive because his truth was unwelcome. They hardened themselves against his appeals by willfully refusing to believe. Nay, further, they dared publicly revile the truth of God and to belie the Christian way of believing and living.

Thereupon, as at Corinth, Paul withdrew his disciples from among them. As the house of Justus at Corinth, so here the school of Tyrannus became—and for two years continued—the daily meeting-place of the Christians and the chief preaching-place of Paul. (From the lack of any note of the man, it would seem that this was a hired room where previously a Greek philosopher of that name had been wont to teach.) And for yet nine months longer, making three full years (20 : 31), in this great central city Paul maintained his sublime work of publishing the Christian truths. Doubtless he made many brief tours into the interior, and possibly crossed the Ægean to Corinth; for of such movements we find some indications. So it was that all the inhabitants of pro-consular Asia “heard the word of the Lord Jesus”; a fact confirmed even by heathen writers. And during this period most, if not all, of the Seven Churches of the Apocalypse may have been planted. Of four congregations in that province, those of Ephesus, Colosse, Laodicea, and Hierapolis, Paul speaks definitely in Col. 1 and 4.

11, 12. Paul's Work for God attested by Specially Adapted Miracles.—For a second time, and the last, in Paul's history we read of many miracles wrought in connection with his ministry. The occasion—always the same—is some specially demanded attestation of God's presence, speaking and working through him. As in the case of Moses before Pharaoh, and as in Paul's own previous experience before the deputy in Cyprus, an issue was raised here between the antagonistic powers of light and darkness. On the one side were numerous sorcerers, pretended exorcists, and magic-workers, apostles of falsehood and impurity with whom Ephesus was teeming, from all lands; and on the other, Christ's apostle of truth and purity. To give sharpness and force to the decision of this issue, an unquestioned and signal manifestation of Divine power was essential at this juncture in this infested city. Hence, besides the miracles wrought by the hands of Paul, God wrought special wonders in connection with him, yet without his direct intervention. Not the relics of a dead saint, but aprons and handkerchiefs used by a living one in his honest, hallowed, daily toil, were made means of imparting a healing power, like that of Christ's garment-hem to the suffering woman's touch. Those who sought them for this purpose had faith in the application, and God condescended to meet and reward the faith. But only for the time and occasion. There was no second-hand use, for there was no second-hand faith of superstition.

The unusual form of these miracles—therefore called special—was adapted to meet the leading superstition of Ephesus. These very supernatural effects, so publicly wrought and so conclusively real, were designed to confute and triumphantly confuted all professed magical or talismanic claims. Especially did they challenge comparison in their effects with the charms and amulets constituted by the utterance or transcription of the famous mystic symbols or sentences known as the Ephesian Letters, thrice graven upon Diana's image. In connection with these admirably adapted miracles—which have no parallel in apostolic or other subsequent times—Luke is careful to note (17) that it was the name of the Lord Jesus, not that of Paul, that was magnified. B.—Eustathius says that the mysterious symbols called “Ephesian Letters” were engraved on the crown, the girdle, and the feet of the goddess. When pronounced, they were regarded as a charm; and were directed to be used, especially by those who were in the power of evil spirits. When written, they were carried about as amulets. The study of these symbols was an elaborate science: and books, both numerous and costly, were compiled by its professors. H.

13-16. So conclusively real and certainly Divine were the “special miracles” wrought in connection with Paul's preaching, that “certain wandering Jewish exorcists undertook to name over them who had evil spirits the name of the Lord Jesus, saying, We adjure you by the Jesus whom Paul preacheth.” This blasphemous appeal was not only damaging as its utter failure showed them to be counterfeits and pretenders; it involved the absurdity of a feebler evil agent, with a means confessedly not understood, much less controlled, attempting to dispossess a stronger. In these words, too, the sons of Sceva practically confessed that they had no faith in and stood in no personal relation to Christ; that they were not warranted therefore in such a use of His name; that their own claim to supernatural power was false; that, unlike them and all other sorcerers, Paul was a true man, successfully engaged in a work helpful to man and so honoring to God; and that in this work he was in living alliance with Divine power. Furthermore, this wicked, absurd, and humiliating appeal brought out another demonic attestation to the truth of Paul's mission and the conquering might of Christ. “Jesus I acknowledge,” as Ruler over the world of evil and good, “and Paul I know,” as His minister, “but who are ye?” promptly answered back the kindred spirit whom they could not exorcise. And assaulting two of the seven brothers, he rent off their clothes and drove them wounded from the house.

17-20. Effect of the Word and its Accompanying Miracles, and of the Overthrow of the Jewish Exorcists, upon Believers in Magic and Dealers in Sorcery.—To all the dwellers in Ephesus, both Jews and Greeks, Paul's faithful preaching of Jesus, the special marvels connected with him, and the discomfiture of the sons of Soeva, had become known. Through this knowledge Christ's name was magnified and multitudes believed. Luke notes the special effects of the strikingly exhibited superiority of the divine miracles over the human counterfeits. On the one hand, many who had previously believed (18), and yet had not thrown off the early superstitious faith in magic arts, now formally confessed their folly and renounced all connection with sorcerous practices. And on the other, many of the sorcerers, of those "who practiced magical arts," openly brought together and burned the parchment rolls, transcribed laboriously and at great cost with the secret formulæ and mystic symbols of the magic art, accumulated through previous ages. That these became also Christian believers is evident from the cost and completeness of their voluntary sacrifice. They did not make gain of that which they now knew to be only evil; but showed their sincerity of repentance by utterly and openly destroying the books that might have been sold for a great sum. The money-value thus deliberately sacrificed by constraint of Christian principle amounted to many thousand dollars. Thus, as always, a genuine faith wrought an honest purpose; a purpose that will sacrifice at any cost and hazard every hindrance in the way of obedience to God and helpfulness to man. A sharp lesson, not only upon sacrifice but upon sincerity, these converted sorcerers of Ephesus convey to many professedly converted men and women in their business dealings.

In this connection the 20th verse presents a remarkable summary of Paul's work in Ephesus: So mightily grew the WORD OF GOD, and prevailed! The breadth of the sowing of truth, the depth of its rooting, its vital force in the heart and its rich fruitage in the life, are here referred to. Of these great and wide results, the submission and sacrifice of the sorcerers, just alluded to, afford signal examples. The opposite, selfish course of Demetrius and his workmen present as signal exceptions. B.

Acts xix. 21-41.

- 21 AFTER these things were ended, Paul purposed in the spirit, when he had passed through Macedonia and Achaia, to go to Jerusalem, saying, After I have been there, I must also see 22 Rome. So he sent into Macedonia two of them that ministered unto him, Timotheus and Erastus; but he himself stayed in Asia for a season.
 23 And the same time there arose no small stir about that way. For a certain man named 24 Demetrius, a silversmith, which made silver shrines for Diana, brought no small gain unto 25 the craftsmen; whom he called together with the workmen of like occupation, and said, 26 Sirs, ye know that by this craft we have our wealth. Moreover ye see and hear, that not alone at Ephesus, but almost throughout all Asia, this Paul hath persuaded and turned 27 away much people, saying that they be no gods, which are made with hands: so that not only this our craft is in danger to be set at nought; but also that the temple of the great goddess Diana should be despised, and her magnificence should be destroyed, whom all Asia 28 and the world worshippeth. And when they heard these sayings, they were full of wrath, 29 and cried out, saying, Great is Diana of the Ephesians. And the whole city was filled with confusion: and having caught Gaius and Aristarchus, men of Macedonia, Paul's companions 30 in travel, they rushed with one accord into the theatre. And when Paul would have en-31 tered in unto the people, the disciples suffered him not. And certain of the chief of Asia, which were his friends, sent unto him, desiring him that he would not adventure himself 32 into the theatre. Some therefore cried one thing, and some another: for the assembly was 33 confused; and the more part knew not wherefore they were come together. And they drew Alexander out of the multitude, the Jews putting him forward. And Alexander beckoned 34 with the hand, and would have made his defence unto the people. But when they knew that he was a Jew, all with one voice about the space of two hours cried out, Great is Diana 35 of the Ephesians. And when the townclerk had appeased the people, he said, Ye men of Ephesus, what man is there that knoweth not how that the city of the Ephesians is a wor-36 shipper of the great goddess Diana, and of the image which fell down from Jupiter? Seeing then that these things cannot be spoken against, ye ought to be quiet, and to do nothing 37 rashly. For ye have brought hither these men, which are neither robbers of churches, nor 38 yet blasphemers of your goddess. Wherefore if Demetrius, and the craftsmen which are with him, have a matter against any man, the law is open, and there are deputies: let them 39 implead one another. But if ye enquire any thing concerning other matters, it shall be de- 40 termined in a lawful assembly. For we are in danger to be called in question for this day's 41 uproar, there being no cause whereby we may give an account of this concourse. And when he had thus spoken, he dismissed the assembly.

CONCEIVE the apostles of Jesus Christ, the tent-maker or the fisherman, entering, as strangers, into one of the splendid cities of Syria, Asia Minor, or Greece. Everywhere they behold temples on which the utmost extravagance of expenditure has been lavished by succeeding generations; idols of the most exquisite workmanship, to which, even if the religious feeling of adoration is enfeebled, the people are strongly attached by national or local vanity. They meet processions, in which the idle find perpetual occupation, the young excitement, the voluptuous a continual stimulant to their passions. They pass a magnificent theatre, on the splendor and success of which the popularity of the existing authorities mainly depends, and in which the serious exhibitions are essentially religious, the lighter as intimately connected with the indulgence of the baser passions. They behold another public building, where even worse feelings—the cruel and the sanguinary—are pampered by the animating contests of wild beasts and of gladiators. They encounter, likewise, itinerant jugglers, diviners, magicians, who impose upon the credulous, and excite the contempt of the enlightened. Such must have been among the overpowering difficulties they contemned and defied. Milman.

21, 22. The Ultimate Plan of Paul's Further Journey. Timothy and Erastus sent before.—In 2 Cor. 1 : 15, 16, a slightly differing plan is referred to. He had intended to pass through Corinth "to Macedonia and to come again out of Macedonia unto Corinth"; that is, to give them a second benefit in this journey. But this purpose was changed, to spare them, that he might not grieve them, or come to them in sorrow or severity (2 Cor. 1 : 12; 2 : 10). The First Epistle explains all. Sad intelligence reached him in Ephesus of divisions and contentions in the Corinthian Church, of uncensored gross immoralities, and of the scandalous profanation of the Lord's Supper. Instead of the sharp rebuke, which he would have personally administered had he gone first to Corinth, he remains still longer in the province of Asia, and from Ephesus (1 Cor. 16 : 8) writes the admonitory words of his First Epistle to the Corinthian Church. B.—While arranging his plans so as to give his disciples at Corinth a space for repentance before his arrival, he stimulated them to that repentance, and gave directions for that reformation of their disorders which would prepare for his coming to them in joy and peace, by writing this letter. Its contents give decisive indications of its date and place: it was written after Paul's second visit to Galatia; after the mission of Timothy, and Erastus; and after the change in the apostle's plans. Paul alludes to his being still in Asia, and at Ephesus, whence he was contemplating his departure at the ensuing Pentecost; circumstances which fix the date to the spring of his last year's residence at Ephesus (A. D. 57). S.—After that, he decides to delay still further and to go first to Macedonia, that he might learn the effect of his First Letter. While in Macedonia he receives gratifying tidings, to which he refers and responds in his Second Epistle to the Corinthians, written from Macedonia. Then he goes to Corinth, and after wintering there is brought on his return journey to Jerusalem. Luke, writing here after the event, simply narrates Paul's actual journey. The tarrying "in Asia" (in Ephesus) covered another period of nine months, which completes the three years of chapter 20 : 31. During these latter months occurred the events that follow in this chapter.

23-28. Demetrius, a Manufacturer in Silver, craftily excites the Workmen to Riotous Demonstrations against the Christian Movement and its Leaders.—Again, this movement is characterized as "that way"; meaning the Christian way of believing and living. Some knowledge of the temple, the image and the worship of Diana, the tutelary deity of Ephesus, is essential to a clear understanding of the appeal of Demetrius and the resulting commotion. B.

One building at Ephesus surpassed all the rest in magnificence and in fame. This was the Temple of Artemis or Diana, which glittered in brilliant beauty at the head of the harbor, and was reckoned by the ancients as one of the wonders of the world. The sun, it was said, saw nothing in his course more magnificent than Diana's Temple. It consisted essentially in horizontal entablatures resting on vertical columns. These colonnades were erected as subsidiary decorations round the cell which contained the idol, and were, through a great part of their space, open to the sky. The Temple was 425 feet in length and 220 in breadth, and the columns were 60 feet high. The number of columns was 127, each of them the gift of a king; and 38 of them were enriched with ornament and color. All the Greek cities contributed to the structure. The national pride in the sanctuary was so great that, when Alexander offered the spoils of his eastern campaign if he might inscribe his name on the building, the honor was declined. The value and fame of the Temple were enhanced by its being the treasury, in which a large portion of the wealth of Western Asia was stored up.

If the Temple of Diana at Ephesus was magnificent, the Image enshrined within the sumptuous inclosure was primitive and rude. It resembled an Indian idol rather than the beautiful forms which crowded the Acropolis at Athens. The figure, which assumed an emblematic form above, representing the life of all animated beings as fed and supported by nature, was terminated below in a shapeless block. The material was wood. A bar of metal was in each hand. The dress was covered with mystic devices; and the small shrine, where it stood within the Temple, was concealed by a curtain in front. Yet, rude as the image was, it was the object of the utmost veneration. Like the Palladium of Troy—like the most ancient Minerva of the Athenian Acropolis—like the Paphian Venus or Cybele of Pessinus—like the Ceres in Sicily—it was believed to have "fallen down from the sky" (v. 35).

One of the idolatrous customs of the ancient world was the use of portable images or shrines, which were little models of the more celebrated objects of devotion. They were carried in processions, on journeys and military expeditions, and set up as household gods in private houses. II.—Such were the "silver shrines for Diana," largely manufactured by Demetrius; small portable models of the Temple, and containing a figure of the goddess. These shrines were in great demand, not only in Ephesus and the province of Asia, but among all nations and in all countries; and hence the business of their manufacture was extensive and lucrative.

The great annual festival of Diana, the patron deity of Ephesus, took place in her own month of May; when the rude wooden image of the goddess was exhibited to the multitude, and, in her honor, games and dramas were publicly celebrated. Of this opportune occasion Demetrius took advantage to stir up the idle and excitable Greek populace. Yet with all his shrewdness he is constrained to confess the immense power and success of the Word, in the very facts upon which he bases his inflammatory appeals. That the craftsmen in image molding and carving were out of work he declares to result from the preaching of this Paul. By him, "much people in Ephesus and throughout all Asia" (that is, the broad strip of the western seaboard of Asia Minor, the province of Asia) have been turned away from Diana's worship, and led to disbelieve in gods made with hands. He further praises the true character, methods, and effects of the Gospel, shows where the real power of its preacher lies, and how God honors that power, by the words: This Paul hath persuaded much people! To reason and motive they have intelligently and voluntarily responded with faith. And that these are undeniable facts, he appeals to the workmen: Ye see and hear all this!

Naturally his first argument based upon such facts touches the selfish side. "This craft of ours—the making of these silver temple-models—by which we get our living, is in danger of being done away. Nay more, in time our occupation will become absurd and be accounted disgraceful." Next he appeals to the religious and national feeling of the gathering townspeople, as well as of the workmen. He warns them that the success of the Christian teaching means the decline and overthrow of the Diana-worship, and of the supremacy of their regal city Ephesus.

Arguments so artfully set forth, having so much foundation in fact, and touching his hearers at every personal and practical point, appealing to their imperiled living, to their religious faith, such as it was, and to their patriotic feeling, could not but succeed in inflaming their wrath to the utmost. With a mighty outcry, which expressed all the substance of their superstitious faith and patriotic devotion, Great! Diana of the Ephesians! the surging crowd of artisans and people that had gathered at the speech of Demetrius went tumultuously through the streets, increasing as they went, until they poured, a vast throng, into the great theatre.

29-41. Proceedings in the Theatre.—This is believed to have been the largest open-air structure of its kind ever constructed by the Greeks—capable of seating 50,000 persons in its many semicircular tiers of stone seats, rising from the stage floor. The still visible remains show its vast dimensions.

Two of Paul's Macedonian disciples, companions in travel, were seized by the mob on the way, and borne into the theatre. Paul was kept back from entering by some "of the chief of Asia," or Asiarchs. B.—These were men (ten in number) annually elected from the wealthiest, most distinguished and influential citizens of the whole province, to conduct the sacrificial worship and to preside over the games of the Artemisian festival, to provide the necessary expenses, and to see that due order was maintained. They held for the time a kind of sacerdotal position; and when, robed in mantles of purple and crowned with garlands, they assumed the duty of regulating the great gymnastic contests, and controlling the tumultuary crowd in the theatre, they might literally be called the "chief of Asia." H.—Some of the men honored with this high office at this festival were so friendly to Paul, if not to the Christian teachings, that they besought him not to expose himself to unnecessary peril by venturing into the excited and turbulent throng.

Confusion and uproar filled the vast amphitheatre. Probably by Alexander the coppersmith (2 Tim. 4 : 14), the Jews sought to clear themselves of the odium and charge against the Christians. But the angry, blinded crowd recognized no distinction and would hear no defense. For two hours they filled the air with their senseless shout, Great is Diana of the Ephesians! Then came among them their highest magistrate, a secretary, or recorder, who kept the archives, and prepared and published all state papers; and who, in various other ways, officially represented the people of the free city of Ephesus. This officer was chosen by themselves, his presence was familiar, and his judgment trusted. B.

The speech is a pattern of candid argument and judicious tact. He first allays the fanatical passions of his listeners by a simple appeal. Then he bids them remember that Paul and his companions had not been guilty of profaning the Temple, or of calumnious expressions against the goddess. Then he points out that the remedy for any injustice was amply provided by the assizes, or by an appeal to the proconsul. And he reminds them that such an uproar exposed the city to the displeasure of the Romans; for, however great the liberties allowed to an ancient and loyal city, a tumultuous meeting which endangered the public peace would never be tolerated. So he tranquilized the multitude, and formally dismissed the assembly. Thus God used the eloquence of a Greek magistrate to protect his servant, as he had used the right of Roman citizenship at Philippi, and the justice of a Roman governor at Corinth. And, as in those cases, the narrative here concludes with the notice of a deliberate and affectionate farewell. H.

The town clerk said, "These men are neither robbers of churches nor blasphemers of your goddess." It would appear from this that Paul had proceeded at Ephesus with the same caution which he had displayed at Athens. He effectually undermined all idolatry by preaching Christ; but he did not fly in the face of what his audience considered sacred. His argument was always grave and considerate. He would not needlessly trample on the prejudices of the heathen. Arnot.

Nothing more hinders men from going to or going from an opinion than the interest they have by holding it. Men do not care so much for the opinions they hold as for what they hold by their opinions. Many a man thinks what Demetrius said: "This craft, by which we have all our wealth, is like to be set at naught." Hence they begin to fly in the face of truth, and oppose it with outrageous rage, so dearly sweet, and sweetly dear, is their darling gain. When once the copyhold of gain and honor is touched, men begin to look about them, and will never call godliness gain, because gain is their godliness. V.

Section 222.

ACTS XX. 1-16.

1 AND after the uproar was ceased, Paul called unto him the disciples, and embraced them,
 2 and departed for to go into Macedonia. And when he had gone over those parts, and had 3 given them much exhortation, he came into Greece, and there abode three months. And 4 when the Jews laid wait for him, as he was about to sail into Syria, he purposed to return 4 through Macedonia. And there accompanied him into Asia Sopater of Berea; and of the 5 Thessalonians, Aristarchus and Secundus; and Gaius of Derbe, and Timotheus; and of Asia,
 5 Tychicus and Trophimus. These going before tarried for us at Troas. And we sailed away
 6 from Philippi after the days of unleavened bread, and came unto them to Troas in five days;
 where we abode seven days.
 7 And upon the first day of the week, when the disciples came together to break bread, Paul preached unto them, ready to depart on the morrow; and continued his speech until 8 midnight. And there were many lights in the upper chamber, where they were gathered 9 together. And there sat in a window a certain young man named Eutychus, being fallen into a deep sleep: and as Paul was long preaching, he sunk down with sleep, and fell down 10 from the third loft, and was taken up dead. And Paul went down, and fell on him, and 11 embracing him said, Trouble not yourselves; for his life is in him. When he therefore was come up again, and had broken bread, and eaten, and talked a long while, even till break of 12 day, so he departed. And they brought the young man alive, and were not a little comforted.
 13 And we went before to ship, and sailed unto Assos, there intending to take in Paul: for 14 so had he appointed, minding himself to go afoot. And when he met with us at Assos, we 15 took him in, and came to Mitylene. And we sailed thence, and came the next day over against Chios; and the next day we arrived at Samos, and tarried at Trogyllium; and the 16 next day we came to Miletus. For Paul had determined to sail by Ephesus, because he would not spend the time in Asia: for he hasted, if it were possible for him, to be at Jerusalem the day of Pentecost.

THREE years of faithful labor had been given to Ephesus and the accessible regions of the interior country. Many churches had been planted, including some or all of the seven addressed in the Apocalypse. The First Epistle to the Corinthian Church had been written. Timothy had been sent into Macedonia, and Titus to Corinth: both to superintend the great work of gathering contributions from the Gentile churches for the Christian poor of Judea. Titus had also been charged with a report to Paul of the reception given to his First Epistle by the Church of Corinth.

1-6. In these six verses is compressed the story of ten months' journeying and tarry: from Ephesus to Macedonia and Greece, and back to Troas. Three Epistles—the Second to the Corinthians, and those to the Galatians and the Romans—largely supplement Luke's brief record here. They detail many incidents, and fully disclose Paul's state of mind; the causes of his anxiety, the special objects and aims of his toil, and the sources of his comfort. They further show that, intellectually, this was the most active period of his career.

From 2 Cor. 2 : 12 we learn that, after leaving

Ephesus, he first tarried at Troas, preaching for some weeks to welcome ears the glad tidings, while anxiously waiting the return of Titus from Corinth. Titus failing to come, Paul sailed for Macedonia, landing as before at Neapolis, and crossing the mountains to Philippi. Here he was rejoined by Timothy; and very soon after was comforted by the news brought by Titus from the Church at Corinth. Under mingled emotions awakened by this intelligence, in conjunction with Timothy, he then wrote

THE SECOND EPISTLE TO THE CHURCHES OF CORINTH and of the province of Achaia, and sent it by the hands of Titus, who was charged with completing the collection successfully begun. This time and place of writing are intimated by the following facts: B.—It was written after the troubles that had befallen the apostle in Asia; after his preaching and disappointment at Troas, his arrival in Macedonia, and the consolation received there by his meeting with Titus; while he was engaged in making the collection for the poor at Jerusalem; and in anticipation of a renewed visit to Corinth. This Epistle reveals to us what manner of man Paul was when the fountains of his heart were stirred to their inmost depths. Every reader may perceive that, on passing from the First Epistle to the Second, the scene is almost entirely changed. In the First, the faults and difficulties of the Corinthian Church are before us. The apostle writes of these, with spirit indeed and emotion, as he always does, but without passion or disturbance. He calmly asserts his own authority over the Church, and threatens to deal severely with offenders. In the Second, he writes as one whose personal relations with those whom he addresses have undergone a most painful shock. The acute pain given by former tidings—the comfort yielded by the account which Titus brought—the vexation of a sensitive mind at the necessity of self-assertion—contend together for utterance. The highly wrought personal sensitiveness, the ebb and flow of emotion, so peculiarly characteristic of the Epistle, are as intelligible as they are noble and beautiful. We see what sustained him in his self-assertion; he knew that he did not preach himself, but Christ Jesus the Lord. S.

From Philippi the apostle went upon a preaching tour westward "as far as Illyricum," on the Adriatic (Rom. 15 : 19), thus "completing (at least in outline) the evangelization of the Eastern division of the empire, preparatory to a movement upon Rome itself." Referring to this extended circuit, Luke says: "When he had gone through these parts, he came into Greece, and there abode three months."

The three winter months (of A. D. 57-58) at Corinth are those here alluded to. Occupied with the settlement of disturbing questions and disorders in that church, with an oversight of other churches in the province, and with "the care of all the churches" that he had founded, the apostle yet found time for the composition of two kindred Epistles: one to the Galatians, the other to the Romans. Of these the former, which was first written, is a sort of ground-plan to the latter.

THE EPISTLE TO THE GALATIANS was written in the early part of this winter at Corinth. Some think that it was prepared and sent before leaving Ephesus. It was aimed at the grand hindrance everywhere encountered in these earliest churches: the Judaizing doctrine that sapped the very life of the Christian system, by taking out of it all that was spiritual and essential, and leaving an outward, heartless, lifeless ceremonial framework. Abrupt, severe, and self-asserting against the men attempting insidiously to inculcate this destructive teaching, and seeking by falsehoods to supplant Paul in the attachment of the disciples; sometimes ironical even toward those easily deceived disciples; yet his tone of sadness and intense affection shows Paul's heart firmly set upon rescuing and saving them.

THE EPISTLE TO THE ROMANS, the master-work of Paul, which has ever since formed the chief foundation of Christian theology, was certainly written at Corinth. Paul writes as the guest of Gaius, one of the most conspicuous members of the Corinthian Church. He sends salutations from Erastus, the chamberlain of the city, from Timotheus his fellow-laborer, and from Sosipater, whom we presently find accompanying him on his voyage from Greece to Asia (Rom. 16 : 23). He mentions the completion, not only in Macedonia, but also in Achaia, of the collection, which he was then on the point of carrying to the poor saints at Jerusalem. B.

This sacred mission of charity was now the only remaining hindrance to the gratification of a desire which he had cherished for many years, but which his labors in the East had hitherto postponed, to visit the Church of Rome, and even to extend his western mission as far as Spain. His great work of breaking up new ground, of planting the churches, which his successors, like Apollos, were to water, was now

done in the Greek division of the Roman world. "But now having no more place in those regions," is a striking description of a completed work (Rom. 15 : 20-28). It is very striking that, ardent and long-cherished as was his desire to see his Christian brethren at Rome, he speaks of its approaching fulfillment as but a passing visit, on his way to break up virgin soil for the good seed in Spain. Yet the very errand of mercy to Jerusalem, which he regards as but a temporary delay of his inroad upon the West, was the cause of his being sent as a prisoner to the capital, where his two years' enforced residence provided for the work he had to do both among Jews and Gentiles. S.

3, 4. To disconcert a Jewish plot against his life, Paul returned toward Syria by way of Macedonia. The seven persons named as companions of the journey—possibly bearers of the collection, and in some sort representatives from the Gentile Churches to the mother Jewish Church at Jerusalem—sailed over to Troas in advance of Paul and Luke. For this no reason is given.

6. At Philippi, where we left Luke (16 : 17), he rejoins Paul, and continues with him to Rome. At once we note more specific statements of time and place, and particulars of incident and address.

7-12. Thus we have the interesting story of the evening meeting at Troas, with its showing of the manner of primitive gatherings for worship; and its illustrative argument for the first-day Sabbath, for the observance of the Lord's Supper, and for the sermon (not the after "speech until midnight"), as parts of an orderly Christian service. B.

The place was an upper room, with a balcony projecting over the court. While Paul was continuing in earnest discourse, an occurrence suddenly took place which filled the assembly with alarm, though it was afterward converted into an occasion of joy and thanksgiving. A young listener, whose name was Eutychus, was overcome by heat and weariness, and sank into a deep slumber. He was seated or leaning in the balcony; and, falling down in his sleep, was dashed upon the pavement below and was taken up dead. Confusion and terror followed, with loud lamentation. But Paul was enabled to imitate the power of that Master whose doctrine he was proclaiming. He went down and fell upon the body, and said to the bystanders: "Do not lament; for his life is in him." With minds solemnized and filled with thankfulness by this wonderful token of God's power and love, they celebrated the Eucharistic feast. This act was combined, as was usual in the apostolic age, with a common meal; and Paul now took some refreshment after the protracted labor of the evening, and then continued his conversation till the dawning of day. H.

Ruins of Assos.

[Assos was a seaport of the Roman province of Asia, in the district anciently called Mysia. It was situated on the north shore of the gulf of Adramyttium, about seven miles from the opposite coast of Lesbos. A good Roman road, connecting the central parts of the province with Alexandria Troas (Troas), passed through Assos, which was about twenty miles from Troas. These geographical points illustrate Paul's rapid passage through the town. He took the much shorter journey by land, and thus was able to join the ship without difficulty, and in sufficient time for her to anchor off Mitylene at the close of the day on which Troas had been left. 8.]

13-16. To gain further time at Troas, and perhaps to get special strength from solitary communion with Christ by the way, Paul walks the twenty miles between Troas and Assos, while the ship with his companions doubled the promontory of Lectum. From Assos their course lay by the islands of Lesbos (of which Mitylene was the capital), Chios, and Samos, to Miletus. B.

Section 223.

ACTS XX. 17-38.

17 AND from Miletus he sent to Ephesus, and called the elders of the church. And when 18 they were come to him, he said unto them, Ye know, from the first day that I came 19 into Asia, after what manner I have been with you at all seasons, serving the Lord with all humility of mind, and with many tears, and temptations, which befel me by the 20 lying in wait of the Jews: and how I kept back nothing that was profitable unto you, but 21 have shewed you, and have taught you publickly, and from house to house, testifying both to the Jews, and also to the Greeks, repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord 22 Jesus Christ. And now, behold, I go bound in the spirit unto Jerusalem, not knowing the 23 things that shall befall me there: save that the Holy Ghost witnesseth in every city, say-
 24 ing that bonds and afflictions abide me. But none of these things move me, neither count
 I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy, and the ministry, 25 which I have received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the gospel of the grace of God. And now, behold, I know that ye all, among whom I have gone preaching the kingdom of God, 26 shall see my face no more. Wherefore I take you to record this day, that I am pure from 27 the blood of all men. For I have not shunned to declare unto you all the counsel of God.
 28 Take heed therefore unto yourselves, and to all the flock, over the which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers, to feed the church of God, which he hath purchased with his 29 own blood. For I know this, that after my departing shall grievous wolves enter in among you, not sparing the flock. Also of your own selves shall men arise, speaking perverse 31 things, to draw away disciples after them. Therefore watch, and remember, that by the 32 space of three years I ceased not to warn every one night and day with tears. And now, brethren, I commend you to God, and to the word of his grace, which is able to build you 33 up, and to give you an inheritance among all them which are sanctified. I have coveted no
 34 man's silver, or gold, or apparel. Yea, ye yourselves know, that these hands have minis-35 tered unto my necessities, and to them that were with me. I have shewed you all things, how that so labouring ye ought to support the weak, and to remember the words of the Lord Jesus, how he said, It is more blessed to give than to receive.
 36 And when he had thus spoken, he kneeled down, and prayed with them all. And they 37 all wept sore, and fell on Paul's neck, and kissed him, sorrowing most of all for the words 38 which he spake, that they should see his face no more. And they accompanied him unto the ship.

"It is more blessed to give than to receive"; that is, it is more Divine, more Godlike. God who receives so little gives all. He fills his eternal year with an incessant bounty. The very law of his life is self-impartment, self-sacrifice. Dwelling in the perfect ineffable delights of his single yet manifold being, he had no need of us or of anything that we can do—no need except the need of infinite love. To surround himself with creatures to whom he could give of his own life, whom he could train through sun and shadow, sorrow and joy, to enter into his rest; by labors and sacrifices which transcend our thought to make them partakers of his divine nature and eternal peace; to give, and give, and always give; to crowd earth and time, heaven and eternity, with his good gifts; and, all gifts in one, to bestow himself upon us—this has been the work of God, this his commentary on the words, "It is more blessed to give than to receive." Coz.

This "word of the Lord Jesus" found no place in the evangelic histories: it lay silent in loving hearts, or flowed in whispers from loving lips when the disciples met after their Master had departed, until, spoken by Paul on the seashore to the weeping elders of Ephesus, it was recorded by Luke, his companion, for the use of the Church in all coming time. When the Lord intimated that the blessedness of giving is the greater, he did not intimate that the blessedness of receiving was small. He proclaims in one sentence the twofold truth, that the joy of his people in obtaining salvation is great, and his own in bestowing it is greater. Arnol.

17. Finding that the vessel might tarry long enough, Paul sends to Ephesus (thirty-seven miles distant) a request that the elders of the Church would meet with him at Miletus. (See map, p. 94.) As he was hastening, with limited time, to Jerusalem, and must abide by his present opportunity, this was the only safe course to secure the interview he sought. At once responding to his call, the elders from the one or more congregations of the Church at Ephesus received from the apostle the touching and instructive farewell address recorded in verses 18-35. As a representative discourse, it ranks with the Epistles. Especially in the memories of Christian work to which it appeals, and in the truth it imparts respecting the personal relations and duties of the eldership, it resembles many of Paul's Epistles. B.—What Paul said to the elders of Ephesus on this occasion, he said through them to the other presbyters, not only of that province, but of the whole Church, not only then, but ever since and through all ages; for which end it has been left on record. J. A. A.

18-21. What his Spirit and Ministry among them had been.—They had been daily witnesses (he said) of his manner of life; of his humility and helpfulness in Christ's service; of his true, deep sympathy with human sorrows; of his tearful urgency with perishing men (2 Cor. 2 : 4 ; Phil. 3 : 18) ;

Ruins of Miletus.

and of his own trials through Jewish malevolent plotting. They knew that in his preaching he had been utterly unaffected by thought of personal danger or popularity; that he had withheld nothing of needed truth; that he had not, with one-sided partiality, dwelt upon peculiar or novel aspects of truth, but had urged only and all that which was profitable "to the use of edifying," or building up: the whole counsel of God in its purity and fullness! And this faithful "showing," this fervid "teaching" of the Christian truth had been his practice, not only in the school of Tyrannus and in other gathering places of disciples, but in every accessible household. From house to house, and from soul to soul, day by day had he borne the glad tidings with Christlike desire and yearning. To all classes and races, to the hostile Jew and the sneering Greek, his one theme—that which, fully expounded, includes all other essential saving truths—was repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ.

Repentance is the inward change of the spirit and the life; a reversal of the current of the controlling thoughts, desires, aims, and affections; a turning and a supreme setting of these upon God, in place of self. It is wrought by "godly sorrow," or sorrow toward God for the penitent's sin (2 Cor. 7 : 10). B.—Faith is personal trust in this personal Redeemer, as the Saviour from the guilt and pollution of the sin we repent of, and as the atoning Mediator through whom alone we can approach God when we have repentance toward God. The two increase together in the life of a Christian. Riddle.—He who preaches the repentance and the faith here spoken of, in all their fullness and variety, will need to seek no other topics, and may humbly boast of having kept back nothing that was profitable to his hearers. J. A. A.

22-24. Paul's Feeling in View of the Unknown Future.—He refers to a constraint of spirit inwrought by a sense of duty, impelling him into the midst of peril. What else is to transpire besides already familiar bonds and trials he knows and cares not. For the same Holy Ghost who is to him "a prophet of afflictions is also a comforter in afflictions." So that he can bravely declare himself fearless and unshaken in prospect of any evil. Nay more (using his favorite figure of the race), he holds life itself of less account and worth than the successful completion of his ministry for Christ and for souls. Live he gladly would, and triumph he will if only he can finish his supreme work of testifying the gospel of the grace of God! (Compare 2 Tim. 4 : 7 and 1 Cor. 9 : 24.) B.

Finish my course with joy. Of such joy, it would be difficult to find a more striking example than that afforded by the late Dr. Payson. "To adopt the figurative language of Bunyan, I might date this letter from the land of Beulah, of which I have been for some weeks a happy inhabitant. The celestial city, is full in my view. Its glories beam upon me, its breezes fan me, its odors are wafted to me, its sounds strike upon my ears, and its spirit is breathed into my heart. The sun of righteousness has been gradually drawing nearer and nearer, appearing larger and brighter as he approached, and now he fills the whole hemisphere, pouring forth a flood of glory, in which I seem to float like an insect in the beams of the sun; exulting, yet almost trembling, while I gaze on this excessive brightness, and wondering, with unutterable wonder, why God should deign thus to shine upon a sinful worm. A single heart, and a single tongue, seem altogether inadequate to my wants. I want a whole heart for every separate emotion, and a whole tongue to express that emotion." J. W. A.

25-27. Paul's Solemn Final Appeal and Asseveration touching his Fidelity as a Preacher of the Gospel.—With full consciousness of the dignity of this high office, alluding to himself as the herald of a Divine King and Kingdom, he solemnly invokes their testimony to his faithfulness in "teaching every man and warning every man," so that his soul is freed from all blood-guiltiness in the destruction of any. B.—The form of expression is striking and memorable. It is borrowed from the crime of murder, and the method by which guilt is ordinarily brought home to the criminal. In many cases conviction depends on blood being found on the clothes of the murderer. Hence in almost all cases of violence we hear of desperate efforts being made by the terrified evil-doer to efface the stain. This is the conception that leaps into the apostle's mind. He can not hope that all who have heard the gospel from his lips in the city are now in Christ. If they die in their sins, how unspeakable the loss—the loss of a soul! He shudders at the thought; and in order to quicken their diligence when they should return to their labor, he endeavors to impart some of his own anxiety to the elders. He in effect invites them to look to their hands and garments to make sure that there is no blood on them. Arnot.

28-32. His Impressive Injunction to Fidelity, and his Loving Commendation to God and his Grace.—The English version has hardly dealt fairly in this case with the sacred text in rendering the original word (v. 28) overseers; whereas it ought here, as in all other places, to have been "bishops," that the fact of elders having been originally and apostolically synonymous might be apparent to the ordinary English reader, which now it is not. A.—It is scarcely necessary to remark that in the New Testament the words episcopos (bishop) and presbiteros (elder) are convertible. H.—In the sending forth of Saul and Barnabas we learned the truth which Paul here declares: that in every genuine appointment of bishops (or elders) it is the Holy Ghost who selects, calls, and appoints to the office and the work. No valid ministry is exclusively man-made. In Paul's case we further learned that God puts upon some body of spiritual men the outward countersigning and sealing of his calls and appointments to spiritual office.

The work of these divinely called bishops or elders is "to shepherd the Church of God"; to nourish with truth, to lead into the way of Christ, to watch over and guard against the entrance of evil, and to administer such rule and discipline as is divinely delegated. The term "flock" is applied by the prophets to the Old Testament Church; and it is Christ's favorite figure. The supreme motive to fidelity, Paul here indirectly states: Christ's purchase of his Church with his own blood! B.—"Ye were redeemed with the precious blood of Christ." But Paul says more. By one of those bold figures which man could never have dared to think of, had not God first taught him to use them, he raises yet higher the amount of this ransom. As though determined that none should be ignorant of its amazing worth, he says, when speaking of the Church, "God hath purchased it with his own blood." C. B.—This is here called the blood of God as being the blood of that man who is also God with us—God manifest in the flesh. D.—His possession, purchased with his blood—a double argument, the mightiest and most sublime!

Preceding the charge to take heed to the flock, to do intelligently and faithfully this shepherd-work, is an intensely momentous personal charge. Take heed to yourselves! Applied here to office-bearers in the Church, equally just, appropriate, and relatively important is its application to Christian parents, teachers, and lay workers in every sphere. The measure of each one's ability and responsibility for good is that of each one's accessible and attainable grace. What grace is promised is to be realized by one's own seeking, receiving, appropriating, and using. The taking heed to one's self is this seeking and using. A really helpful, comforting, quickening influence in a man comes alone from a heart first divinely helped, comforted, and quickened. The stream can not rise higher than the fountain, nor distribute a larger volume than it receives. Close and unbroken communion with God is the sole condition and means of receiving the knowledge, the guidance, and the help which it is the Christian worker's privilege and duty to impart. There is an imitative way and a mechanical spirit in doing what may be counted Christian labor. A thoughtful writer justly hints that a great deal of work for and in the Church may be the same in kind and in its actuating spirit as that done in a bank, a manufactory, or in the conduct of a government. Therefore, that his soul may be actuated by the higher, positively divine, and spiritual constraint of the love of Christ, and so that he may press that love effectually upon others, every Christian worker needs this warning to take heed to himself. From the point of human frailty too, the warning presses urgently. No one, however strong or pure, unselfish, humble, or faithful, in past life and service, but needs this counsel. Not only take heed lest ye fall, but that ye may be "stedfast, immovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord."

And he closes these inimitably beautiful, instructive, and affecting words of direct address with a simple loving commendation to God and to the word of his grace. By that gracious word of truth and promise, inwrought into the thoughts, the desires, the aims; and the life (he declares), God is able to build them up, and to give them the inheritance of those made holy. Favorite figures both, and richly expressive! Progress in the Christian life is gradual, by adding grace to grace; and so the holy character is divinely builded up. An inheritance is given only to children, and in its nature is a possession whose tenure is firm and lasting as the being of the possessor.

These farewell words are full of application to preacher and teacher, and to hearers. They show what to preach or teach: not merely that which is novel or learned, beautiful or stirring, but, with all that is attainable of these, that matter, style, and manner always and only contribute to the one supreme end of profitable teaching. And they intimate a fact that can not be too frequently or deeply pondered: that with every utterance and reception of God's truth there comes to speaker and hearer either positive blessing or positive guilt! B.

BAXTER'S SUMMARY OF THIS ADDRESS.

Here we are taught: Our general business: serv- ing the Lord; our special work: taking heed to our- selves and all the flock; the substance of our doctrine: repentance toward God, and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ; the places and manner of our teaching: publicly, and from house to house; the object and internal manner: warning every one, night and day, with all humility of mind and with tears; the faithfulness and integrity that are requisite: I have kept back nothing that was profitable unto you; I am pure from the blood of all men, for I have not shunned to declare the whole counsel of God; the innocence and self-denial to be used: I have coveted no man's silver or gold; the patience and resolution to be exercised: none of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy, and the ministry which I have received of the Lord Jesus; and once more, the motives to engage us to all this: the Holy Ghost has made us overseers; the church we feed is the Church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood. Write this upon your hearts, and it will do yourselves and the Church more good than twenty years' study of those lower things which often employ your thoughts; which, though they get you greater applause in the world, yet, if separated from these, will make you but "sounding brass and tinkling cymbals."

Section 224.

ACTS XXI. 1-17.

- 1 AND it came to pass, that after we were gotten from them, and had launched, we came with a straight course unto Coos, and the day following unto Rhodes, and from thence unto
- 2 Patara: and finding a ship sailing over unto Phenicia, we went aboard, and set forth.
- 3 Now when we had discovered Cyprus, we left it on the left hand, and sailed into Syria, and
- 4 landed at Tyre: for there the ship was to unlade her burden. And finding disciples, we tarried there seven days: who said to Paul through the Spirit, that he should not go up to 5 Jerusalem. And when we had accomplished those days, we departed and went our way; and they all brought us on our way, with wives and children, till we were out of the city: 6 and we kneeled down on the shore, and prayed. And when we had taken our leave one 7 of another, we took ship; and they returned home again. And when we had finished our course from Tyre, we came to Ptolemais, and saluted the brethren, and abode with them one day.

8 And the next day we that were of Paul's company departed, and came unto Cæsarea: and we entered into the house of Philip the evangelist, which was one of the seven; and 9 abode with him. And the same man had four daughters, virgins, which did prophecy.

10 And as we tarried there many days, there came down from Judæa a certain prophet, named 11 Agabus. And when he was come unto us, he took Paul's girdle, and bound his own hands and feet, and said, Thus saith the Holy Ghost, So shall the Jews at Jerusalem bind the man 12 that owneth this girdle, and shall deliver him into the hands of the Gentiles. And when we heard these things, both we, and they of that place, besought him not to go up to 13 Jerusalem. Then Paul answered, What mean ye to weep and to break mine heart? for I am ready not to be bound only, but also to die at Jerusalem for the name of the Lord Jesus.

14 And when he would not be persuaded, we ceased, saying, The will of the Lord be done.

15 And after those days we took up our carriages, and went up to Jerusalem. There went 16 with us also certain of the disciples of Cæsarea, and brought with them one Mnason of 17 Cyprus, an old disciple, with whom we should lodge. And when we were come to Jerusalem, the brethren received us gladly.

THE noble answer of the Apostle is as simple as it is sublime. To understand what it means is easy; to share in its sentiment is to make high attainment in grace. We need not ask ourselves if we could say this. Living a life of love to Christ, we may be sure that when he places us in such circumstances as those of Paul, his "grace will be sufficient for us." For most of us, it may require more grace to take up the trivial duties and to endure the petty trials of our lives, than to utter some kindred sentiment in times of great trial. Riddle.—The time will come when we shall rejoice, not so much because we had been comforted in sorrow and met with great prosperity, as because the will of God had been fulfilled alike in us and through us. How pure and serene is our life when that will alone directs us, and when not a trace of our own will remains behind! With such a frame of mind we become like unto God. Bernard.

1-7. Journey from Miletus to Cesarea.—The day of the painful parting on the shore at Miletus, Paul and his company ("after we had torn ourselves away," Luke says) sailed southward before the wind to the island of Cos, forty miles. Thence rounding the point of Cnidus, they continued on to the larger island of Rhodes, opposite the southwestern corner of Asia Minor. This island has always "held an illustrious place among the islands of the Mediterranean"; and its capital (of the same name) was famous for its colossal bronze statue, 105 feet high, the chief of the seven world-wonders. B.—No view in the Levant is more celebrated than that from Rhodes toward the opposite shore of Asia Minor. The last ranges of Mount Taurus come down in magnificent forms to the sea; and a long line of snowy summits is seen along the Lycian coast, while the sea between is often an unruffled expanse of water under a blue and brilliant sky. Across this expanse and toward Patara, a harbor near the farther edge of these Lycian mountains, the apostle's course was next directed. H.

At Patara he found, in a vessel bound over the open sea to Phœnicia, a favoring providence by which his progress toward Syria was hastened. The 340 miles to Tyre was run in about two days. Here the vessel tarried seven days for change of cargo. And here Paul sought for and found a small company of Christian disciples, with whom he remained in happy, helpful fellowship, ministering the word and ordinances. Another beautiful and impressive picture of the harmony of Christian communion and the strength of Christian affection was witnessed on the Tyrian shore at the hour of parting. "They all brought us on our way, with wives and children" (the first definite mention of the latter in the Acts): "and we kneeled down on the shore, and prayed."

By the same vessel they sailed southward thirty miles to Ptolemais, the ancient Accho (Judges 1 : 3) and modern Acre. Having the best harbor on the Syrian coast, and an easy access to the great central plain of Esdraelon (the natural passage-way of armies and caravans to and from the East), this celebrated locality has ever been the landing-place and starting-point of hostile enterprises and commercial ventures; and therefore it has been termed "the key of Syria." At Ptolemais Paul remained one day with the brethren, and the next day traveled by land the thirty-six miles to Cesarea. (See maps, pp. 61, 94.)

8, 9. Philip the Evangelist and his Four Daughters.—After a silence of twenty years following upon Ruins of Tyre.

Philip's ministry in Samaria and to the Ethiopian treasurer, we meet him in Cesarea, which had ever since been his home. Cesarea—the seaport built by Herod the Great, and named in honor of the Emperor Augustus—was sixty miles northwest from Jerusalem, and was the residence of the Roman governors (or procurators) of the province of Judea. The incidents connected with Cornelius, narrated in chapter 10, and with Herod Agrippa, chapter 12 : 19-23, occurred here.

Concerning the four daughters of Philip, Luke merely relates impressions made by what seemed peculiar in their history: that they had all remained unmarried, and that all had received the gift of prophecy referred to by Peter (Acts 2 : 18). He seems to use the term prophecy in its ordinary meaning, as a divine inspiration to interpret and unfold truth, not to predict future events. He states no connection on their part with the subsequent prediction of Agabus. He does not even imply that they, like the disciples at Tyre (v. 4), had foretold Paul's coming trouble.

10, 11. Agabus predicts Paul's Bonds and Imprisonment.—This prophet we have met before (11 : 27-30) as the foreteller of famine in the reign of Claudius. He comes now down from the interior hill country, perhaps from Jerusalem, to forewarn Paul of assault and arrest at the capital, whither he is bound. In imitation of the expressive symbolic acting sometimes employed by the ancient Jewish prophets (Isa. 20 : 2; Jer. 13 : 1; Ezek. 4 : 1, etc.), this Christian prophet took Paul's girdle, and with it bound his own hands and feet. Using the prophetic form of the Old Testament, "Thus saith the Lord," yet changing it to suit the new dispensation of the Spirit, he cites the Holy Ghost as explicitly announcing Paul's capture and imprisonment in Jerusalem. The prediction was fulfilled not many days after.

12-14. Entreaty of the Christian Disciples, with Paul's Reply, and their Acquiescence in Christ's Recognized Will.—The correctness of the previous prophecy of Agabus, and the vivid symbol whereby he now impressed this prediction, produced in their hearts a deep conviction of the certainty of future evil to Paul at Jerusalem. Under this conviction they unitedly besought him not to go to the place of danger. They interpreted the mission and intimation of Agabus as a warning given to avoid and so avert the peril. But Paul understood it better. Long years before, at the very outset of his sublime career, he had learned from his Lord what "great things he must suffer for his sake." And frequent experience had already verified this word, and made its meaning familiar. So that these new, more specific and intense premonitions of coming trial, clearly intimated by the Holy Ghost (outwardly by various prophets, and inwardly by impressions upon his own consciousness), carried their full weight of meaning to his spirit. Yet his steadfastness to duty, though confronted here with a prospect of danger unto death, yielded not. No ordinary measure of heroism was it that induced such fixed resistance to the counter-entreaties of such and so many loving friends. But the terms in which he declares his persistency of self-devotion are very touching. As expressing the purest, sublimest affection to Christ and to Christlike human friends, this answer has no human parallel: What do ye, weeping and breaking my heart? For I am ready not to be bound only, but to die for the name of the Lord Jesus! This tender, lofty utterance furnishes a fitting counterpart to the many strong assertions of consecration and self-sacrifice with which his Epistles so richly abound. And the instant carrying out of this loving and unselfish protest with an unflinching heroism, fixes in our minds an immovable conviction of the apostle's absolute truthfulness in all his high professions of devotion to his Lord.

Responding to the impression produced by these intense words of Paul, recognizing in them a clear indication of that divine will by which his career had been so marvelously guided, the true-hearted disciples ceased all further opposition, and acquiesced in his decision as expressing the will of the Lord Jesus. And the fact is singularly suggestive, that the very disciples who would have hindered Paul's arrest at Jerusalem, by that arrest were privileged with an unrestrained fellowship with him for two long years.

15. From Cesarea to Jerusalem. Conclusion of Paul's Third and Last Missionary Journey.—The word carriage, used here in the sense of "things carried," as in Judges 18 : 21 and 1 Sam. 17 : 22, would be better rendered baggage. The whole phrase here employed is expressed by one Greek participle, and indicates the packing of their effects in preparation for departure. B.—They packed their baggage or luggage. Paul and his companions were not privileged on their sacred errands with exemption from the common inconveniences of travel. So he had a "cloak" that he "left at Troas with Carpus," and requested Timothy to bring. An ancient military historian calls the luggage of his army "impedimenta." And human life, whether in travel or at home, has its necessary encumbrances. O. E. D.

16, 17. Still under the care of the disciples at Cesarea, Paul then completed his third and last great missionary tour at Jerusalem. The subsequent return to Antioch, as in the two previous journeys, was prevented by his arrest and imprisonment. B.—This fifth visit of Paul to Jerusalem since his conversion is the last of which we have any certain record. The state of the city, thronged with the excited multitudes who had come up to the Feast of Pentecost, might well recall to him not only the warnings that had encountered him at every step, but the deed of blood in which he himself, twenty-five years before, had played the part for which he never ceased to feel remorse. S.

Twelve years of unhindered travel and ministry, substantially covering the Greek portion of the Roman Empire, he had been permitted to accomplish. Five years of ministry in bonds—mainly in Cesarea and Rome—he is now to enter upon. This ministry is for the most part private, exercised in behalf of individuals or of small gatherings of disciples. Its public part, which is that chiefly reported and recorded, consists of successive defenses, which, in the result, prove to be aggressive triumphs, of Christianity. B.

Section 225.

ACTS XXI. 18-40.

18 AND the day following Paul went in with us unto James; and all the elders were present.
 19 And when he had saluted them, he declared particularly what things God had wrought
 20 among the Gentiles by his ministry. And when they heard it, they glorified the Lord, and said unto him, Thou seest, brother, how many thousands of Jews there are which believe; and they are all zealous of the law: and they are informed of thee, that thou teachest all the Jews which are among the Gentiles to forsake Moses, saying that they ought not to circumcise their children, neither to walk after the customs. What is it therefore? the multitude must needs come together: for they will hear that thou art come. Do therefore this 22 that we say to thee: We have four men which have a vow on them; them take and purify thyself with them, and be at charges with them, that they may shave their heads: and all may know that those things, whereof they were informed concerning thee, are nothing; but that thou thyself also walkest orderly, and keepest the law. As touching the Gentiles which believe, we have written and concluded that they observe no such thing, save only that they keep themselves from things offered to idols, and from blood, and from 26 strangled, and from fornication. Then Paul took the men, and the next day purifying himself with them entered into the temple, to signify the accomplishment of the days of purification, until that an offering should be offered for every one of them.

27 And when the seven days were almost ended, the Jews which were of Asia, when they
 28 saw him in the temple, stirred up all the people, and laid hands on him, crying out, Men of Israel, help : This is the man, that teacheth all men every where against the people, and the law, and this place : and further brought Greeks also into the temple, and hath polluted
 29 this holy place. (For they had seen before with him in the city Trophimus an Ephesian, 30 whom they supposed that Paul had brought into the temple.) And all the city was moved, and the people ran together : and they took Paul, and drew him out of the temple : and 31 forthwith the doors were shut. And as they went about to kill him, tidings came unto the 32 chief captain of the band, that all Jerusalem was in an uproar. Who immediately took soldiers and centurions, and ran down unto them : and when they saw the chief captain and 33 the soldiers, they left beating of Paul. Then the chief captain came near, and took him, and commanded him to be bound with two chains ; and demanded who he was, and what he 34 had done. And some cried one thing, some another, among the multitude : and when he could not know the certainty for the tumult, he commanded him to be carried into the 35 castle. And when he came upon the stairs, so it was, that he was borne of the soldiers for 36 the violence of the people. For the multitude of the people followed after, crying, Away with him.

37 And as Paul was to be led into the castle, he said unto the chief captain, May I speak
 38 unto thee? Who said, Canst thou speak Greek? Art not thou that Egyptian, which before these days madest an uproar, and leddest out into the wilderness four thousand men 39 that were murderers? But Paul said, I am a man which am a Jew of Tarsus, a city in Cilicia, a citizen of no mean city : and, I beseech thee, suffer me to speak unto the people.
 40 And when he had given him licence, Paul stood on the stairs, and beckoned with the hand unto the people.

18-26. An Endeavor to remove the Unfounded Suspicions of Believing Jews, which became the Occasion of Paul's Arrest by Unbelievers.—On the day succeeding the first private reception and welcome given to Paul and his company, a more public conference was held with James and the elders of the Church. To them Paul made full report of his ministry among the Gentiles ; and they rendered a united thanksgiving for what God had thus wrought. Then, knowing well the temper of the Jewish Christians and their misapprehensions concerning Paul and his teaching, and realizing the crisis existing in the relations between believing Jews and Gentiles on account of Paul's position and teaching, the elders wisely sought to bring about a desirable unity. This they did by suggesting that the apostle should take a simple part in an ancient ceremonial of the Jewish law.

If we would form an intelligent and fair judgment respecting this counsel and Paul's compliance with it, these considerations must have due weight. With convincing power and world-wide acceptance Paul had preached salvation by grace, through a justifying faith, resting and centering alone upon Christ's sacrifice and exaltation. This doctrine indirectly yet positively antagonized the long-cherished reverence and reliance of the Jew, Christian or un-believer, in behalf of his legal or ceremonial obedience and worship. B.—Paul had opposed the external observance of Judaism only so far as the justification and sanctification of men were made to depend upon it. It was his principle that no one should abandon the national and civil relations in which he stood at the time of his conversion except for important reasons ; and in accordance with this principle he allowed the Jews to adhere to their peculiarities, among which was the observance of the Mosaic law (1 Cor. 7 : 18). N.—Yet the apostle had taught that the ceremonials instituted by Moses were not essential to salvation. He had declared the Gentiles to be free from all obligation to the Jewish ceremonial law. And this freedom of the Gentiles James and the elders were careful to recognize afresh, even while counseling Paul to conciliate the large body of Jewish Christians.

But Paul was falsely charged with going further and saying more than this. The charge came from the false brethren—a few in every church, who had professed Christianity and entered its fold only to misuse their position by perverting honest disciples back to the old, formal, and lifeless Judaism. This insidious, undermining work (we remark in passing) was the great obstacle and hindrance in the introduction of Christianity ; and to its counteraction

Paul's greatest intellectual and personal efforts were addressed. That these false teachers should have reported, and that the large numbers of sincere Christian Jews should have believed, that Paul had gone a step further and forbidden the practice of long familiar Jewish rites, is not strange. Much less was it strange that these Jewish Christians should be prejudiced against the apostle, and alienated from him and from the Gentile disciples. For, remember, this was with them a period of painful transition, in which all the old fixed religious convictions and habits were to be exchanged for, supplanted by, the new; the old involving, too, so much outward doing, and gratifying a natural self-righteousness, while the new demanded an inward spiritual faith, and gave self no resting-place. Consider, also, that the training of these "many thousands of Jews who believed" had instilled in them a peculiar reverence for the Mosaic institutions, as originating directly with Jehovah, and hallowed by centuries of observance. They could not but be "all zealous of the law," and regard with alarm and almost aversion the man who was charged with causelessly desecrating that which they counted divine and held so dear.

No place nor time was so opportune to correct this false charge, to make the correction reach as far as the falsehood had been disseminated, even wherever Paul had been or was known. The Jerusalem Church was the center and source of Jewish-Christian sentiment. It everywhere led and controlled this sentiment. Christian Jews, too, were here from every part of the world that Christianity had reached. The false report corrected and the prejudice based upon it broken here and among this representative multitude, they would die out and disappear elsewhere. Proving to this vast throng of believing and unbelieving Jews, he would prove to all everywhere that he still recognized the ceremonial law as from God, and as such still revered and regarded it. He had shown this, indeed, in coming to this great festival. He had shown it by circumcising Timothy, and by his own vow and ceremonial at Cenchrea. But now he will prove it again in the sight of all the Jews—in their very Temple. Thus he will again "become a Jew to Jews, that he may gain the Jews" (1 Cor. 9 : 19).

Four men of the Jerusalem Church, who had taken a temporary Nazarite vow (Num. 6), were about entering upon the ceremonial purification by which the vow was completed. The elders' counsel was that Paul should associate himself with these men in this closing ceremony, and himself defray the expense of the offerings to be presented in the Temple. B.—Not that he should make himself a Nazarite, but merely that he should perform such preparatory rites as would enable him to take part with these Nazarites in the conclusion of their solemn service. J. A. A.—This counsel Paul willingly accepted, and proceeded to act upon.

From the fact that the apostle was seized by unbelieving Jews while engaged in this ceremonial service with the avowed design of conciliating Jewish believers, it has been inferred, even by so wise a man as John Knox, that the policy here advised and carried out was inconsistent with true Christian principles. But it certainly harmonized with those principles as laid down in the Epistles to the Corinthians and the Romans. And the record here gives no support to such an inference. The history that follows rather intimates that the end sought may have been fully attained. The knowledge that Paul was assaulted while showing his regard for their law (he having been some days visibly engaged in the ceremonial) may have drawn out the deeper sympathy of Jewish Christians in his behalf; and so more firmly united the great body of Jewish and Gentile believers in the subsequent persecutions and perils of their common Christian faith.

27-30. Paul assaulted by Jews and dragged from the Inner Court of Israel into the Outer Court of the Gentiles. (See Vol. I., Sec. 178.)—A low balustrade of stone, with pillars at regular intervals inscribed with a warning to Gentiles against entrance into the sacred limits beyond, fenced off the Inner Court of Israel from the Outer Court of the Gentiles. One of the stones containing this inscription was recently discovered in the Mohammedan cemetery by Mr. Ganneau. (See Vol. I., p. 621.)

It was within the fenced Inner Court, open only to worshiping Israelites, that some Ephesian Jews (of the province of Asia) encountered Paul—whose person seems to have been well known—with his band of Nazarites. Mistakenly inferring that one of these men was an Ephesian Greek (also well known to them), and too much blinded by hate to see clearly, they rushed upon the apostle, and loudly summoned the crowd of worshipers to aid in seizing him. With the same breath they denounced him as a renegade Jew, whose false, malevolent teaching everywhere among the Gentiles had spread suspicion and created hostility against the people, the Law, and the Temple of the Jews; a renegade, who even now dared to pollute the sanctity of this holy place by bringing into it Greeks (rather Gentiles, in accordance with the prevalent New Testament antithesis of Jews and Greeks). Such a charge instantly stirred to fury the masses always congregating at this festival period in and near the Temple, as the words were swiftly circulated among them. Responding to the wild cry of Help, as if Paul were the assailant and their sanctuary needed defense against his sacrilegious assault, the excited crowd fell upon the apostle, and, dragging him down into the Gentile Court, sought to beat him to death. Then the great doors of the "Beautiful" gate were closed by the Levites, to exclude the rioters from the holy court, and to prevent its possible profanation by bloodshed.

In the words of this false charge against Paul (v. 28), again we note (as often before) the evidence furnished by enemies of the vast extent and effectiveness of this apostle's work for Christ and men: This is the man—that hath taught all men everywhere! Unbelievers and believers—all had heard, or heard of, him. B.

The extreme corruption and wickedness, not only of the mass of the Jewish people, but even of the rulers and chief men, is asserted by Josephus in the strongest terms: "For that time was fruitful among the Jews in all sorts of wickedness, so that they left no evil deed undone; nor was there any new form of wickedness, which any one could invent, if he wished to do so. Thus they were all corrupt, both in their public and their private relations; and they vied with each other who should excel in impiety toward God and injustice to men." At the same time Josephus testifies to the existence among them of a species of zeal for religion—a readiness to attend the feasts, a regularity in the offering of sacrifice, an almost superstitious regard for the Temple, and a fanatic abhorrence of all who sought to "change the customs which Moses had delivered." G. R.

31-33. Interposition of the Roman Tribune, and Binding of Paul. (See Frontispiece, Vol. I.)—The fortress Antonia (the castle here referred to) stood alone on a precipitous rock, near ninety feet high, at the northwest corner of the Temple. It was likewise a work of Herod the Great. The fortress was seventy feet in height. It appeared like a vast square tower, with four other towers at each corner, three of them between eighty and ninety feet high—that at the corner next to the Temple above a hundred and twenty. From this the whole Temple might be seen, and broad flights of steps led down into the northern and western cloisters, or porticoes, of the Temple, in which, during the Roman government, their guards were stationed. Milman.

Instantly upon receiving tidings of the uproar from these guards, the chief captain—or tribune, commanding one division (one sixth) of a Roman legion of six thousand men—hastened down with a body of soldiers into the Temple Court. The only thought of this man, Lysias by name, in interposing his armed force, was to check the turbulence of a Jewish mob, or to suppress a riot. He cared not about saving an innocent man from murderous violence. With a theory that Paul was a certain well-known insurgent leader, he was rather inclined to second the purpose of the infuriate Jews. His seizing and binding Paul seem to have been only the preliminary steps to this. Yet, with the Roman style of justice, he demands of Paul's assailants to know who their victim was, and of what they accused him.

34-36. Paul borne up the Castle Stairs amid Malignant Outcries of the Jews.—No accusation could they make. Their hate furnished the only reason for their violence. To rescue Paul from this violence was the tribune's duty, and therefore he commanded the soldiers to whom the apostle was chained to bear him up the stairway of the fortress. And as this was done, the same passionate, murderous cry that thirty years before had rung through the vast area of the Temple Court and Castle was heard again: Away with him! Before, it was actuated by hatred to Divine purity, truth, and love, incarnated in the person of Christ; now, coming from another generation filled with like malevolent spirit, it is hatred to Christ's most faithful witness and messenger.

37-39. Brief Colloquy between Paul and Lysias.—As the absent governor's representative, the tribune felt the grave responsibility, not only of preserving the public peace, but of dealing (as he supposed), in the person of this prisoner, with a fanatic insurgent, an Egyptian Jew, whose efforts at insurrection had troubled the whole administration of Felix. This Egyptian impostor had gone into the great Desert of Judea with four thousand assassins, secretly organized into bands. B.—He returned with thirty thousand men, whom he had deluded into the belief that he was the Messiah, and that he would restore the kingdom to Judah; he encamped on the Mount of Olives, threatening to overpower the Roman garrison, and promising that the walls of Jerusalem should fall down. He was attacked by Felix, and his followers dispersed or slain, the Egyptian himself escaping. S.—We find in Josephus a full account of the transaction, which happened under the government of Felix, and, what is remarkable, Josephus does not mention his name, but everywhere calls him "the Egyptian," and "the Egyptian false prophet." M. H.

Surprised at the ease and naturalness with which Paul addressed him in Greek, "as these insurgents probably communicated with their followers only in the dialect of their country," the Roman captain puts a plain question of fact, to which Paul answers as plainly. He said, "I am a Jew; not a characterless vagabond from Egypt, nor even a native of Judea (where insurgents and insurrections were bred), but a citizen of refined and wealthy Tarsus in Asiatic Cilicia." This direct, clear answer swept away at once the tribune's suspicion. More than this, too, did Paul's intelligent address and courageous bearing accomplish. Beholding him so un-awed by the imminent peril, so unruffled in spirit by the rude handling of the mob and the soldiers, the only calm, self-possessed man in the vast, excited, surging throng; noting, too, the self-respect and native dignity in his reference to his own birth-city, and the proper respect to Roman authority evinced in the form of his request, the Roman commander yields to the unconscious mastery of so brave and courteous a spirit, and grants Paul the only liberty he asks, the liberty of speech. And this very liberty he seeks, not for his own sake, but for theirs. He would speak to the people, God's people and his. He would use this his grand opportunity as Christ's herald to proclaim his Messiahship to this vast multitude of his "fallen" Israel. Though many strange places were occupied as a pulpit by this matchless pioneer preacher of the Cross, none was so striking as this, the stairway between the Roman quarters and the venerated area of Jewish pride and worship. And the vast auditorium became strangely still. For even the mad, murderous mob was awed into a temporary quiet, as this unresisting yet undaunted, strong-hearted man, standing chained to two mailed men, stretched forth his manacled right hand to summon their attention.

The whole scene is sublime beyond expression. Like all the marked events and crises of Paul's grandly effective career, it neither requires nor admits any imaginative gloss or coloring. All these signal incidents are best apprehended and most impressively conveyed in the simple form of the Scriptural record. B.

Section 226.

ACTS xxi. 40 ; xxii. 1-29.

40 AND when there was made a great silence, he spake unto them in the Hebrew tongue, say-
 1 ing, Men, brethren, and fathers, hear ye my defence which I make now unto you. (And when 2 they heard that he spake in the Hebrew tongue to them, they kept the more silence: and he
 3 saith,) I am verily a man which am a Jew, born in Tarsus, a city in Cilicia, yet brought up
 4 in this city at the feet of Gamaliel, and taught according to the perfect manner of the law
 5 of the fathers, and was zealous toward God, as ye all are this day. And I persecuted this 6 way unto the death, binding and delivering into prisons both men and women. As also the 7 high priest doth bear me witness, and all the estate of the elders: from whom also I re-
 8 ceived letters unto the brethren, and went to Damascus, to bring them which were there
 9 bound unto Jerusalem, for to be punished. And it came to pass, that, as I made my jour-
 10 ney, and was come nigh unto Damascus about noon, suddenly there shone from heaven a 11 great light round about me. And I fell unto the ground, and heard a voice saying unto me, 12 Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? And I answered, Who art thou, Lord? And he said 13 unto me, I am Jesus of Nazareth, whom thou persecutest. And they that were with me 14 saw indeed the light, and were afraid; but they heard not the voice of him that spake to 15 me. And I said, What shall I do, Lord? And the Lord said unto me, Arise, and go into 16 Damascus; and there it shall be told thee of all things which are appointed for thee to do.
 17 And when I could not see for the glory of that light, being led by the hand of them that 18 were with me, I came into Damascus. And one Ananias, a devout man according to the 19 law, having a good report of all the Jews which dwelt there, came unto me, and stood, and 20 said unto me, Brother Saul, receive thy sight. And the same hour I looked up upon him.
 21 And he said, The God of our fathers hath chosen thee, that thou shouldest know his will, and 22 see that Just One, and shouldest hear the voice of his mouth. For thou shalt be his wit-
 23 ness unto all men of what thou hast seen and heard. And now why tarriest thou? arise, 24 and be baptized, and wash away thy sins, calling on the name of the Lord.
 25 And it came to pass, that, when I was come again to Jerusalem, even while I prayed in 26 the temple, I was in a trance; and saw him saying unto me, Make haste, and get thee
 27 quickly out of Jerusalem: for they will not receive thy testimony concerning me. And I 28 said, Lord, they know that I imprisoned and beat in every synagogue them that believed on 29 thee: and when the blood of thy martyr Stephen was shed, I also was standing by, and 30 consenting unto his death, and kept the raiment of them that slew him. And he said unto 31 me, Depart: for I will send thee far hence unto the Gentiles. And they gave him audience 32 unto this word, and then lifted up their voices, and said, Away with such a fellow from the 33 earth: for it is not fit that he should live. And as they cried out, and cast off their clothes, 34 and threw dust into the air, the chief captain commanded him to be brought into the 35 castle, and bade that he should be examined by scourging; that he might know wherefore
 36 they cried so against him. And as they bound him with thongs, Paul said unto the centu-

26 rion that stood by, Is it lawful for you to scourge a man that is a Roman, and uncon-27 demned? When the centurion heard that, he went and told the chief captain, saying, Take 28 heed what thou doest: for this man is a Roman. Then the chief captain came, and said 29 unto him, Tell me, art thou a Roman? He said, Yea. And the chief captain answered, With a great sum obtained I this freedom. And Paul said, But I was free born. Then straightway they departed from him which should have examined him: and the chief captain also was afraid, after he knew that he was a Roman, and because he had bound him.

1-16. Paul's voluntary statement, or first de- fense, was made to the maddened Jews massed in the vast Outer Court of the Temple, from the top of the stairway to the adjoining fortress Antonia. His quiet poise of manner and his respectful, dignified courtesy of address helped to calm their excitement.
 By calling this mob of persecutors Brethren, he both acknowledged and claimed a common nationality with them. The old men who were there, priests, rulers, and rabbis, of eminence as leaders and teachers, some of whom had just repeated the act of thirty years before by stirring up the people to persecution, Paul yet addresses with the venerable term Fathers. His use, too, of the Hebrew tongue (that is, the then current Aramaic or Syro-Chaldaic dialect of Palestine, which had gradually supplanted the older Hebrew of Judea since the captivity) helped further to attract their attention and to conciliate their feeling at the outset.

With great wisdom and tact he shapes his whole address. He defers to their manifestly hostile feeling by calling it a defense (Greek, apology). He avows himself a Jew, refers to his pure Jewish blood, his place of birth, and his early and thorough training in the knowledge and practice of the law, at Jerusalem. He recalls that which they also well knew of his early life. He repeats the story of his surpassing zeal and frenzy in the active persecution of Christian disciples; how he went even to Damascus for this purpose, under commission of the high priest and elders. He thus dwelt upon his fiercely fanatical career in order that the question might arise in their minds by anticipation, what had wrought so extreme a change. Surely they must feel and know that nothing less than an irresistible motive, a conviction of truth absolutely conclusive, could have turned a man of such indomitable, fiery zeal so utterly against himself and his kindred and associates, against all his previous beliefs, practices, prejudices, and hates.

Then he tells the marvelous story of his conversion. He details the miracle of Christ's appearance and words by the way; and the subsequent visit and message of Ananias in Damascus. He characterizes Ananias as "a devout man according to the law, having a good report of all the Jews which dwelt there"; and declares that he spake in the name of Jehovah, the God of Israel. By the God of their fathers, therefore, he had been changed from a persecutor into an advocate of Christ. Passing over the interval of three years, he proceeds to narrate a miraculous occurrence in Jerusalem.

17-21. Christ's Second Appearance in the Tem- ple, and his Command that Paul should go forth to Distant Foreign Nations.—It was while in the Tem- ple, and while praying there—thus implying his loyalty to the Jewish sanctuary and its worship, and disproving the charge of hostility and profanation—that Christ came to him again. Not in a foreign country and an alien temple, but in their own sacred, time-hallowed precincts, where their own Jehovah had manifested his presence and recorded his name, this Christ had appeared to him. So appearing in Jehovah's Temple, Paul suggests by implication, this Christ must be from God, their God. As it was the fervency of prayer that ushered Paul's spirit into a state of trance, so it was his need of direction, intensely felt and fervidly expressed, that brought Christ a second time into close personal communion with him. This interview is not referred to in Luke's previous account (ch. 9). Paul introduces it here to explain and justify his going to the Gentiles. From this point of view, the colloquy with Christ is specially instructive.

Christ's reason for Paul's instant departure from Jerusalem—"for they will not receive thy testimony concerning me"—implies His knowledge that Paul's great desire was to remain and preach Christ among the Jews of Jerusalem. This desire Paul makes even more evident to his present hearers by showing how he demurred to Christ's command. They knew, he said, what a persecutor of Christians he had been; and this fact would give his new testimony for Christ the more weight with them. Thus Paul more than hints to the listening Jews that his strong desire was to remain among his own people.
 But he goes on faithfully to recite Christ's imperative direction (His only reply) to depart, and to minister among far nations.

22, 23. Why and how Paul's Address was in- terrupted.—To the story of the apostle's life and conversion, even to the statement about Christ's second appearance, the vast throng crowding the Temple area had listened silently and intently; and they remembered well the miraculous part of it the next day. They seem to have felt the man's sincerity. They uttered no doubt respecting his main assertion, that a direct power from above and not any influence of other minds had transformed the persecutor into the disciple of Christ. But when he spoke "this word"—better, this saying, referring to the whole direction of Christ—then instantly was aroused the old, deep-seated, and incurable envy and jealousy at the thought that the Gentiles could be fellow-heirs with them of Jehovah's promised mercy, and subjects of their glorious Messiah. Then, on the instant, reason and reverence were forgotten; all sense of right and justice was overborne in a great outburst of mad rage. Although their Prophets and Psalmists had plainly proclaimed the ultimate world-wide ministry of the Messiah and the extension of God's saving mercies to all peoples, the Jews had never accepted the fact, could never abide the thought. For its statement by Christ they rose upon him at Nazareth and during the week of his passion. For this statement they murdered Stephen; and, at Antioch and Corinth, had sought to murder Paul. And now, in their frantic impotence of wrath, they shout out their murderous execrations and demands, rending off and tossing up their outer garments, with handfuls of dust, into the air.

24-26. Paul's Announcement of Roman Citizenship arrests the Examination by Scourging.—By the violent outcry of the Jews not only was Paul silenced but the Roman commander was led to infer that the apostle's defense (which the captain had not understood) had only strengthened their conviction of his guilt. Partly from this impression, and partly to gratify the Jewish populace (always a politic custom of the Roman rulers), the tribune directed that he should be tortured to confession by the scourge. The implements of such extorted confession (here called examination), including the posts, the binding thongs, and the knotted whips, were always at hand in a Roman fortress.

"But when they stretched him out for the whips," or as they were binding him to the inclined post with leather thongs, Paul asserts, as at Philippi, his Roman citizenship. This he does in a sharply pointed question to the centurion charged with the scourging. To punish an untried and uncondemned Roman, especially to torture such a one with the scourge, was by Roman law one of the highest crimes. At once the centurion hastens to his commanding officer with the warning intelligence that Paul was a Roman.

27-29. The Tribune's Second Colloquy with Paul, and its Effect.—Instantly the astonished and alarmed chief captain came to his prisoner (girded for the scourge) to know if it were really so. Not for a moment did he doubt Paul's assertion; for death was the penalty of a false claim to Roman citizenship. Such citizenship involved the highest political rights and civil privileges. It was acquired chiefly by parentage or purchase. By "a great sum" Lysias had purchased it. To Paul it had descended by inheritance.

Paul's appeal had instant full effect. The thongs were untied and he removed from the dishonoring implements. Lysias, too (like the magistrates at Philippi), was greatly alarmed, because the mere binding of Paul to the scourge-post might have been punished with death. But now, as before, the apostle manifested no aggrieved or vindictive feeling. In part it had been a just self-honor, but chiefly regard for the dignity of the great cause he represented, that led him to declare his citizenship. He was always willing to suffer shame when such suffering was demanded by, or would in any wise further, his ministry of Christ and of truth among men. Otherwise, in the interest of Christianity, he claimed all the honor and respect due to a true manhood, and all the rights of human citizenship. B.

At first under the republic all Roman soldiers were Roman citizens. "But in proportion as the public freedom was lost in extent of conquest, war was gradually improved into an art and degraded into a trade." With the distinction between the prætorian and legionary soldiers all necessary connection between citizenship and military service ceased to exist. In strict conformity with this state of things we find that Claudius Lysias was a citizen by purchase, not because he was a military officer. H.

Wholly at a loss what to do with the apostle, compelled to keep him in custody for the safety of his life, having received vastly higher impressions of Paul's character and standing, yet still ignorant who he was, and what the crime alleged against him by the Jews, Lysias naturally seeks the aid of the Sanhedrim, or great Jewish Council. He therefore summons its members to assemble on the morrow for a hearing of the case, hoping thereby to obtain sufficient understanding to guide his own future course. B.

Section 227.

ACTS xxii. 30 ; xxiii. 1-35.

80 ON the morrow, because he would have known the certainty wherefore he was accused of the Jews, he loosed him from his bands, and commanded the chief priests and all their 1 council to appear, and brought Paul down, and set him before them. And Paul, earnestly beholding the council, said, Men and brethren, I have lived in all good conscience before 2 God until this day. And the high priest Ananias commanded them that stood by him to 3 smite him on the mouth. Then said Paul unto him, God shall smite thee, thou whited wall :
for sittest thou to judge me after the law, and commandest me to be smitten contrary to the 4 law? And they that stood by said, Revilest thou God's high priest? Then said Paul, I
5 wist not, brethren, that he was the high priest : for it is written, Thou shalt not speak evil 6 of the ruler of thy people. But when Paul perceived that the one part were Sadducees, and the other Pharisees, he cried out in the council, Men and brethren, I am a Pharisee, the son 7 of a Pharisee : of the hope and resurrection of the dead I am called in question. And when he had so said, there arose a dissension between the Pharisees and the Sadducees : and the 8 multitude was divided. For the Sadducees say that there is no resurrection, neither angel, 9 nor spirit : but the Pharisees confess both. And there arose a great cry : and the scribes that were of the Pharisees' part arose, and strove, saying, We find no evil in this man : but 10 if a spirit or an angel hath spoken to him, let us not fight against God. And when there arose a great dissension, the chief captain, fearing lest Paul should have been pulled in pieces of them, commanded the soldiers to go down, and to take him by force from among 11 them, and to bring him into the castle. And the night following the Lord stood by him, and said, Be of good cheer, Paul : for as thou hast testified of me in Jerusalem, so must thou bear witness also at Rome.

12 And when it was day, certain of the Jews banded together, and bound themselves under 13 a curse, saying that they would neither eat nor drink till they had killed Paul. And they 14 were more than forty which had made this conspiracy. And they came to the chief priests and elders, and said, We have bound ourselves under a great curse, that we will eat nothing 15 until we have slain Paul. Now therefore ye with the council signify to the chief captain that he bring him down unto you to-morrow, as though ye would inquire something more 16 perfectly concerning him : and we, or ever he come near, are ready to kill him. And when Paul's sister's son heard of their lying in wait, he went and entered into the castle, and told 17 Paul. Then Paul called one of the centurions unto him, and said, Bring this young man 18 unto the chief captain : for he hath a certain thing to tell him. So he took him, and brought him to the chief captain, and said, Paul the prisoner called me unto him, and prayed me to 19 bring this young man unto thee, who hath something to say unto thee. Then the chief captain took him by the hand, and went with him aside privately, and asked him, What is 20 that thou hast to tell me? And he said, The Jews have agreed to desire thee that thou wouldest bring down Paul to-morrow into the council, as though they would inquire some-21 what of him more perfectly. But do not thou yield unto them : for there lie in wait for him of them more than forty men, which have bound themselves with an oath, that they will neither eat nor drink till they have killed him : and now are they ready, looking for a 22 promise from thee. So the chief captain then let the young man depart, and charged him, 23 See thou tell no man that thou hast shewed these things to me. And he called unto him two centurions, saying, Make ready two hundred soldiers to go to Cæsarea, and horsemen 24 threescore and ten, and spearmen two hundred, at the third hour of the night ; and provide 25 them beasts, that they may set Paul on, and bring him safe unto Felix the governor. And 26 he wrote a letter after this manner : Claudius Lysias unto the most excellent governor Felix 27 sendeth greeting. This man was taken of the Jews, and should have been killed of them :
28 then came I with an army, and rescued him, having understood that he was a Roman. And when I would have known the cause wherefore they accused him, I brought him forth into 29 their council : whom I perceived to be accused of questions of their law, but to have no-30 thing laid to his charge worthy of death or of bonds. And when it was told me how that the Jews laid wait for the man, I sent straightway to thee, and gave commandment to his accusers also to say before thee what they had against him. Farewell.

31 Then the soldiers, as it was commanded them, took Paul, and brought him by night to 32 Antipatris. On the morrow they left the horsemen to go with him, and returned to the 33 castle: who, when they came to Cæsarea, and delivered the epistle to the governor, pre-34 sented Paul also before him. And when the governor had read the letter, he asked of what 35 province he was. And when he understood that he was of Cilicia; I will hear thee, said he, when thine accusers are also come. And he commanded him to be kept in Herod's judgment hall.

1. The Assertion with which Paul first breaks the Silence.—God had used the tribune Lysias (acting for the governor, Felix) to rescue Paul, and then, for his continued safety, to hold him in arrest. Now he makes of the tribune's desire to know more of Paul a new opportunity for the apostle. This opportunity, like every circumstance and position in which Paul was placed during his period of liberty or of "bonds and imprisonment," is made by him an occasion "for the furtherance of the gospel."

The Council, or Sanhedrim, was assembled in a hall connected with the Temple chambers. (See diagram, Vol. I., p. 623.) Into this hall Paul was "brought down" from the castle. Here Lysias remained while the military guard retired a little distance, yet ready to interpose (as they did) for his protection. Almost twenty-five years had elapsed since Paul had intensely endorsed the Council's murderous persecution of Stephen, and had been the chief instrument of this supreme judicatory in its vindictive pursuit of Christ's disciples. Now he stands before them as the chief object of their hate, with no responsive hate; altogether unmindful of himself, calmly and undauntedly ("looking steadfastly," Luke says) he studies their faces and their spirit.

Then he asserts a self-respecting dignity by opening the anomalous proceedings. He claims a position of perfect equality, by addressing them as Brother Men. He shows that he understood the tribune's object by speaking of himself; and in Greek, that Lysias too might comprehend. As best answering a question touching his criminality, he affirms his own truthful and righteous life. In the spirit and manner of the Master's question, "Who convinceth me of sin?" he challenges them to gainsay the assertion that he had been true to God and man; that in the main his aims, his plans, his deeds, had been single and right. Paul asserts no doctrine or practice of perfection here; but a fact based upon God's gracious inworking. And he does it, not only to justify himself before Lysias, but to sharpen the contrast with their professed righteousness, which was hypocrisy. B.

2, 3. The High Priest's Unjust Command and Paul's Indignant Rejoinder.—Ananias had been appointed high priest in A. D. 48. In A. D. 52 he was sent to Rome to answer before Claudius on a charge of oppression brought against him by the Samaritans. The result is doubtful; but the best solution seems to be that Ananias was not formally deposed, but, upon the murder of Jonathan (who had been appointed in his place during his suspension) in A. D. 57, he resumed his functions. The high priest's character for violence and lawlessness suggests that a guilty conscience assumed the guise of zeal against blasphemy, when he ordered the bystanders to smite Paul on the mouth. S.—It was not to be tolerated that a man who stood arraigned there as an apostate from the religion of his fathers should assert his innocence. The mouth must be shut that uttered such a declaration. Hackett.

It was not the proposed indignity to himself (which, from the question of the bystanders, we may infer was not actually committed), but it was the glaring injustice and hypocrisy of the man who commanded it, that instantly turned the prisoner into a judge and condemner. But Paul's words were not an imprecation, nor an outburst of passion, or even of righteous indignation. Severe as was the figure he used—thou whited wall—and sharply as the implied charge of falsehood was hurled back against the high priest, more severe was the whited sepulchre which Christ used, and more directly and sharply were His terrible denunciations pointed against hypocrites. Paul speaks, too, in God's name; and he assigns the unlawful command of Ananias as the ground of this announced judgment from God. B.—On each of the many such hypocrites who sat before him, the apostle might well denounce the doom, "God shall smite thee"; and there is no difficulty in regarding the special fitness of his words to Ananias—who was deposed by Felix two years later and afterward murdered by the Sicarii—as one of the innumerable examples of unconscious prophecy. S.—Concerning Ananias, Josephus states that in a tumult begun by his own son he was besieged and taken in the royal palace, where having in vain attempted to hide himself in an old aqueduct, he was dragged out and slain, about five years after this. D.

4, 5. The Bystanders' Question and Paul's Reply.—The partisans to whom the high priest's unlawful command had been directed, seem to have been so far affected by Paul's boldness as to substitute a rebuking question for the smiting on the mouth. In their question, however, they defended, not the unlawful order, but the sacred office of the high priest. They charge Paul with reviling God's high priest.

In the apostle's answering avowal of ignorance respecting Ananias and his high-priestly office, we find one of those Scriptural difficulties which has had many proposed solutions. It seems obvious that Paul did not speak ironically, or as confessing and apologizing for a heedless or intemperate exclamation. Nor did he have reference to the abolition of the priestly office by Christ. Still less did he mean to deny the title of Ananias on account of his suspension from and subsequent usurpation of the high priest's functions. His supposed defect of vision seems also to be ruled out, by his "stedfast looking" at the outset, and by his clear discernment of the two main elements, Sadducaic and Pharisaic, comprised in the Council. Besides the established character of Paul for sincerity and for clearness of perception, there are natural considerations of fact which sustain the view that he honestly pleaded ignorance of the person of the high priest. Ananias had not succeeded to the office until ten or more years after Paul's conversion. He was not necessarily the presiding officer of the Sanhedrim. Nor, when presiding, was it customary always to wear the distinctive robes of the high-priesthood. This was only demanded when performing official duties in the Temple.

Respecting this reply of Paul we note further: (1) That he simply justifies himself as to the charge of reviling brought against him. He does not withdraw nor apologize for the condemnation he had uttered against Ananias. That remained: its force and justness unshaken by the attempted diversion of the high priest's adherents. (2) That Paul, by citing from the law (Ex. 22 : 28), distinctly implies that he still holds that law, which he is here charged with rejecting, as the guide and rule of his life. The quotation, thus regarded, further shows that the apostle in this whole colloquy was now speaking, as he declared he had lived, seriously and conscientiously.

6-9. Paul ends the Useless Conference by dividing his Adversaries. Strife between the Pharisees and Sadducees.—Knowing well that he can have neither fair hearing nor just judgment from a body so prejudiced and hostile, with no hope of achieving good by further direct exposition of Christian truth, he wisely and rightly divides his adversaries, and so abruptly breaks up an unsought, anomalous, and useless conference. Not as some mistakenly read it, by a trick suddenly conceived and carried out for his own advantage, but in a way that perfectly accords with the true missionary spirit and work. The state of dissension between these two great parties which for generations divided the nation had always been familiar to Paul. Nay, more, he had always sided with the Pharisees as respects their points of difference with the Sadducees. With them he had shared a belief and hope in the resurrection from the dead. Apprehending, as they did not, its ultimate relation to the risen Christ, he could truly declare that his preaching of this doctrine had subjected him to this inquisitorial process before the Sanhedrim. And now he uses this very examination to emphasize, and so call attention to, the great doctrine upon which the two rival sects were chiefly divided; knowing and designing, indeed, thereby to raise an issue that would break up the Council. B. —He had not come to Jerusalem to escape out of the way of danger; but, at the risk of bonds and death, to reconcile the sincere Jews, if possible, to the gospel as the fulfillment of the Law. He desired to prove himself a faithful Israelite by his very testimony to him whom God had raised from the dead. Both these objects might naturally be promoted by an appeal to the nobler professions of the Pharisees, whose creed, as distinguished from that of the Sadducees, was still, as it had ever been, his own. Of that creed, faith in the risen Lord was the true fulfillment. He wished to lead his brother Pharisees into a deeper and more living apprehension of their own faith; and, seeing now the hopelessness of gaining over the Sadducees, he made a last appeal to the party of which there remained any hope. S.

He needed no expedient, for he was then in Roman hands and under Roman protection. It was no pretense to serve a turn; it was the genuine language of his heart. In all his other speeches at this crisis the same idea reigns predominant. "I stand and am judged for the hope of the promise made of God unto our fathers: unto which promise our twelve tribes, instantly serving God day and night, hope to come: for which hope's sake, King Agrippa, I am accused of the Jews. Why is it judged by you a thing incredible if God raises the dead?" It is the self-same sound which we heard in the first discourse given us from his lips, when he cried to the Jews of the Pisidian Antioch, "Now we declare unto you glad tidings, how that the promise which was made unto the fathers, God hath fulfilled the same unto us their children, in that he hath raised up Jesus again." And when we read his mind upon this subject more fully in 1 Cor. 15, and indeed in the whole of his writings, we see how truly the resurrection of Christ did, in his view, include the realization of all the hopes with which the Old Covenant was pregnant; how entirely it was to him the cause and actual commencement, as well as the pledge and promise, of the resurrection and the life to man. T. D. B.

8. The Sadducees believed in neither angel nor spirit; they rejected the doctrine of a future life, and denied the resurrection of the dead. They were the rationalists of their age. They accepted the law, admitted the Divine mission of Moses, and belonged to the Hebrew Church; but they did away with everything in the constitution of humanity and its relation to God which could sustain the edifice of anything like a high religious life. Eternal life, in the sense of a future immortality, was exploded altogether. T. B.

The immediate result was "a sudden paroxysm of their usual antipathy and party zeal," an array of the two parties against each other, and an assumption, for the moment, of Paul's defense by the more numerous party of the Pharisees. Seemingly referring to the apostle's account on the preceding day of Christ's two miraculous appearances, the Pharisaic scribes assert their belief that he is the true man he claims to be, and that a spirit (or angel) may have spoken to him, as he had said. True to their belief in spiritual messengers from heaven, using (if the sentence be genuine) the very words of Gamaliel (5 : 39), they declare that they will not fight against the God who sends spirits by harming this man to whom he may have sent them.

10. Paul's Second Rescue from Actual Violence by the Tribune Lycias.—The controversy between the rival sects grew so sharp, and the actual strife around the person of Paul became so fierce, that the Roman commander was constrained to interpose his soldiers again, and almost forcibly to withdraw his prisoner. Not that Paul, an obscure prisoner, was of any special account. But for the life of Paul, a Roman citizen, he would be held responsible. Besides, he has learned something, if not all he desires to know, about this man. What he has learned has satisfied him that his prisoner is no criminal and deserves no punishment from Jew or Roman. And all that he has heard and seen has greatly raised his estimate of Paul. It has prepared him to take the decisive and costly measures for Paul's deliverance which follow in the history.

11. Another Night-vision of Christ.—Once before, at Corinth, and once after, in his ocean peril, came such a divine personal visitation for the needed cheer and stay of Paul's spirit, questioning about the present, and depressed concerning the future. Not for his own Christian comfort or peace in trusting; for his faith was adequate to his mere personal needs. But Christ came, partly to acquaint him that his work in Jerusalem was finished, and that it was approved; but chiefly to assure him concerning his longed-for work at Rome—to let him know that he should finish his course with joy, and the ministry received of the Lord Jesus (20 : 24). B.

So, then, he was to be guided by that unerring Hand, though by a path he had not proposed, to the goal he had so much desired; and we can understand the calmness which this assurance gave him amid the trials of the following years. S.—It upheld and comforted him in the uncertainty of his life from the Jews, in the uncertainty of his liberation from prison at Cesarea, in the uncertainty of his surviving the storm in the Mediterranean, in the uncertainty of his fate on arriving at Rome. So may one crumb of divine grace and help be multiplied to feed five thousand wants and anxieties. A.

12-35. Defeat of a Conspiracy to assassinate Paul by his Removal to Cesarea.—The plot was well laid, and endorsed at least by the Sadducean members of the Sanhedrim. Such vows were not unusual with the Jews; and absolution was readily obtained if they were found impossible of accomplishment. The ready admission of Paul's nephew, and the instant compliance with Paul's request by the centurion, and further, the immediate audience and heed given by the tribune to the young messenger, show how strong an impression the apostle had made upon them. Both officers recognized and at once responded to his prompt judicious action. B.—The details of his acting exhibit a decisive example of the actual union and harmony between the prescient purpose of God and the responsibility of men for duty on their own sphere. It was determined that Paul's life should be saved from these dangers, and that determination was made known to him. He knew for certain that these schemers could not take his life; he knew for certain that the power of God was pledged effectually to frustrate their designs; yet with this knowledge Paul laid his plans skillfully, and executed them with secrecy and energy, for the preservation of his own life, precisely as if he had thought that all depended on his own skill and promptitude. This shows conclusively that in Paul's mind a belief in the decrees of God did not conflict with the obligation to diligent duty on the part of men. He framed and conducted a counterplot to defeat the conspiracy of the Jewish priesthood with as much zeal and care as if he had not obtained previous assurance of his safety. This simple history is most precious as an inspired commentary on some difficult doctrines. It does not indeed make the doctrines easy of comprehension; it does not relieve them of mystery to our minds; but it is fitted to show us that no view of the divine purposes can be right that in any measure tends to slacken human zeal and energy. To be assured that it is God that worketh in them, is the best of all motives to induce intelligent Christians to work out their own salvation with fear and trembling (Phil. 2 : 12, 13). Arnot.

The Roman commander was fully aware that Paul's life was not secure even in the citadel. B.—The crime of assassination had become fearfully frequent in Jerusalem. Neither the sanctity of the Temple protected the unsuspecting worshiper from the secret dagger, nor did the majesty of the high priest's office secure the first religious and civil magistrate of the nation from the same ignoble fate. Milman.—Hence the tribune Claudius Lysias, upon learning of the vow of these fanatic zealots against the apostle's life, the same night sent his prisoner under a strong protecting guard to Felix, the procurator or governor (of the Imperial Province of Judea), who resided at Cesarea. B.

We may be surprised that so large a force was sent to secure the safety of one man; but we must remember that this man was a Roman citizen, while the garrison in Antonia, consisting of more than a thousand men, could easily spare such a number for one day on such a service. The utmost secrecy, as well as promptitude, was evidently required; and therefore an hour was chosen, when the earliest part of the night would be already past. At the time appointed, the troops, with Paul in the midst of them, marched out of the fortress, and at a rapid pace took the road to Cesarea. The foot-soldiers proceeded no farther than Antipatris, but returned from thence to Jerusalem. They were no longer necessary to secure Paul's safety; but they might very probably be required in the fortress of Antonia. It would be in the course of the afternoon that the remaining soldiers with their weary horses entered the streets of Cesarea. The centurion who remained in command of them proceeded at once to the governor, and gave up his prisoner; and at the same time presented the dispatch with which he was charged by the commandant of the garrison at Jerusalem. Section 228.

ACTS xxiv. 1-27.

- 1 AND after five days Ananias the high priest descended with the elders, and with a certain 2 orator named Tertullus, who informed the governor against Paul. And when he was called
 3 forth, Tertullus began to accuse him, saying, Seeing that by thee we enjoy great quietness,
 4 and that very worthy deeds are done unto this nation by thy providence, we accept it
 5 always, and in all places, most noble Felix, with all thankfulness. Notwithstanding, that 6 I be not further tedious unto thee, I pray thee that thou wouldest hear us of thy clemency
 7 a few words. For we have found this man a pestilent fellow, and a mover of sedition
 8 among all the Jews throughout the world, and a ringleader of the sect of the Nazarenes:
 9 who also hath gone about to profane the temple: whom we took, and would have judged
 10 according to our law. But the chief captain Lysias came upon us, and with great violence 11 took him away out of our hands, commanding his accusers to come unto thee: by examin-12 ing of whom thyself mayest take knowledge of all these things, whereof we accuse him.
 13 And the Jews also assented, saying that these things were so.
 14 Then Paul, after that the governor had beckoned unto him to speak, answered, Foras-
 15 much as I know that thou hast been of many years a judge unto this nation, I do the more 16 cheerfully answer for myself: because that thou mayest understand, that there are yet but 17 twelve days since I went up to Jerusalem for to worship. And they neither found me in 18 the temple disputing with any man, neither raising up the people, neither in the synagogues, 19 nor in the city: neither can they prove the things whereof they now accuse me. But this I 20 confess unto thee, that after the way which they call heresy, so worship I the God of my 21 fathers, believing all things which are written in the law and in the prophets: and have 22 hope toward God, which they themselves also allow, that there shall be a resurrection of 23 the dead, both of the just and unjust. And herein do I exercise myself, to have always a 24 conscience void of offence toward God, and toward men. Now after many years I came 25 to bring alms to my nation, and offerings. Whereupon certain Jews from Asia found me 26 purified in the temple, neither with multitude, nor with tumult. Who ought to have been 27 here before thee, and object, if they had ought against me. Or else let these same here
 28 say, if they have found any evil doing in me, while I stood before the council, except it be 29 for this one voice, that I cried standing among them, Touching the resurrection of the dead
 30 I am called in question by you this day. And when Felix heard these things, having more 31 perfect knowledge of that way, he deferred them, and said, When Lysias the chief captain 32 shall come down, I will know the uttermost of your matter. And he commanded a centu-33 rion to keep Paul, and to let him have liberty, and that he should forbid none of his ac-34 quaintance to minister or come unto him.
- 24 And after certain days, when Felix came with his wife Drusilla, which was a Jewess, he

25 sent for Paul, and heard him concerning the faith in Christ. And as he reasoned of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come, Felix trembled, and answered, Go thy way
26 for this time; when I have a convenient season, I will call for thee. He hoped also that money should have been given him of Paul, that he might loose him: wherefore he sent 27 for him the oftener, and communed with him. But after two years Porcius Festus came into Felix' room: and Felix, willing to shew the Jews a pleasure, left Paul bound.

AMID the superficial cares and pleasures of a worldly existence a man's deeper nature may slumber; the surface-ripple of the stream of common life may fill the sense and lull the soul to sleep, but to almost every one there come occasions when the smooth current of the life of sense is interrupted, and his true self is roused to a temporary wakefulness. In the stillness of the lonely sick-bed, amid worldly reverses, in declining health, or under bitter bereavement—in such passages of man's history, the soul, eternity, God, become for the moment real things, and the most thoughtless and worldly-minded is forced to pause and think. Or, again, when the man listens to some very earnest exhibition of divine truth, or is brought into contact with one who is living a very holy, pure, unselfish life, a painful impression of his own deficiencies—a transient glimpse of a nobler, purer ideal of life, to which his own presents a miserable contrast—may visit his mind. Instead of seeking true comfort by the steady, however painful, contemplation, and then, through God's grace, by the deliberate, persevering correction of its evil self, the mind too often seeks a speedier but most unreal satisfaction, by forgetting its convictions, and seeing itself only in the false glass of the world's opinions. Thus, with many, life is but a continuous endeavor to forget and keep out of sight their true selves—a vain eluding and outstripping of a reality which is still ever with them, and to the consciousness of which they must one day awake. Caird.

1-9. Renewed Accusation against Paul by the Jews, before the Tribunal of Felix.—Very promptly (within five days) was Paul followed to Cesarea by Ananias and some of the Jewish elders. They brought with them a professional Roman advocate, Tertullus, whom they had hired to prosecute Paul before the Roman governor. Among themselves there was no one competent to encounter Paul; and they would conciliate Felix by employing a Roman pleader. Flattery and falsehood characterized this man's address to Felix. Abuse and falsehood made up his charge against Paul.

Artfully as his encomium is framed, it is false in all its points. Historical facts (mainly from the Jew Josephus and the Roman Tacitus) show the reverse of "quietness" in the nation, and of "worthy deeds" wrought by "the providence" of Felix; and that instead of "thankfulness," Felix was followed to Rome with the sharpest accusations by the Jews. B.—Felix was appointed (A. D. 53) partly at the instance of Jonathan, the then high priest. He ruled the province in a mean, cruel, and profligate manner. Tacitus says, "By every form of cruelty and lust, he wielded the power of a king in the spirit of a slave." S.

The charge against Paul is threefold: treason against the Roman power—"a mover of sedition among all the Jews throughout the world"; heresy against the law of Moses—a ringleader of the Christians; and sacrilege—a profaner of the Temple. And Tertullus closes his address with the further falsehood, that the Sanhedrim would have judged Paul lawfully, if Lysias had not interfered. To all these false charges, stated vaguely and without a single specification, the high priest and his colleagues personally assented; "saying that these things were so."

10, 11. Introduction of Paul's Defense.—Although twice before Paul had spoken what he called a defense—first before a vast crowd of Jews in the Temple area, and again before the assembled Council or Sanhedrim—yet this is his first actual defense, as he now stands before an imperial tribunal, the governor representing the person and authority of the emperor.

Receiving the usual signal according him a hearing in reply, Paul frankly expresses his readiness to answer before Felix, because of his long residence among the Jews and of his consequent familiarity with the matters now in issue before him. Not a word of flattery here, but a proper recognition of the intelligent and unprejudiced character of the tribunal before which the apostle is now really on trial. For the comparatively long period of six or seven years Felix had been in Jerusalem and Cesarea. In both places were many Christian disciples. In Cesarea many Roman soldiers, after Cornelius, had received Christianity. He knew enough of these matters to appreciate the particulars of Paul's answer, and to determine the case on its merits, as he did by not condemning Paul. His failure to acquit and release grew out of other selfish causes, as we know. And it may be added that with his opportunities of knowing the current events "among the Jews throughout the world," Felix must have heard of such "a pest and mover of sedition" as Paul's accuser alleged him to have been, if the charge had been true.

Paul notes another fact at the outset. He declares that Felix can readily ascertain that little more than a week had elapsed since the things directly complained of occurred. Including his journey to Cesarea and the five days' imprisonment there, it had been only twelve days since Paul had gone to Jerusalem to worship; and only eight or nine days since his arrest in the Temple.

12, 13. His Denial of Treason, and Challenge of his Accusers to the Proof.—In terms of unqualified denial he meets the first charge—of sedition. Worship, not the plotting of insurrection, was the object of his so recent visit to Jerusalem; and while worshipping he was found and arrested. He had not even spoken in public, much less by artful harangue sought to gather disaffected persons either in the Temple, the synagogues, or the city. This particular and emphatic denial he enforces by a challenge to his accusers, there present, to produce proof of this, their only criminal charge against him.

14-16. His Confession of the Second Charge, the So-called Heresy of Christianity; and Justification, by the Jewish Law and Prophets, of his Avowed Christian Faith, Hope, and Life.—He avows himself to be a conscientious adherent of the new, or Christian, way of believing and living. In denial of their accusation of heresy (or the introduction with schismatic spirit of a false religion—which was their meaning in using the term heresy or sect) he affirms that this was the way of their fathers. Boldly confessing his faith in Christ, he asserts the unity of the Christian belief with the old covenant and promises "written in the law and the prophets." No apostate was he from his fathers' God or faith, he assures Felix, who shared the Roman dislike to any one's abandonment of his own national modes of worship. To Jew and Roman he uses his opportunity thus implicitly to declare that Christ was the center, soul, and substance of all the truths and promises given to Israel; that Christianity was the true outcome and ultimate fulfillment of spiritual and vital Judaism. As Christ its founder had said, it did not destroy but it fulfilled all the law and the prophets.

And in confirmation of his general assertion, he adds the specific declaration that in common with many of his accusers, and with the mass of his nation, he holds steadfastly to the fathers' hope of a resurrection from death, through the promise and power of the fathers' God. To this hope he had distinctly appealed a few days before, when standing before the Council in the Temple. In accordance with this belief and hope in the resurrection (common to Jews and Christians), he further affirms his conscientious endeavor to meet every obligation to God and man. He strives as the athlete or warrior, only his struggle and warfare is within the soul. His supreme aim and constant effort was to keep his conscience from striking against stumbling-stones of accusing purpose, wrong thought, or evil deed. Not that he always or ever perfectly attained, or succeeded in this high endeavor, but he always exercises himself—habitually practices—toward attainment, ever "pressing toward the mark." B.—And if the Apostle of the Gentiles, a man great in the faith, found it necessary to maintain constantly a military watchfulness and practice, how presumptuous in any of us to count on keeping the course, and acquiring the crown, by an indolent wish to be safe, without a constant watchfulness, an energetic effort, and a more than military sternness in laying aside every weight, and the sin that doth most easily beset us! Arnot.

17-21. His Refutation of the Third Charge, of Profaning the Temple.—One chief purpose of his visit to Jerusalem he states with great simplicity, as properly introducing his denial of this charge. He came as the almoner of help, not as the fomentor of disturbance and source of injury to his nation. And it is to be noted that this incidental statement, so drawn from him, is the only allusion in the Acts to the fact that Paul had been engaged for four years in gathering collections from all the Gentile churches in aid of the poor Christian Jews of Judea. In the Epistles, especially those to the Corinthians and Romans, Paul frequently refers to this matter (Rom. 15 : 25, 26; 1 Cor. 16 : 1-4; 2 Cor. 8 : 1-4).

Repeating part of his previous assertion (in denial now of their third charge), that he had neither gathered a crowd nor stirred up tumult in the Temple, he impliedly and truthfully charges "certain Jews from Asia" with doing this very thing, and so profaning the sanctuary. These Jews, he yet further declares, found him engaged in appropriate temple worship, actually making offerings after undergoing ceremonial purification. And he makes a sharp point upon his present accusers, and a just argument in his own defense, in demanding that those Asiatic Jews, his real accusers, should meet him face to face, and sustain their accusation and assault upon him in the Temple. Since these, however, were absent, did not care or dare to appear against him, he turns with a bold challenge to the Jews present, the Sadducean members of the Council. He demands their own personal testimony upon the facts that occurred when he stood before the Sanhedrim. With a keen thrust that they could not parry, he asks if the utterance of the hated truth of the resurrection was not the only charge of evil-doing that they could bring against him.

There was no rejoinder to Paul's fearless, simple, conclusive reply. As the accusation of Tertullus was artificial and vague, flattering and false, so the defense is natural and plain, specific, complete, and manifestly sincere. And, as always, he finds his opportunity to preach Jesus and the resurrection, and to testify his own Christian faith and hope, and his Christlike love to God and man.

22, 23. By the Decision of Felix, Paul is held in Easy Confinement.—The after-statements show conclusively that Felix virtually decided the case in favor of Paul. But he wished to retain, as far as possible, the favor of the Jews. He therefore pronounced no actual decision, simply putting off the two parties upon a pretext of seeking further information from Lysias. Verses 26 and 27 disclose his real motive in declining to release Paul.

The apostle's condition, however, was not a hard one. He was simply kept in a custody that protected his threatened life, and provided for his needs; while his friends in Cesarea (including Philip and Luke), and those from abroad, had free access to him. So the word of God was not bound. Freely and abundantly did Paul preach the faith in Christ. That this was with the full knowledge and consent of Felix, we clearly infer from his sending for the apostle to "hear him concerning that faith." And this state of things continued for two years. So that we may regard Cesarea as another great working-center of Paul, to be classed with Antioch, Corinth, Ephesus, and afterward Rome.

24-26. Paul's Faithful Reasoning with Felix and Drusilla, and its Effect.—Drusilla was a daughter of Herod Agrippa I. (Acts 12 : 1, 21), and sister of Agrippa II. and Bernice (25 : 13). She left her husband, the King of Emesa, to live with Felix. The suggestion of sending for Paul, doubtless, came from her. "A Jewish princess must necessarily have been curious to hear some account of what professed to be the fulfillment of Jewish prophecy." As curious, too, she may have been to hear about this widely bruited religion of the Nazarenes.

Never did this master of skill and fitness in discourse more conclusively prove this mastery than in the bold, faithful reasoning whose main drift and conclusion is here recorded in three words. In these words, after expounding the faith in Christ (which they asked to hear about), or the scheme of redemption foreshown in the Jewish Scriptures, he sums up a suitable application to these hearers. Before him sat an unjust judge—a cruel, rapacious governor. To him he discourses about righteousness, i. e., "rightness, justness, in thought, word, and deed toward all—toward God and toward man." To a Roman libertine noble and a profligate Jewish princess he expounds the Christian gospel of purity. And upon both, self-condemned by conscience, he presses the fearful fact of a judgment to come, which each must meet. Yet this Christian apostle makes no personal charge, utters no personal denunciation. He only leaves the truth to work in the soul. Hence no anger against Paul was stirred in the breast of Felix. The fear awakened in him was wrought, not by Paul, but by the Holy Ghost through the truth. The object, as well as the cause, of his dread was the Divine Law and the Divine Judge now so vividly disclosed by the apostle. That Felix was alarmed showed that he was not past feeling, not dead to the appeal of saving truth. In his alarm we read sure evidence of the convincing power of the Holy Ghost, reproving of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment.

And in the feeble, palliative half-purpose of future response with which he appeases the sharp demands of a troubled conscience, in the postponing reply with which he turns aside the faithful appeal and dismisses the friendly appellant and preacher, we find the precise point and form of his resistance to the Holy Ghost. The terrified prison-keeper at Philippi was ready and willing for the instant saving response, "What must I do?" The alarmed governor was neither ready nor willing now. And though the convenient season came, though he often called for Paul and "communed with him," yet the same state of feeling never returned. His avarice and other lusts regained their mastery. Every salutary fear and impulse was forgotten, and all spiritual sensibility for ever crushed out. He only sought, with Paul's connivance, to gain selfish advantage by the apostle's release. B.

How has the intimidated and yet unrepentant Felix become the living and most striking type of millions! Again and again is repeated the same pretext, and with the same self-deception. There is no set purpose to harden the heart against receiving the truth; there is merely absence of determination immediately to surrender. The word of truth is not rejected, but obedience to its dictates is put off to a more convenient season: the child puts off till he shall be a youth, the youth till he shall be a man, the man till hoary-headed age; the gray-beard till he shall be stretched upon his deathbed. So innocent and natural appear many of the pleas on which men excuse themselves from compliance with the highest demands, that many a sinner shall himself stand utterly dismayed when before the judgment-bar of God the last covering of shame shall be flung aside for ever. Van. O.

27. Though convinced of Paul's innocence, Felix left him in custody, that he might induce the Jews to withhold complaints at Rome against his administration. But this unprincipled procedure

also failed; for the men he thus sought to please followed him with accusations to Cesar's judgment seat. B.—In the following year, the city of Caesarea, where Paul was thus kept a prisoner, was the scene of one of the frequent and frightful tumults between the Jews and the Syrian Greeks, A. D. 59. Felix was denounced to the emperor for either ordering or conniving at a massacre of the Jews, and he was recalled to answer for his conduct at the same time that Domitius Corbulo succeeded Ummidius Quadratus as prefect of Syria. This was two full years after the beginning of Paul's imprisonment in May, A. D. 58, and Porcius Festus, who accompanied Corbulo as procurator of Judea, would reach his destination about July, A. D. 60. S.

The apostle's captivity of five years was mainly spent in Caesarea and Rome. His whole career strikingly illustrates the method of God's Spirit in planting Christianity chiefly in the great cities. Paul's first center of Christian labor was in Antioch. For more than three years he toiled in this capital and chief city of Syria. A similar period was spent in Ephesus, the most influential center of Asia Minor. Two years he abode in Corinth, the leading city of Greece. And in the period of his captivity he labored two years in Caesarea, the political capital of Judea, and two years in Rome, the world's center. B.

Section 229.

Acts xxv. 1-27.

1 Now when Festus was come into the province, after three days he ascended from Caesarea to Jerusalem. Then the high priest and the chief of the Jews informed him against 2 Paul, and besought him, and desired favour against him, that he would send for him to 3 Jerusalem, laying wait in the way to kill him. But Festus answered, that Paul should be 4 kept at Caesarea, and that he himself would depart shortly thither. Let them therefore,
 5 said he, which among you are able, go down with me, and accuse this man, if there be any 6 wickedness in him. And when he had tarried among them more than ten days, he went 7 down unto Caesarea; and the next day sitting on the judgment seat commanded Paul to be 8 brought. And when he was come, the Jews which came down from Jerusalem stood round 9 about, and laid many and grievous complaints against Paul, which they could not prove.
 10 While he answered for himself, Neither against the law of the Jews, neither against the 11 temple, nor yet against Caesar, have I offended anything at all. But Festus, willing to do the Jews a pleasure, answered Paul, and said, Wilt thou go up to Jerusalem, and there be 10 judged of these things before me? Then said Paul, I stand at Cæsar's judgment seat, where 11 I ought to be judged: to the Jews have I done no wrong, as thou very well knowest. For if I be an offender, or have committed any thing worthy of death, I refuse not to die: but if there be none of these things whereof these accuse me, no man may deliver me unto 12 them. I appeal unto Cæsar. Then Festus, when he had conferred with the council, answered, Hast thou appealed unto Cæsar? unto Cæsar shalt thou go.

13 And after certain days king Agrippa and Bernice came unto Cæsarea to salute Festus.
 14 And when they had been there many days, Festus declared Paul's cause unto the king, say-15 ing, There is a certain man left in bonds by Felix: about whom, when I was at Jerusalem, the chief priests and the elders of the Jews informed me, desiring to have judgment against 16 him. To whom I answered, It is not the manner of the Romans to deliver any man to die, before that he which is accused have the accusers face to face, and have licence to answer 17 for himself concerning the crime laid against him. Therefore, when they were come hither, without any delay on the morrow I sat on the judgment seat, and commanded the man to 18 be brought forth. Against whom when the accusers stood up, they brought none accusa-
 19 tion of such things as I supposed: but had certain questions against him of their own super-20 stition, and of one Jesus, which was dead, whom Paul affirmed to be alive. And because I doubted of such manner of questions, I asked him whether he would go to Jerusalem, and 21 there be judged of these matters. But when Paul had appealed to be reserved unto the 22 hearing of Augustus, I commanded him to be kept till I might send him to Cæsar. Then Agrippa said unto Festus, I would also hear the man myself. To morrow, said he, thou shalt hear him.

23 And on the morrow, when Agrippa was come, and Bernice, with great pomp, and was entered into the place of hearing, with the chief captains, and principal men of the city, at 24 Festus' commandment Paul was brought forth. And Festus said, King Agrippa, and all men which are here present with us, ye see this man, about whom all the multitude of the Jews have dealt with me, both at Jerusalem, and also here, crying that he ought not to live 25 any longer. But when I found that he had committed nothing worthy of death, and that 26 he himself hath appealed to Augustus, I have determined to send him. Of whom I have no certain thing to write unto my lord. Wherefore I have brought him forth before you, and especially before thee, O king Agrippa, that, after examination had, I might have some-27 what to write. For it seemeth to me unreasonable to send a prisoner, and not withal to signify the crimes laid against him.

1-12. Paul's Arraignment before Festus, and his Appeal to the Emperor.—About midsummer of A. D. 60 Porcius Festus arrived in Cesarea, the Roman capital of the province of Judea, and assumed the procuratorship. At once he goes up to Jerusalem, the Jewish metropolis. Instantly he is besought by the high priest (Ismael, who had succeeded Ananias) and leading Jews to bring Paul to Jerusalem for a new trial. Two years had passed, yet the hatred of the Sadducaic members of the Sanhedrim remained as bitter and their purpose of assassination as determined as ever. Their malevolent feeling had originated in the vast Christian work Paul had wrought. It had been fostered and intensified by the effective use he had made of his prison liberty at Cesarea, in still further spreading the Christian truth almost before their very eyes. In all his labor, perhaps most of all in this Cesarean ministry, he had been undermining their prestige and destroying their power as leaders of the Jewish people. B.—The whole history of Paul's imprisonment, the conspiracy of the fifty Jews, with the consent of the Sanhedrim, their petition to Festus to send him from Cesarea, with an intent to murder him on the road, are facts which correspond to the character of the times, as described by Josephus, who mentions the principal persons recorded in the Acts, and paints their profligacy in colors even stronger than those of Luke. G. T.

Festus declines to send Paul up to Jerusalem, and so the murderous project is foiled and the apostle's life is saved. But he invites the Jews, by those in authority as responsible accusers, to renew their charges against the apostle before him at Cesarea. The day after his return, the parties met again before the same tribunal. The character of the "many and grievous complaints against Paul" is intimated in his answer. He had not violated Jewish law, nor profaned the Temple, nor incited sedition against the emperor. It was the trial before Felix repeated; vague and false assertion on the accusers' side, and explicit, truthful denial on Paul's part.

And the issue was the same, in that Festus was satisfied of the apostle's innocence as respected Roman law, and refused to condemn him.

But Festus, too, like Felix, "wished to do the Jews a pleasure." He therefore makes to Paul the very proposal which he himself had rejected when made to him by the Jews at Jerusalem. He asks if the apostle is willing to be tried in the Sanhedrim's presence at Jerusalem. But Paul declines, in words that sharply imply the injustice and wrong of the governor's request. He understood the situation perfectly. He knew the peril of assassination on the journey. He knew that to the cause of righteousness nothing would be gained and much would be lost by a trial in Jerusalem. He stood now at the chief seat of the Imperial power, in the capital of the Province, before the tribunal of Cesar. Here he had a right to be judged; and only the governor (as he fearlessly tells him) had a right to sit in judgment upon him. He further boldly declares that Festus well knew that he had done no wrong to the Jews. Therefore he will not even submit to trial in their presence.

Influenced by these just and self-respecting considerations, when Paul found that Festus was hindered from releasing him by the clamorous opposition of the Jews, he was constrained (as he tells the Jews of Rome, 27 : 18, 19) to appeal unto Cesar. By those few potent words he transferred the issue and its decision from the Provincial to the Imperial tribunal, from the Procurator to the Emperor. Thus also he relieved Festus, protected his own life, and insured his long-desired visit to Rome. We can not but note, in passing, the simple dignity and steadfast courage of the apostle, his conscious rectitude and dependence upon God so finely expressed in his whole spirit and answer. He is willing to die if he has done aught worthy of death. But he will not be wrongfully adjudged to death, through the hate and malice of his unchristian foes. To avert this, he promptly uses his power of peremptory appeal as a Roman citizen.

13-27. Festus, constrained to accept Paul's appeal to the emperor, was yet embarrassed by the case. He was about to send a prisoner against whom he could specify no charge. At this juncture, the king, Herod Agrippa, came with his sister Bernice to greet and congratulate the new governor. B.

Herod Agrippa II., the son of Herod Agrippa I., was at Rome when his father died. He was only seventeen years old, and Claudius made his youth a reason for not giving him his father's kingdom, as he had intended. The emperor afterward gave him the kingdom of Chalcis (A. D. 50), which was vacant by the death of his uncle Herod (A. D. 48); and this was soon exchanged for the tetrarchies of Iturea and Abilene, to which Nero added certain cities of the Decapolis about the Lake of Galilee (A. D. 52). But beyond the limits of his own dominions Agrippa was permitted to exercise throughout Judea that influence which even Paul recognized as welcome to a Jew who saw in him the last scion of the Asmonean house. He gratified his hereditary taste for magnificence by adorning Jerusalem and Berytus with costly buildings, but in such a manner as mortally to offend the Jews; and his relations to his sister Bernice (or Bernice), the widow of his uncle Herod, were of a very doubtful character. But his one leading principle was to preserve fidelity to Rome. S.

Naturally Festus spoke with his princely Jewish guests concerning the perplexing case of Paul; and as naturally Agrippa expressed a desire to hear the apostle. Such a hearing was gladly ordered by Festus, in hope of finding relief from his perplexity. Into the midst of a great assembly of the noblest Jews and Romans, with Agrippa and Bernice and Festus, Paul was led. After a brief statement of the facts by the governor, Agrippa gave Paul permission to speak for himself.

Paul, we remember, had volunteered his defense or story before the Jewish mob in the Temple area. He had asserted his pure and truthful life, and affirmed his hope of resurrection, before the whole Sanhedrim. He had made a formal defense against formal charges before Felix; and he had summarily repeated this defense against summary charges before Festus. Still another, the fifth and last, statement he makes now before the Jewish king and high Roman officials. All these addresses, and the history out of which they grew, have come to successive generations of Christian believers in every age and nation. They have helped to enlarge our estimate of the man, and to expound more fully the recorded truths of his grand Epistles. B.

Section 230.

ACTS xxvi. 1-32.

1 THEN Agrippa said unto Paul, Thou art permitted to speak for thyself. Then Paul 2 stretched forth the hand, and answered for himself: I think myself happy, king Agrippa, because I shall answer for myself this day before thee touching all the things whereof I am 3 accused of the Jews: especially because I know thee to be expert in all customs and ques-
 4 tions which are among the Jews: wherefore I beseech thee to hear me patiently. My manner of life from my youth, which was at the first among mine own nation at Jerusalem, 5 know all the Jews; which knew me from the beginning, if they would testify, that after 6 the most straitest sect of our religion I lived a Pharisee. And now I stand and am judged 7 for the hope of the promise made of God unto our fathers: unto which promise our twelve tribes, instantly serving God day and night, hope to come. For which hope's sake, 8 king Agrippa, I am accused of the Jews. Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you, that God should raise the dead?
 9 I verily thought with myself, that I ought to do many things contrary to the name of 10 Jesus of Nazareth. Which thing I also did in Jerusalem: and many of the saints did I shut up in prison, having received authority from the chief priests; and when they were put 11 to death, I gave my voice against them. And I punished them oft in every synagogue, and compelled them to blaspheme; and being exceedingly mad against them, I persecuted 12 them even unto strange cities. Whereupon as I went to Damascus with authority and com-13 mission from the chief priests, at midday, O king, I saw in the way a light from heaven, above the brightness of the sun, shining round about me and them which journeyed with 14 me. And when we were all fallen to the earth, I heard a voice speaking unto me, and saying in the Hebrew tongue, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? it is hard for thee to kick 15 against the pricks. And I said, Who art thou, Lord? And he said, I am Jesus whom thou 16 persecutest. But rise, and stand upon thy feet: for I have appeared unto thee for this purpose, to make thee a minister and a witness both of these things which thou hast seen, and 17 of those things in the which I will appear unto thee; delivering thee from the people, and 18 from the Gentiles, unto whom now I send thee, to open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God, that they may receive forgiveness 19 of sins, and inheritance among them which are sanctified by faith that is in me. Where-20 upon, O king Agrippa, I was not disobedient unto the heavenly vision: but shewed first unto them of Damascus, and at Jerusalem, and throughout all the coasts of Judæa, and then to the Gentiles, that they should repent and turn to God, and do works meet for repentance.
 21 For these causes the Jews caught me in the temple, and went about to kill me.
 22 Having therefore obtained help of God, I continue unto this day, witnessing both to small and great, saying none other things than those which the prophets and Moses did say should 23 come: that Christ should suffer, and that he should be the first that should rise from the 24 dead, and should shew light unto the people, and to the Gentiles. And as he thus spake for himself, Festus said with a loud voice. Paul, thou art beside thyself; much learning doth 25 make thee mad. But he said, I am not mad, most noble Festus; but speak forth the words 26 of truth and soberness. For the king knoweth of these things, before whom also I speak freely: for I am persuaded that none of these things are hid^{den} from him; for this thing 27 was not done in a corner. King Agrippa, believest thou the prophets? I know that thou 28 believest. Then Agrippa said unto Paul, Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian.
 29 And Paul said, I would to God, that not only thou, but also all that hear me this day, were both almost, and altogether such as I am, except these bonds.
 30 And when he had thus spoken, the king rose up, and the governor, and Bernice, and 31 they that sat with them: and when they were gone aside, they talked between themselves, 32 saying, This man doeth nothing worthy of death or of bonds. Then said Agrippa unto Fes-
 tus, This man might have been set at liberty, if he had not appealed unto Cæsar.

Both almost, and altogether.—What matters it to the skillful seaman, that with helm in hand, and eye continually upon sea and sky, he has carried his well-trimmed bark over many a league of ocean, and filled her with the treasures of other lands, and steered her through many a rocky channel, and carried her through many a furious gale, if, just as the haven is in sight, the tempest takes her and whelms her in the deep? And what matters it if we be almost, if we be not altogether, Christians? Hanna.—It is he that holdeth out to the end that must be saved; it is he that overcometh that shall inherit all things; it is not every one that begins. Agrippa took a fair step for a sudden. "Almost," saith he to Paul, "thou persuadest me to be a Christian." Ah, it was but almost; and so he had as good have never been a whil; he stepped fair indeed, but yet he stepped short. O this almost! I tell you, this lost his soul Bunyan.

1-5. After expressing his satisfaction in stating to the king Agrippa the matters in issue between the accusing Jews and himself, Paul proceeds to vindicate his consistency as a true spiritual Israelite, while he explains and justifies his mission as the apostle to the Gentiles. What he was known to be as a Pharisee, when and how he was converted and commissioned by Christ, and how he had fulfilled his mission in accordance with the teachings of Moses and the prophets: these comprise the leading points in this instructive address.

6-8. Paul asserts the Chief Ground of the Jews' Accusation to be his Preaching of the Messiahship and the Resurrection of Christ. His Appeal to Agrippa.—This hope of a Messiah he declares to be based upon the promise of God to the Patriarchs and Leaders of Israel. They had not received the fulfillment; hence a future life was essential if God's word to them was true. And the true Israel, even all that remained of the twelve tribes, following the faith and hope of the earlier generations, were still looking for the fulfillment of the promise. He had found the Messiah in Jesus of Nazareth; and the proof of his Messiahship he saw in the resurrection of Christ from the dead. And, knowing the Sadducean tendencies of Agrippa, he turns upon him with the pointed argumentative question, Do you think a resurrection incredible, knowing all that God has done in Israel, knowing, too, God's promise of a deliverer, who should be a conqueror of death?

9-11. His Prejudices had been Bitter and his Hostility Virulent toward Christ and his Disciples.—Taking up the account of himself from verse 5, he narrates how with a conscientious enmity he had persecuted and imprisoned those he now knew to be saints, as he himself was now persecuted and imprisoned. "I gave my voice, or vote, against them." Whether this word is to be taken literally, implying his act as a member of the Sanhedrim, or figuratively (as it may be), signifying only a moral assent to proceedings in the synagogues, can not be decisively determined. A strong objection to the former and favorite view is that it is wholly unsupported by other evidence, especially by other words of his own. And the fact, if it was a fact, of his membership of the great Jewish Council would have sharpened many an argument, and strongly enforced all that he says of himself in Phil. 3 and elsewhere.

12-18. Paul's Second Statement of his Conver- sion and Commission by Christ.—The first had been given to the Jews from the Temple stairs (ch. 22). (Compare both statements with Luke's account, ch. 9.) Paul has spoken of his own mad hostility to the name and to the saints of Christ. How this hate was changed to love, and this hostility to supreme devotion, he proceeds to tell. B.

The apostle knew so well the fruit which the world would gather from his conversion, that he employs it as a favorite argument in his preaching. Of the five discourses by him, which have been preserved to us in the Acts, two derive their subject from this event, not to speak of the repeated allusions which he makes to it in his Epistles. After the resurrection of Jesus Christ, and the descent of the Holy Spirit, the gospel history has no evidence equaling the conversion of Saul of Tarsus. Movod.—Nowhere throughout the Sacred Annals is the power of divine grace over the sinful heart so fully shown as in his sudden change from a self-righteous, fanatical persecutor of Jesus and Christians, to a humble, self-sacrificing servant of Christ and his Church; nor is it easy to see how an honest inquirer can resist a fact so confirmatory of the gospel as the open advocacy of its faith by the most logical, accomplished, and determined spirit that ever battled on the side of its enemies. Bethune.

His appointment to preach and what he was instructed to preach to the Gentiles, are the main points in this address, the last and most complete made by the apostle. The sublime themes of his testimony and the grand results of his ministry he sums up in these four realities of spiritual experience: 1. Divine enlightenment—a vision of God and knowledge of the truth he has disclosed. 2. A turning or conversion, and so a deliverance, from the kingdom of darkness and the enslaving power of its Prince into the kingdom of light and of God. "Darkness and light are common figures of the New Testament, not only for ignorance and knowledge of spiritual things, but for the states of which these are necessary incidents, a state of sin and one of holiness." (J. A. A.) 3. Forgiveness of sins. 4. An abiding inheritance with the saints in glory. Of this pardon and inheritance Dr. Arnot says: "The gift, like the work, is twofold: it removes from a believer what he deserves, and bestows upon him the deserts of his Redeemer. The birthright of condemnation is taken away, and the birthright of sons is conferred. Christ has taken your portion, and you obtain his. The pardon and the inheritance go together." Of all these spiritual effects and experiences, Christ declares to Paul, there is one condition essential for every soul's reception. It is FAITH IN ME—trust, not in human works or offerings, not in creeds, in ceremonials, or in descent, but in Christ alone! B.

The germ of all Paul's epistles, the key-note to which all his writings are but the melody that follows, the mighty voice of which all his teaching is but the prolonged echo, we find in these words: "To open their eyes, to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God; that they may receive forgiveness of sins, and inheritance among them that are sanctified by faith that is in Me." What of Paul's gospel is not here? Man's ruin, man's depravity, the state of darkness, the power of Satan, the sole redemptive work of Christ, justification by belief in that, sanctification coming with justification, and glory, rest, and heaven at last—there they all are in the very first words that sounded upon the quickened ear of the blinded man when he turned from darkness to light. A. M.

19, 20. He affirms his Instant Obedience and his Steadfast Fidelity to the Heavenly Call of Christ.—This is one of the grand points of instruction and personal application in Paul's whole career. He began on the instant, where he was, to obey. He sought on the instant and ever afterward (for now twenty-four years) to know and to do the Lord's will. Day by day had he gone on as directed. He had sought to win men back to God, to reveal Christ and His complete work for man's redemption, that they might trust, repent, and return to God; that, with a divinely renewed heart and reversed life, they might do works meet for repentance. 21-23. He goes on to say that, for this work of seeking to obey God and save men, the Jews had sought to kill him in the Temple. But God had been his deliverer, so that his ministry had been continued until now. And he adds the supreme fact that all he taught was in exact agreement with Moses and the prophets. This fact utterly overthrew all the charges of his accusers, and convicted them of rejecting the law and the prophets, which was the crime alleged against himself. For the Jewish Scriptures disclosed a suffering Messiah, who should rise from the dead, and who should bring a bright and glad redemption to the Gentiles. B.—That Christ should suffer, should rise from the dead, and should show light unto the Gentiles: these are the three chief points in the writings of the prophets; and precisely these three were most of all unwelcome to the Jews. The first gave them offense, the second was denied by them, and the third awakened their envy. Starke.—There was never any that understood the Old Testament so well as Paul, except John the Baptist and John the Divine. He dearly loved Moses and Isaiah, for they, together with King David, were the chief prophets. The words and things of Paul are taken out of Moses and the prophets. Luther.—These truths which Paul had preached, his accusers had disallowed and willfully rejected; and in justifying himself so fervently and conclusively, he preaches a living, burning gospel of Christ to Festus and Agrippa, and to the brilliant court in which they were central and sovereign.

24-26. The Excited Exclamation of Festus, and Paul's Calm Reply.—To the Roman governor, deeply stirred by Paul's impassioned utterance, the apostle's words yet conveyed no meaning. B.—What Paul had said of a resurrection from the dead accomplished in Jesus as the first fruits, of a person coming from the Jews who should enlighten not only his own people but even the Gentiles, among the rest the polite and learned Greeks and Romans, and of the manner in which this was revealed to him—all this would lead such a half-thinker and pagan as Festus to conclude roundly that Paul was a visionary enthusiast. D.—"Much learning," or "many writings," had turned his brain, the idea being suggested by Paul's many allusions to Moses and the prophets.

But Paul, "taught from the fullness of a heart which divine grace had convinced and blessed that Christianity is no fable and that faith is not madness," replies with quiet Christian courtesy: "Not frenzied or mad, most noble Festus, but I speak of things that are real, and with perfect soundness of reason!" And instantly he refers for confirmation of his words to Agrippa, as one to whom the main facts of Christianity (of which he had spoken) were well known. B.

This thing was not done in a corner. The existence at this time of one called by his followers Christ, the place of his teaching, his execution by Pontius Pilate, Procurator of Judea under Tiberius, the rapid spread of his doctrine through the Roman world, the vast number of converts made in a short time, the persecutions which they underwent, the innocence of their lives, their worship of Christ as God—are witnessed to by heathen writers of eminence, and would be certain and indisputable facts had the New Testament never been written. Tacitus, Suetonius, Juvenal, Pliny, Trajan, Adrian, writing in the century immediately following upon the death of Christ, declare these things to us, and establish, so firmly that no skeptic can even profess to doubt it, the historical character of at least that primary groundwork whereon the Christian story, as related by the evangelists, rests as on an immovable basis. These classic notices compel even those who set no value on the historical Christ to admit his existence; they give a definite standing-point to the religion, which might otherwise have been declared to have no historical foundation at all, but to be purely and absolutely mythic; they furnish, taken by themselves, no unimportant argument for the truth of the religion, which they prove to have been propagated with such zeal, by persons of pure and holy lives, in spite of punishments and persecutions of the most fearful kind; and they form, in combination with the argument from the historic accuracy of the incidental allusions, an evidence in favor of the substantial truth of the New Testament narrative which is amply sufficient to satisfy any fair mind. G. R.

"Few persons, perhaps," says Isaac Taylor, "give due attention to the relative position of the Christian history, which stands upon the very point of intersection where three distinct lines of history meet, namely, the Jewish, the Grecian, and the Roman. These three bodies of ancient literature alone have descended by an uninterrupted channel of transmission to modern times; and these three, by a most extraordinary combination of circumstances, were brought together to elucidate the origination of Christianity. If upon the broad field of history there rests the common light of day, upon that spot where a new religion was given to man, there shines the intensity of a concentrated brightness." The Jews had their own literature; they had been formerly conquered by the Greeks, and the Greek language was in common use; they were also a Roman province, and "during more than a century, in the center of which stands the ministry of Christ, the affairs of Syria attracted the peculiar attention of the Roman Government. No other people of antiquity can be named upon whose history and sentiments there falls this triple flood of historic light, and upon no period in the history of this one people do these triple rays so precisely meet as upon the moment when the voice of one was heard in the wilderness of Jordan, saying, 'Prepare ye the way of the Lord.'" Well, then, might an apostle say, "These things were not done in a corner." It was in Jerusalem that Christ arose; in Asia Minor—the theatre of history from the first. It was, perhaps, the only place on earth in which a Roman governor would have called the three languages which contain the literature of ancient civilization into requisition, to proclaim at once the accusation and the true character of Christ. M. II.

27, 28. Paul's Appeal to Agrippa, Agrippa's Reply, and Paul's Rejoinder.—To the Roman Festus Paul's words had no meaning. But to the Jew Agrippa, familiar with the writings of the prophets, and to the grandnephew of Herod Antipas, familiar with the facts of a living, crucified, and risen Jesus of Nazareth, Paul has been powerfully preaching Christianity (while defending it) by exhibiting its unity with the Mosaic covenant and Prophetic promises. In here giving his preaching a personal turn (not offensively, for he compliments Agrippa's intelligence and judgment), he takes high ground as becomes the ambassador of Jehovah, and uses a lofty tone of utterance. We must infer that something he saw in Agrippa's expression, some manifestation of feeling (not certainly scorn or contempt), led the apostle to make this sudden appeal to the Jewish king, and so instantly and impressively himself to answer his own appeal.

King and Jew as he was, in face of the disparaging charge of madness by Festus, Agrippa had so felt in his inmost soul the power of the truth, and of Paul's own mighty force of conviction, that his remarkable confession was forced almost unconsciously from his lips. His reply seems to be a parry, and to show that he had felt a thrust. About the meaning of this reply, as well as the spirit that actuated it, there is a difference of judgment among scholarly interpreters. The two words rendered almost are literally in small. The words rendered altogether in verse 29 are literally in great. The noun to be supplied may be either time, effort, degree, or measure. That Agrippa refers to the little time or effort used by Paul in this brief address, as insufficient to make of him a Christian, and that he speaks ironically or even indifferently (an interpretation favored by many modern commentators), seems to be out of keeping with all that precedes and follows. It accords neither with the subsequent course of Agrippa nor with the previous words of Paul; and still less with the serious, sympathetic, and fervent tone of Paul's instant rejoinder. Agrippa's sudden breaking up of the conference after Paul's manly, touching expression of good will, surely intimates something other than a jesting or indifferent state of mind. And his serious, almost regretful words to Festus about Paul's liberty that immediately followed, with their implied tone of sympathy with the apostle, can scarcely consist with an ironical or heedless spirit; so that we must still hold to the older and the widely accepted interpretation, which takes the words of Agrippa as spoken in earnest, and under some slightly aroused feeling. "In some small degree or measure ('almost' being too strong) thou persuadest me!"

And with this interpretation admirably agrees Paul's large-hearted response. The picture is one of rare beauty and sublimity, as the words finely illustrate the spirit and epitomize the substance of his gospel. A prisoner, whose Christlike spirit and whose burning words had fascinated their attention, stands in the attitude of blessing while he prays: Not in small but in great degree would I have you and all who hear me to know and rejoice as I know and rejoice in Christ and the Christian life. And, holding up his chained hands, he adds to his prayer for them, "except only these bonds."

In this noble close to his crowning defense, the absoluteness of his faith and the strength and breadth of his unselfish, yearning benevolence stand out with wonderful distinctness. "King," he says, "or high noble and ruler, as you are, there is for you a higher crown and a more enduring kingdom that I would to God you might share." A Christian Agrippa knew Paul to be. What a Christian was Paul had already described in the inward and spiritual experiences referred to in his great commission from Christ. These experiences were not the result of outward relations, of ordinances, ceremonials, or of church connections. They consisted in an understanding opened to and illumined by the truth, a heart touched and broken, and a will made submissive by the Spirit of Christ. In other words, a Christian was one who knew, who trusted in, obeyed, and rested on Christ; whose ruling thought and affection and whose constraining principle of life was Christ's love to him.

Such a one was not Agrippa. However strongly moved, as Felix had been, like Felix he deliberately rose up, turned away his thought, and went back to his selfish, dissolute life. He might have been fully persuaded had he yielded to the divine influences so mightily proceeding from Paul's heart and lips. But he grieved away the Spirit, remained "joined to his idols," and God "let him alone"! Retaining his nominal and idle faith in the prophets, this last Prince of the Herods lived a self-seeking, useless life, in dependence upon Roman favor, long after his nation had been destroyed by Roman arms. Yet, like all the marked personages whose careers are referred to in the Sacred Record, this man, by this single utterance, in connection with what preceded and followed, remains to point an instructive and warning lesson. B.

Verily, we need not long remain in uncertainty who at that moment was the greatest in the palace! And all the spiritual greatness of Paul is the work of the Holy Ghost, who has entirely renewed him, and has exalted him above the moral littleness around him, nay, even above himself; so that here, in the fullest sense of the words, even when he returned to his lonely dungeon, he left the field as conqueror. Van O.

Section 231.

Acts xxvii. 1-26.

1 AND when it was determined that we should sail into Italy, they delivered Paul and 2 certain other prisoners unto one named Julius, a centurion of Augustus' band. And entering into a ship of Adramyttium, we launched, meaning to sail by the coasts of Asia; one Aris-3 tarchus, a Macedonian of Thessalonica, being with us. And the next day we touched at Sidon. And Julius courteously entreated Paul, and gave him liberty to go unto his friends 4 to refresh himself. And when we had launched from thence, we sailed under Cyprus, be-5 cause the winds were contrary. And when we had sailed over the sea of Cilicia and Pamphylia, we came to Myra, a city of Lycia.
 6 And there the centurion found a ship of Alexandria sailing into Italy; and he put us
 7 therein. And when we had sailed slowly many days, and scarce were come over against 8 Cnidus, the wind not suffering us, we sailed under Crete, over against Salmone; and, hardly passing it, came unto a place which is called The fair havens; nigh whereunto was 9 the city of Lasea. Now when much time was spent, and when sailing was now dangerous, 10 because the fast was now already past, Paul admonished them, and said unto them, Sirs, I perceive that this voyage will be with hurt and much damage, not only of the lading and 11 ship, but also of our lives. Nevertheless the centurion believed the master and the owner 12 of the ship, more than those things which were spoken by Paul. And because the haven was not commodious to winter in, the more part advised to depart thence also, if by any means they might attain to Phenice, and there to winter; which is an haven of Crete, and 13 lieth toward the south west and north west. And when the south wind blew softly, supposing that they had obtained their purpose, loosing thence, they sailed close by Crete.
 14 But not long after there arose against it a tempestuous wind, called Euroclydon. And 15 when the ship was caught, and could not bear up into the wind, we let her drive.
 16 And running under a certain island which is called Claudia, we had much work to come

17 by the boat : which when they had taken up, they used helps, undergirding the ship ; and, 18 fearing lest they should fall into the quicksands, strake sail, and so were driven. And we 19 being exceedingly tossed with a tempest, the next day they lightened the ship ; and the 20 third day we cast out with our own hands the tackling of the ship. And when neither sun nor stars in many days appeared, and no small tempest lay on us, all hope that we should be saved was then taken away.

21 But after long abstinence Paul stood forth in the midst of them, and said, Sirs, ye should have hearkened unto me, and not have loosed from Crete, and to have gained this harm 22 and loss. And now I exhort you to be of good cheer : for there shall be no loss of any 23 man's life among you, but of the ship. For there stood by me this night the angel of God, 24 whose I am, and whom I serve, saying, Fear not, Paul ; thou must be brought before 25 Cæsar : and, lo, God hath given thee all them that sail with thee. Wherefore, sirs, be of 26 good cheer : for I believe God, that it shall be even as it was told me. Howbeit we must be cast upon a certain island.

PAUL had been declared by Festus innocent of crime under Roman law ; and by Agrippa alike innocent of offense against Jewish law. But his appeal had been made and could not be recalled. He must be sent to Rome, as God had purposed and promised. The voyage thither (recounted in this chapter) is one of great interest in itself, as well as on account of its chief result—the carrying of the Christian Gospel to the world's central capital, from whence it was destined to go forth in the fullness of time with its fullness of blessing to humankind.

The details of this entire voyage, especially its nautical and topographical points, have been thoroughly elucidated in a volume by an educated English gentleman—James Smith, of Jordanhill (London, 1848 and 1856). With the single purpose of exhaustively investigating and interpreting Luke's narrative, he mastered all accessible information bearing upon the ship-building and navigation of the ancients ; consulted experienced seamen and modern log-books, as well as ancient statements and accounts of voyages, respecting the actual navigation of the sea-route taken by Paul's vessel ; and, during a winter's residence in Malta, carefully examined the various localities of that island. In the judgment of Biblical scholars, he has shown that while the writer of this chapter could not have been a seaman, since his language is not technical or professional, yet he must have been an eye-witness of the facts he has recorded, because of his accuracy and consistency in all the parts of his description. According to the same judgment, Mr. Smith has explained many previously obscure points, and contributed new and invaluable evidence in support of the historic truth and the credibility of this Book of the Acts.

The arts and instruments of modern navigation were unknown to the ancients. They had neither chronometer nor compass, sextant nor chart. The place of the sun by day, and of the known stars by night, gave them general lines of direction when out of sight of coast lines. As compared also with modern construction, the ships were rude and frailly fastened. They were built with high, sharp stern as well as prow ; generally with one great mast near the stern. Their square sails enabled them to sail rapidly before the wind ; while against it they could make but feeble headway. For rudders they used two broad-bladed oars, projecting from either side at a little distance from the sharp stern. The "rudder bands" were ropes attached to these oar rudders, by which they could be lifted from the water and fastened to the vessel's side. B.

1. Festus can be proved, almost with certainty, to have succeeded Felix as procurator of Judea in A. D. 60—in the autumn of which year, therefore, Paul was sent as a prisoner from Cæsarea to Rome. From the latter date we can safely reckon back, through his two years' imprisonment at Cæsarea, to the Pentecost of A. D. 58, as the date of his last arrival at Jerusalem. S.

Luke here relates that, "when Paul was sent from Cesarea to Rome, he was with the other prisoners committed to the care of Julius, an officer of the Augustan cohort," that is, a Roman cohort, which had the honor of bearing the name of the emperor. Now it appears from Josephus that when Felix was procurator of Judea, the Roman garrison at Cesarea was chiefly composed of soldiers who were natives of Syria. But it also appears that a small body of Roman soldiers was stationed there at the same time, and that this body of Roman soldiers was dignified with the title of Augustan, the same Greek word being employed by Josephus as by the author of the Acts of the Apostles. And when Festus, who succeeded Felix, had occasion to send prisoners from Cesarea to Rome, he would of course intrust them to the care of an officer belonging to this select corps. That this select body of soldiers bore the title of Augustan, was known of course to Luke. But that, in the time of the Emperor Nero, the garrison of Cesarea, which consisted chiefly of Syrian soldiers, contained also a small body of Roman soldiers, and that they were dignified by the epithet Augustan, are circumstances so minute, that no impostor of a later age would have known them. And they prove incontestably that the Acts of the Apostles could have been written only by a person in the situation of Luke. G. T.

2. (For this voyage, see small maps on pp. 61, 94, and the large map opposite title-page.) The Roman Empire had no packet service, nor were ships of war usually employed for the transport of prisoners from the provinces to Rome. But for such a purpose, as well as for ordinary passengers, ample opportunities were furnished by the great lines of commercial traffic over the seas. There were the main lines, of which the most important in the East was that of the vessels that carried the corn of Egypt from Alexandria to Italy, and particularly to the port of Puteoli; and it was in two such ships that Paul made the chief portions of his voyage. Then there was the coasting trade, which (in the Levant) was chiefly conducted by the Greeks of Asia Minor, of whose vessels we have already seen Paul making use. It was in such a ship, belonging to Adramyttium (a seaport of the province of Asia, in the district called Mysia), that he now set sail, with other prisoners, under the care of Julius, a centurion, whose conduct in the sequel entitles him to a place among the military worthies of the New Testament. The number of the prisoners appears to have been considerable. But Paul was cheered by the society of "the beloved physician," and of the Thessalonian Aristarchus, his constant fellow-traveler, who had accompanied him from Macedonia, and now became his fellow-prisoner at Rome. That the voyage was commenced about the end of summer, in order to reach Italy before winter, is evident from the subsequent mention of the Great Fast. S.

3-5. From Cesarea to Myra in Lycia.—The route lay northward along the Phœnician coast to Sidon, thence under the lee, that is (the wind being south), on the northward side of Cyprus, over the sea adjacent to Cilicia and Pamphylia. At Sidon, where the vessel touched for purposes of trade, Paul was permitted to visit Christian friends. This courteous treatment, followed by like consideration and respect throughout the voyage, shows the strongly favorable impression made by Paul upon Julius, as previously upon Festus, Agrippa, Felix, Lysias, and the Asiarchs of Ephesus.

6. "At the port of Myra in Lycia, they fell into the great line of the Egyptian corn-trade, and found a corn-ship of Alexandria bound for Italy; to this vessel Julius transferred his prisoners." That this ship was large, with a tonnage of five hundred to a thousand tons, we infer from the number of persons (276) added to her freight; and also from "the known fact that the Egyptian merchantmen were among the largest in the Mediterranean." We note the intimation of Luke's presence (we) for the first time since Paul's arrival at Jerusalem. With himself he doubtless includes Aristarchus.

7-13. From Myra to Crete.—Sailing very slowly westward, after many days they reached Cnidus, a city at the southwest extremity of Asia Minor, on the point of the long, narrow peninsula (now called Cape Crio) where the coast line turns northward. Thence standing out to sea, the wind compelled their course toward the eastern end of the island of Crete. Doubling the promontory of Salmone, upon the eastern extremity, they moved westward under the southern side of the isle, as far as a place of anchorage (still) called the Fair Havens. Here, compelled to await fair winds, the navigation having now become "dangerous," Paul interposes the first of his warnings in terms which imply that he spoke under divine guidance, as well as with much former experience of "perils in the sea." His counsel was that they should winter in the comparatively safe harbor where they were. But the master and others in charge of the ship, in concert with the centurion, decided to set sail, and endeavor to make the better harbor of Phenice, farther westward and northward upon the island. They were fully agreed with Paul that the favorable season for sailing had passed, and that the voyage to Italy ought not to be continued. But they would not let well alone, and wished to make both safety and comfort doubly sure. They thought the short sail of forty miles might be accomplished without peril. But the event proved their mistake. On a summer-like day, "when the south wind blew softly, supposing that they had obtained their purpose," that is, thinking that they could safely and swiftly reach the harbor of Phenice, about the 18th of October they sailed out from the Fair Havens westward along the southern shore of Crete.

14-17. Caught suddenly by a Typhonic Wind from the Northeast, they are driven under the Lee of the Island Clauda.—Only five miles west of the Fair Havens the southern coast line of Crete turns sharply (in a right angle), receding directly northward at a point now called Cape Matala. This point had scarcely been turned, and their direction changed for Phenice (distant thirty-five miles north-west through an open sea), when the soft south wind was suddenly succeeded by a northeaster, "sweeping down the gullies of Mount Ida with all the fury of a typhoon. The sailors, accustomed to those seas, recognized their dreaded enemy by its well-known name Euroclydon."

Unable (according to Luke's graphic account) to face or eye the wind (possibly a reference to the painted eye upon the vessel's prow, for adornment and symbol), they were compelled to scud southwestward before the gale. So they were driven twenty-three miles through the open sea to the small island Clauda. Running under the lee of this island, they took advantage of the slight shelter and smooth water, first, to lift their boat (towing at the stern) out of the sea; next, to undergird the ship; and last, to lower the gear.

The undergirding (now called frapping in the English navy) consisted in passing rope or chain cables under the keel at right angles with and over the gunwales, "and then drawing them tight by means of pulleys and levers." These "helps" were always part of the ordinary equipment of ancient vessels. They served to brace the entire framework of hull and decks, and to counteract the strain caused by the single mast with its large square sail. "This precaution," says Admiral Penrose, "was taken, not only because the ship might strain her planks and timbers and become leaky, but from the fears that, if the gale continued from the northeast, they might be driven into the deep bight on the coast of Africa, where were the greater and lesser Syrtis so much dreaded by the ancients, and by these means of security be enabled to keep together longer, should they be involved in the quicksands." (See large map opposite title-page.)

And for both reasons, too, but especially the latter—"lest they should fall into the quicksands"—they lowered the gear. Had the ship continued to run before the wind, she would have been driven directly into the Syrtis bay of quicksand. To avert this, they lowered the heavy main yard and sail with all the weighty masthead gear, and set in its place a small storm-sail. This was so adjusted as to bring the vessel's head as near to the wind as possible and to prevent her from falling off into the trough of the sea. The nautical term which describes this arrangement is lying to. It is the common method of weathering out a gale. B.

18-20. Tossed in the Tempest, they lighten the Ship, and for Eleven Days hopelessly await the Issue.—Lying to under a storm-sail, with her starboard (or right) side to the wind, would keep her head well off the African coast, and cause her to drift a little to the north of west at the rate of about a mile and a half an hour, or thirty-six miles a day. S.—“It can be shown that this position would give her a drift motion precisely in the direction of Malta, the place on which she ultimately struck.” As in the ship of Jonah (1 : 5) so here, they first lightened the ship in part, and the next day with the passengers' help “cast out the gear that had already been sent down on deck.” B.

Then followed “many days” of continued hardship and anxiety. No one who has never been in a leaking ship in a continued gale can know what is suffered under such circumstances. The strain both of mind and body—the incessant demand for the labor of all the crew—the terror of all the passengers—the hopeless working at the pumps—the laboring of the ship's frame and cordage—the driving of the storm—the benumbing effect of the cold and wet—make up a scene of no ordinary confusion, anxiety, and fatigue. To this despair was added a further suffering from want of food, in consequence of the injury done to the provisions, and the impossibility of preparing any regular meal. Hence we see the force of the phrase which alludes to what a casual reader might suppose an unimportant part of the suffering, that there was much abstinence. H.

21-26. Paul's Cheering Assurance of Ultimate Deliverance.—“Under that dark sky, and in that hopelessly drifting ship, there appeared the light of joy and life; for it held no Jonah fleeing from duty, but a Paul bound in spirit to testify for God also at Rome.” Timed indeed to the need of these three hundred souls were his hopeful, encouraging words. But first he reminds them of their error in disregarding his counsel at the Fair Havens. This he does, not to reproach them, much less to vaunt his own superior wisdom, but to give them a basis of confidence in his present comforting assurances. “Had my words in Crete been heeded,” he said, “ye would have been spared this injury and loss. But now, even in this crowning hour of your utter exhaustion and hopelessness, I bid you be of good cheer; for no man among you shall perish!”

And then he announces to them the vision vouchsafed to him in the night: how, as so oft before in his own crises of need, the angel of that God whose he was and whom he served had stood by him, and promised him a gift of the life of all that sailed with him. Under these circumstances of helpless, hopeless peril, how strangely solemn the utterance of such words by a seemingly obscure, frail man! With what intensity of marvel must they have heard his simple assertion of a divine vision and of a pledge so adequate for hope and cheer even in this awful emergency! His God had recognized his need and would interpose for his deliverance. And not for his rescue only, but for his sake in a strangeness of mercy would deliver all who sailed with him—would bring them all safely through the billows now gaping wide for their destruction. And their faith and hope in these strong, bright words of promise were reënfined by Paul's own grand confession of trust in the God whose merciful purpose he had just announced to them. How must the souls of even those godless men—Roman soldiers, Egyptian sailors, Jewish, Greek, and Oriental passengers—then have been moved by such steadfast, invincible assurance so calmly expressed, in tones that rang clear above the tempest roar!

That they will be saved by his God is not Paul's mere opinion. There is a must be here, as in the 24th verse. And the must, in both cases, expresses nothing less or other than God's purpose, which Paul knows will be surely fulfilled. But like all prophetic vision and announcement, this of Paul is only partial; it reveals no detail of the approaching events. He assures them of all that he knows. Not when, where, or how, but simply that all shall be saved, at some unknown time, upon a certain unknown island. Only the ship will be lost. Therefore be cheerful and trust the God whom I serve—the true God! So this brave, large-hearted man of God, who by fervent intercession brought blessing upon those associated with him, impressed their hearts with the sublime lesson of faith in God, of dependence upon his purpose and reliance upon his promise, even in respect of that which was most improbable. B.

Section 232.

Acts xxvii. 27-44.

27 But when the fourteenth night was come, as we were driven up and down in Adria, 28 about midnight the shipmen deemed that they drew near to some country; and sounded, and found it twenty fathoms: and when they had gone a little further, they sounded again, 29 and found it fifteen fathoms. Then fearing lest we should have fallen upon rocks, they cast 30 four anchors out of the stern, and wished for the day. And as the shipmen were about to flee out of the ship, when they had let down the boat into the sea, under colour as though 31 they would have cast anchors out of the foreship, Paul said to the centurion and to the 32 soldiers, Except these abide in the ship, ye cannot be saved. Then the soldiers cut off the ropes of the boat, and let her fall off.

33 And while the day was coming on, Paul besought them all to take meat, saying, This day is the fourteenth day that ye have tarried and continued fasting, having taken nothing.
34 Wherefore I pray you to take some meat: for this is for your health: for there shall not an 35 hair fall from the head of any of you. And when he had thus spoken, he took bread, and gave thanks to God in presence of them all: and when he had broken it, he began to eat.
36 Then were they all of good cheer, and they also took some meat. And we were in all in 37 the ship two hundred threescore and sixteen souls. And when they had eaten enough, 38 they lightened the ship, and cast out the wheat into the sea.

39 And when it was day, they knew not the land: but they discovered a certain creek with a 40 shore, into the which they were minded, if it were possible, to thrust in the ship. And when they had taken up the anchors, they committed themselves unto the sea, and loosed 41 the rudder bands, and hoised up the mainsail to the wind, and made toward shore. And falling into a place where two seas met, they ran the ship aground; and the forepart stuck fast, and remained unmoveable, but the hinder part was broken with the violence of the 42 waves. And the soldiers' counsel was to kill the prisoners, lest any of them should swim 43 out, and escape. But the centurion, willing to save Paul, kept them from their purpose; and commanded that they which could swim should cast themselves first into the sea, and 44 get to land: and the rest, some on boards, and some on broken pieces of the ship. And so it came to pass, that they escaped all safe to land.

27-32. How the Chief Part of the Fourteenth and Last Night was spent.—For a fortnight the vessel had been storm-stricken, and had steadily drifted westward through the sea of Adria. [Not the Adriatic Gulf, but that part of the Mediterranean lying between Greece and Sicily, which in ancient times was called the Adriatic Sea.] B.

A gale of such duration is by no means unprecedented in that part of the Mediterranean, especially toward winter. A naval officer writes thus: "In October, 1839, I left Malta in a powerful steam-frigate, and encountered Euroclydon (or, as we call it, a Levanter) in full force. We were four days without being able to sit down at table to a meal, during which time we saw 'neither sun nor stars.' Being charged with dispatches, we forced the vessel through, though with much injury. Had we been a mere log on the water, like Paul's ship, we should have drifted 'many days.'" H.

At midnight the sailors inferred that some land was nearing them. (This expression accords with their notion that the ship was the chief thing.) They distinguished the peculiar sound made by the breaking of the sea against and over hidden rock-reefs. The upper coast line of the eastern portion of Malta (as far as Koura Point, the eastern limit of St. Paul's Bay) runs in the same general direction as the supposed course of the drifting ship; so that they would hear the breakers for a considerable distance, yet would not strike upon them. More than this, actual measurements taken upon the supposed line of drift correspond precisely with the soundings here recorded by Luke.

But at length the fear of striking upon hidden rocks led them to take in the storm-sail and oar-rudders, and to cast out anchors from the stern. B. —Ships of any size had several anchors; here we have four. The most powerful anchor, the "last hope," was called the sacred; and we may well suppose that the remembrance of the night when his ship rode out the storm in the Maltese bay, with her straining cables passed out into the darkness, suggested the image of the Christian's sole but certain hope, "which we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and stedfast, and which entereth into that within the vail" (Heb. 6 : 19). The ship anchored by the stern, not only as the best means of checking her course and preventing her swinging round on to the rocks, but to be in readiness to run ashore as soon as daylight enabled them to choose a proper spot. Nelson anchored his fleet by the stern both at the Nile and Copenhagen; and, after the latter battle, he stated that he had been that morning reading the 27th chapter of the Acts. S. & H.

30-32. Selfishness, showing itself Cowardly, Deceitful, and Inhuman, frustrated by Paul.—The sailors were willing to leave soldiers and passengers (utterly helpless without them) to destruction; and they used a natural pretext to deceive those they would desert. But Paul, by divine suggestion, discerned their purpose. He knew, without inspiration, that the soldiers could not work the ship, and that without miracle all could not be saved. Never in any contingency depending upon a miracle, in this exigency he speaks the right word to the right persons. He wastes neither time nor breath by appeal to the sailors. He simply tells the soldiers and their commander that their safety is impossible if the sailors are allowed to enter the small boat (now lowered to receive them). Very promptly the soldiers settle the matter by cutting the boat adrift with their short, sharp swords. Thus compelled to share the fate of all on board, thenceforward the self-interest of the seamen was engaged in the work of saving all.

An objector to the doctrine of a divine purpose as sovereignly controlling human affairs thinks that he finds support from Paul's two positive assertions, in verses 22-24 and 31. In the former, the apostle assures all of safety, and affirms this to be God's purpose and promise. In the latter, he declares a certain human action to be an essential condition of such safety. As one important point in answer to such objector, mark that Paul does not, in the former case, affirm God's purpose to be unconditional, or independent of human acting; so that there is no contradiction in his after-statement concerning the sailors abiding by the ship. Mark further, that all divine purposes respecting human experiences are necessarily connected with, and so far dependent upon, human agencies and instrumentalities. In the case before us the connection is (supernaturally) disclosed, and we see how God's purpose may depend upon men's acting; and we also may see that such dependence is simply part of (and comprehended in)

His broader, all-inclusive plan. In our own experiences, similar in principle to this, we can not always know God's purpose, and therefore can not certainly discern its human conditions or dependencies. Rightly apprehended, then, these two utterances of Paul convey needed instruction, while enforcing trust and imparting comfort. B.

33-38. At Paul's Urgent Request, and upon his Renewed Assurance of Safety, they all take Meat. The Cargo then cast out.—For the fourth time in this memorable voyage and tempest (vs. 10, 21, 31) Paul the prisoner comes forward as the counselor and comforter of those who seemed to have his life and liberty at their disposal. J. A. A.—In the first faint glimmer of the dull dawn, he goes among the exhausted seamen and soldiers, now half famished from want of prepared meals for a fortnight, and urges them to take a full supply of food. There was need for this also in the carrying out of God's purpose in their final deliverance. His argument is their health, or better, their safety. The full meal would strengthen them for the labor of casting out the cargo, and for the exposure and fatigue in reaching the shore.

Paul sustains his appeal by his renewed assurance of their safety, and then strengthens it by the contagious force of his own faith and example. Before them all, first, he shows his own trust and loyalty to God by his outspoken thanks to Him. Then he eats the bread for which he has given thanks. And this grand exhibition of unselfish humanity, of undaunted faith and courage, with his simple, sublime recognition of God's mercy, added to all his previous noble acts and words, constrained all those two hundred and seventy-five souls to cheer and hopefulness; "and they also took meat." In this humane counsel we see the human side of the Christian gospel finely illustrated. Christ's apostle is Christlike in his thorough, practical sympathy with bodily needs. He shows God to these heathen souls as the carer for their bodies and the giver of their daily bread; and by exemplifying a grateful spirit, helps to awaken it in their hearts.

Thus refreshed in spirit and invigorated in body, as their final preparation for the morning's attempt to beach the vessel, with the first dawn they all—sailors, soldiers, and passengers—proceeded to cast out the cargo of wheat into the sea. This freight was untouched so long as there was a possibility of saving the vessel. Now that vessel and freight must be lost, the casting out of the latter may "enable them by a lighter draught of water either to run into any small harbor, or at least closer in with the dry land, should they be obliged to run the ship on the rocks or beach." The same writer (Admiral Penrose) suggests yet another probable reason for throwing the wheat overboard. "From the ship having been so long pressed down on one side, the cargo had shifted, so that the ship heeled to that side. To bring her upright, and enable her to be more accurately steered and navigated toward the land at daybreak, it would be useful to throw out as much of the wheat as time allowed."

39-41. An Inlet discovered into which they enter, and run the Ship aground.—At broad daylight, the sailors saw before them a bay with a smooth beach. Into this bay and upon this beach they decide "to thrust the ship." Three things, in way of preparation, were simultaneously done by the skilled Alexandrian mariners: 1. They cut the anchor cables and left the anchors in the sea. (Our version is quite astray here.) There was no object in saving the anchors, and they needed to economize both time and labor. So "they committed them" (the anchors) "unto the sea." 2. They loosed the rudder bands. They did not, as some readers understand it, cut the ropes that managed the rudders, but the lashings by which these oar rudders were fastened, after being drawn up out of the water. B.—The ships of the ancients were not steered, like ours, by a single rudder hinged on at the stern, but by a pair of broad-bladed oars or paddles, each acting in a rowlock or through a port-hole, according as the ship was small or large. Traces of the two rudders are found in the time of Louis IX.; and the hinged rudder first appears on the coins of King Edward IV. Hence the steering apparatus of the ancient ships was named in the plural. In the case before us, when four anchors were let go at the stern, it would of course be necessary to lash or trice up both paddles, lest they should interfere with the ground-tackle. When the ship had to be steered again, and the cables were cut, the lashings of the paddles would of course be unfastened. S.—3. They hoisted up the foresail to the wind. Not the mainsail, which with its yard and heavy gear had already been thrown overboard. "This artemon was the foresail, carried on a small foremast, which may be seen raking over the bow in representations of ships on Roman coins." The foresail thus set would enable them "to steer freely, to steady the vessel's course, and to press her farther on upon the land." In this connection Dr. Howson cites the following from a letter in the London "Times" of December 5, 1855: "The Lord Raglan (merchant-ship) is on shore, but taken there in a most sailor-like manner. Directly her captain found he could not save her, he cut away his mainmast and mizzen, and, selling a topsail on her foremast, ran her ashore stem on." B.

Thus they drove right ashore, stem on, and the bow stuck fast on the muddy beach. But then it proved that the spot they had mistaken for the bottom of a creek was at the mouth of the little strait separating the islet of Salmonetta from the main land, "a place where two seas met." The swell of the open sea, rolling in from the north through this channel, dashed the hinder part of the ship to pieces; but the fore part, fixed "upright and immovable," afforded a refuge to the voyagers while preparing to escape to shore. S.

The rocks of Malta disintegrate into extremely minute particles of sand and clay, which form a deposit of tenacious clay and mud. A ship, therefore, impelled by the force of the gale into a creek with a bottom such as has been described, would strike a bottom of mud, into which the fore part would fix itself and be held fast, while the stern was exposed to the force of the waves. J. Smith.

The island was unquestionably Malta; and it is almost equally certain that the scene of the shipwreck was that to which local tradition has given the name of St. Paul's Bay, on the northeast coast of the island. The direction of the ship's head when she lay to off Clauda, and her estimated rate of drift, were just such as to carry her to Malta in the fourteen days, and she could make St. Paul's Bay without first touching any other part of the island, which from this point trends to the south-east. A glance at the chart is of itself enough to show how her course was guided by that special providence which so plainly announced itself to Paul. The ship was borne in the darkness so near to Koura Point, the southeast headland of the bay, that the breakers striking its rocks gave the warning to anchor just in time to avoid striking on the opposite shore; and the soundings are precisely those mentioned in the narrative. She anchored off the east point of the islet of Salomonetta, which would appear from that point of view to join the mainland, with its beach of sand or mud. S.

St. Paul's Bay, Malta. Salomonetta in the distance.

42-44. The Prisoners saved by the Centurion, and all escape to the Land.—The stern strictness of Roman discipline is seen in the soldiers' counsel to kill the prisoners. B.—Their plan, unlike that of the sailors (v. 30), was not to save their own lives, but to fulfill their trust as guards over the prisoners. It was more in accordance with their notions of military honor and discipline to kill the prisoners than to suffer them to escape by swimming to shore. This would imply that the soldiers themselves scarcely expected to escape. Such stern fidelity had made the Romans conquerors of the world. Riddle.—Here Paul is only the occasion of the fulfillment of God's announced purpose of saving all. Julius is God's instrument, and that through his own acting, under the natural impulse of his friendly feeling for Paul. Another equally instructive illustration of the coworking (without sign of conflict or difficulty) of God's purpose and agency with man's. For Paul's sake the centurion spared all the prisoners, and so contributed to the accomplishment of God's purpose, and for the same Paul's sake God had spared centurion and soldiers. B.

It is better for all in the ship that they have a Paul on board, hastening to execute God's commission on the earth, than to have a Jonah fleeing from his work, and hiding from his Master. It was God's will that this messenger should publish the gospel in Rome; and his purpose shall stand. The tumults of the people had already been stilled; and now the waves of the sea must hear and obey the same Divine command. Neither tumult will be permitted to swallow up the "chosen vessel," until it has discharged its precious burden on the appointed spot. Arnot.

When Dr. Chalmers wished to preach a sermon on a topic on which all men have to think, on which all churches have opinions, and which has sadly sufferred from irreverent and injudicious handling, namely, Predestination, he selected the 31st verse in connection with the 22d. He proceeds to show that there is no contradiction between the two statements, that God's decree is carried out by means, and includes the means; that when he settled the security of the two hundred and seventy-six lives, he settled also that the sailors should be at their posts; that their duties should be done; that at the critical time they should "lighten the ship," "take up the anchor," run before the wind and "loose the rudder bands," hoist up the sail to the wind, and so run her "aground"; that they who could swim should swim, and the rest, as they best could, "escape safe to land." And even so, argues the great preacher, no certainty of assurance as to the result, no decree of God, even if we certainly knew it, is to diminish one jot of that zeal, industry, and diligence, in the use of means which the Lord contemplates in the decree, and will not permit us to disregard. His people do come to eternal life—"they shall never perish" (John 10:28); but it is not by apathy, and neglect of the fitting, appointed means, but through repentance toward God, and faith in the Lord Jesus. And what was true in the perils of the sea is just as true in that more momentous voyage on which we embarked the day we were born, of which the end is to be safety in the haven of eternal rest, or a shipwreck of the soul, terrible beyond description or conception. J. Hall.

Section 233.

Acts xxviii. 1-15.

1 AND when they were escaped, then they knew that the island was called Melita. And 2 the barbarous people shewed us no little kindness: for they kindled a fire, and received us
 3 every one, because of the present rain, and because of the cold. And when Paul had gathered 4 a bundle of sticks, and laid them on the fire, there came a viper out of the heat, and 5 fastened on his hand. And when the barbarians saw the venomous beast hang on his hand, 6 they said among themselves, No doubt this man is a murderer, whom, though he hath 7 escaped the sea, yet vengeance suffereth not to live. And he shook off the beast into the 8 fire, and felt no harm. Howbeit they looked when he should have swollen, or fallen down 9 dead suddenly: but after they had looked a great while, and saw no harm come to him, 10 they changed their minds, and said that he was a god.
 11 In the same quarters were possessions of the chief man of the island, whose name was 12 Publius; who received us, and lodged us three days courteously. And it came to pass, that 13 the father of Publius lay sick of a fever and of a bloody flux: to whom Paul entered in, and 14 prayed, and laid his hands on him, and healed him. So when this was done, others also, 15 which had diseases in the island, came, and were healed: who also honoured us with many honours; and when we departed, they laded us with such things as were necessary.
 And after three months we departed in a ship of Alexandria, which had wintered in the isle, whose sign was Castor and Pollux. And landing at Syracuse, we tarried there three days. And from thence we fetched a compass, and came to Rhegium: and after one day the south wind blew, and we came the next day to Puteoli: where we found brethren, and were desired to tarry with them seven days: and so we went toward Rome. And from thence, when the brethren heard of us, they came to meet us as far as Appii Forum, and
 The three taverns: whom when Paul saw, he thanked God, and took courage.

We all know one who was known to stand very high in Christ's divine regards, and who for eighteen hundred years has stood very high in the regard, affection, admiration of the whole Christian world—and this is a description of his ordinary life: "In weariness and painfulness, in watchings often, in hunger and thirst, in fastings often, in cold and nakedness." It was not every day that companies of friends came to meet him, so that he could "thank God and take courage." But every day found him on the road; and although he was not always what you would call "happy," yet keeping his uprightness, keeping his "good conscience toward God and man," and his life-purpose unbroken, in the habit of a noble self-sacrifice, giving all his days and all his being to Christ, he certainly went along a path of light, that shone more and more unto his perfect day. If we read our lives in the light of his—to say nothing at present of the yet grander and purer life after which his was fashioned, and from which all its inspiration came—we shall see what a poor thing it is to be always hankering after happiness : and what a noble thing it is to keep the line of duty ! And what a safe thing it is, by God's grace, to settle the whole being in uprightness ; for "unto the upright," be they of high or low degree, "light ariseth in the darkness." A. R.

1, 2. The island. That this island, here called Melita, was the modern Malta, can not well be doubted. The positive reasons for the common belief as to the place of the shipwreck are, that the traditional evidence sustains it ; that Malta lies in the track of a vessel driven by a northeast wind ; that the reputed locality of the wreck agrees with Luke's account ; that the Alexandrian ship in which they reëmbarked would very naturally winter there ; and that the subsequent course of the voyage to Puteoli is that which a vessel would pursue in going from Malta. Hackett.

Independent calculations made by several experienced naval officers as to the rate at which a ship would drive before the wind in such a storm as that described above, agree almost exactly in the singular conclusion that the vessel, on the fifteenth morning after leaving Crete, must have been precisely where tradition has assigned the place of the apostle's shipwreck. J. A. A.

The native islanders were of Phœnician descent. Using neither the Greek nor Latin languages and customs, then dominant over the civilized world, they would be classed as barbarians. So Luke employs the term ; and Paul also comprehends all mankind under the distinction of Greeks and barbarians. "And to this day the African coast over against this island is called Barbary." But this "barbarous people" showed the higher refinement of a genuine courtesy and hospitality in their cordial reception and care of the shipwrecked passengers and crew.

3-6. The Double Misjudgment of the Islanders concerning Paul when bitten by the Viper.—Paul was again illustrating the practical side of Christianity by taking his share in the necessary work of gathering materials for fire. In this he only exemplified Christ's word about the greatness of servicing. Soon after laying his armful of sticks upon the flame a poisonous viper thrust itself up, and, fastening its fangs upon Paul's hand, swung its whole body clear of the heating wood. It was roused from a torpid state to sudden activity by the intense heat. The sharp-eyed natives saw the reptile hanging from the apostle's hand. They knew that the poisoned fangs, by which only it could hang, were bedded in the hand ; and they knew the virulence of the poison now in contact with the life-blood. Inferring nothing else but Paul's instant death, with an instinctive feeling of natural retribution for crime, they count the viper a Nemesis, a revenger of blood. "This man is doubtless a murderer," they say to each other, "whom justice still is tracking and hath found, even after his deliverance from the sea." B.—This is the very basis of all natural religion ; the idea of the connection between guilt and retribution. In some form or other it underlies all mythologies. The sleepless, never-dying avenger of wrong ; the Nemesis who presides over retribution ; the vengeance which suffereth not the murderer to live ; the whips and scorpions of the Furies—it seems the first instinct of religion. F. W. R.—But they erred, as the ignorant and superstitious always err, in limiting the agency and sphere of retribution to this life, and in taking the actual experience of calamity as proof of guilt.

Luke's narrative seems to imply that Paul had suffered the reptile to hang for a moment. Yet, while they were speaking about him, Paul quietly shook it off into the fire, "and suffered no harm." Then for a long time the islanders continued to watch him closely, expecting to see the natural effects of such an envenomed bite, in sudden inflammation and death. But when the result disproved their previous notion, they went to another extreme of misjudgment. Now Paul was a serpent-charmer, and to these people of Oriental origin an object himself of worship as possessing the power of miracle. This conclusion, like the other, was not so much out of the way for men untaught in any principles of true religion. For there was a miracle enacted here ; and none but a divine power could enact it. Paul was the only being that they knew to be concerned with the transaction. The poison had been injected into his veins, and he had been unharmed by it. He must possess divine power.

We remember that the Lystrans exactly reversed this process of judgment about Paul. They first counted him worthy of worship and then of death. The Maltese first judge him deserving of death, and afterward of worship. Both judgments are mistaken. Instead of being a murderer or a god, he is, as Bengel quaintly suggests, a man of God. As these islanders went no further than uttering their impression of Paul's divinity, the apostle took no notice of their mere notion. He knew that their error would soon be corrected by the events. As always, however, he utilized the influence it gave him, by exemplifying still more the Godlike spirit of his Master as well as by transferring to Christ all claim and right to true Deity.

7-9. The Hospitality of Publius, and Paul's Return of Kindness to all in a Large Ministry of Healing.—Publius is here called the first man or primate. The reference is neither to his birth, rank, nor wealth, since his father would be his superior. By inscriptions (in Greek and Latin) upon a stone pillar in Malta, discovered 1747, it seems to refer to an established official title. He was, probably, the legate of the prætor of Sicily, to which province Malta belonged.

The three days' hospitality of Publius was well repaid by Paul in the miraculous healing of the father. Concerning the Greek term dysentery here used by Luke, Dr. Hackett has this note: "No other writer of the New Testament exhibits this sort of technical precision in speaking of diseases. The disorder with which the father of Publius was affected was dysentery combined with fever. It was formerly asserted that a dry climate, like that of Malta, would not produce such a disorder, but we have now the testimony of physicians resident in that island, that it is by no means uncommon there at the present day."

Yet more effectually was Paul introduced and authenticated as God's true messenger by this signal marvel of cure. In this and the previous incident of the viper, we find a remarkable verification of Christ's promise (Mk. 16 : 18). And it would seem that the three months which followed were filled up with a double Christlike ministry of healing and preaching the gospel of the kingdom.

10. Grateful Returns from the Islanders attest the Success of his Ministry.—"They honored us, and they laded us!" Luke writes. Neither honors nor gifts were bestowed in any wise as remuneration for the healing or the ministry of Paul. Nor were they other than he might properly receive. The hearts of these barbarians had been intensely moved by the kind and unselfish ministries of these Christian missionaries. They naturally desired to reciprocate so great favors. The honors they rendered could be no more than simple attentions and tokens of respect and gratitude. The gifts were things necessary for their supply and comfort in the further voyage; some of which they had lost in the shipwreck. And the statement indicates that outward honors and benefits, if bestowed with a right spirit, may be accepted and enjoyed, if received with the same spirit. B.

In what a great variety of places and circumstances do we find Paul! Here we have him in an island, to which in all probability he had never come if he had not been thrown upon it by a storm; and yet it seems God has work for him to do here. Even stormy winds fulfill God's counsel; and an ill wind indeed it is that blows nobody any good. His ill wind blew good to the island of Melita, for it gave them Paul's company for three months, who was a blessing to every place he came to. Henry.

11-15. The Further Voyage and Journey to Rome.—After three months' detention at Malta, early in February, A. D. 61, Julius and his prisoners sailed in another Alexandrian ship, "that had wintered in the isle." Castor and Pollux, the name or sign of this vessel, were twin heroes, sons of Jupiter and favorite gods of the Greek and Roman sailors. Their images were either set as a figure-head, or painted or carved on each side of the prow.

Their first stopping-place was Syracuse, the chief city of the province of Sicily, eighty miles distant (east of north). Here they tarried three days for purposes of trade. Thence they "made a circuit," or beat up (as Mr. J. Smith explains the term) to Rhegium, eighty miles farther. This seaport of Italy, now called Reggio, lies upon the promontory at the south entrance of the straits of Messina. After one day's detention, a fair south wind carried them swiftly northward one hundred and eighty miles to Puteoli. B.—At the rate of seven knots an hour, the passage would be accomplished in about twenty-six hours, which agrees perfectly with the account of Luke, who says that, after leaving Rhegium, they came "the next day" to Puteoli. Before the close of the first day they would see on the left the volcanic cone and smoke of Stromboli, the nearest of the Liparian islands. In the course of the night they would have neared that projecting part of the mainland which forms the southern limit of the bay of Salerno. Sailing across the wide opening of this gulf, they would, in a few hours, enter that other bay, the bay of Naples, in the northern part of which Puteoli was situated. Its southeastern limit is the promontory of Minerva, with the island of Caprea opposite, which is so associated with the memory of Tiberius, that its cliffs still seem to rise from the blue waters as a monument of hideous vice in the midst of the fairest scenes of nature. The opposite boundary was the promontory of Misenum, where one of the imperial fleets lay at anchor under the shelter of the islands of Iachia and Procida. In the intermediate space the Campanian coast curves round in the loveliest forms, with Vesuvius as the prominent feature of the view. But here one difference must be marked between Paul's day and our own. The angry neighbor of Naples was not then an unsleeping volcano, but a green and sunny background to the bay, with its westward slope covered with vines. And little did the apostle dream, when he looked from the vessel's deck across the bay to the right, that a ruin, like that of Sodom and Gomorrah, hung over the fair cities at the base of the mountain, and that the Jewish princess, who had so lately conversed with him in his prison at Cesarea, would find her tomb in that ruin, with the child she had borne to Felix. In this wide and sunny expanse of blue waters, no part was calmer or more beautiful than the recess in the northern part of the bay, between Baiæ and Puteoli. Baiæ was a place of resort for the invalids and fashionable idlers of Rome. Puteoli, on the opposite side of this inner bay, was the Liverpool of Italy. Between them was that inclosed reach of water, called the Lucrine Lake, which contained the oyster beds for the luxurious tables of Rome. Still farther inland was that other calm basin, the Lacus Avernus, which an artificial passage connected with the former, and thus converted into a harbor. Not far beyond was Cumæ, once a flourishing Greek city, but when the apostle visited this coast, a decayed country town, famous only for the recollections of the Sibyl. H.

At Puteoli the voyage was completed, and here they found brethren, unnamed disciples, with whom

(the centurion consenting) they seem to have tarried seven days for rest and Christian converse. By this delay the news of Paul's arrival was communicated to the Christians of Rome, so that they could send a double deputation to meet him on the journey thither. That journey lay for the most part over the Appian Way. This was the oldest and most noted of the Roman roads, the great line of communication (from the south) with the Eternal City. It was constructed three centuries before Christ by the censor Appius Claudius. Upon a foundation of concrete, large blocks of basaltic lava were so closely fitted and cemented as to resemble a natural rock formation. Besides the milestones marking the whole distance, post-stations for relays of horses and for the comfort of travelers were established every twenty miles. Five hundred years after Christ, "notwithstanding the traffic of so many ages, the stones were not displaced, nor had they lost their original smoothness."

At two well-known stations on this road—Appii Forum, forty-three miles from Rome, and the Three Taverns, ten miles nearer the city—Paul and his company were met and warmly welcomed by deputations from the Roman Church. Of the origin and founding of this Church we have no information. Three years before Paul had written to its members his grand Epistle, expressing his strong desire to come among them. And now this fervent greeting, the first he had ever received in advance of his coming, deeply moved the apostle's heart. Here was the proof of a great work that God had wrought in the world's capital, and the earnest of a yet larger work, in which God would employ his ministry, and concerning which Christ had already given him an assurance of success. Therefore, with glad and hopeful spirit, this trusting, brave apostle, as he grasped these welcoming hands, thanked God, and took courage! B.

From the point of the present he looks backward and forward. All the past of his life he seems to count only a preparation; his work lies still before him. It is a beautiful character that is displayed here in two great hemispheres: for the past it is devout gratitude; for the future, filial confidence. For the future this true, bold man took not comfort but courage. Arnot.—How can we help being touched by such incidents as this? They set this great hero and champion of the faith before us as a man of like passions with ourselves. He feels as we should have felt. He is dejected and inspired by the very causes which tell on us. Like us he sees all things in "hues borrowed from the heart." God is not nearer to him nor more truly with him now that he has reached Appii Forum, or the Three Taverns, than he was before; his chains are not removed; the soldiers still surround and watch him : but he has met attached and pitying friends, and his chains grow lighter, and their love deepens the sense of God's love within his soul.

Cœz.

And through all the brief remaining journey, as he passed along the great Appian Way, retinued by this humble band of Christian disciples, and as at length a conqueror for Christ, though a prisoner, he passed through that memorable gateway of triumphal entrance by crowned victors, how must that word of Christ, spoken in the prison of Antonia, have cheered and strengthened his heroic soul : Thou must bear witness of me at Rome! B.—“And so we came to Rome.” In such a manner as this Paul had not thought to come to Rome ; the goal was reached, but by what a different road from that which he proposed ! For this end had the Roman chief captain torn him from the hands of the Jews ; for this had an unscrupulous governor violated, in regard to him, that justice which he now must seek before a higher tribunal ; for this, then, had all the hatred of his foes been constrained to coöperate for the fulfillment of his ardent desire.

And now at last his feet stand within the gates of pagan Rome ; he comes accused as a malefactor, but yet one to whom the opportunity of freely declaring the gospel shall not at first be wanting. Perhaps he would himself have desired this crisis to have arrived earlier, but the Lord's hour only struck now, and at the close we see that it was best thus. The Euroclydon had damaged his vessel, but had at last cast him ashore on the island of Malta ; the poisonous serpent had twined round his arm without abating his courage ; all God's waves and billows had gone over his bowed-down head, but the end of it all is, that the intuition of his heart has deceived him as little as the promise of his Lord, and that he now with his own eyes beholds Rome in all her glory and in all her degradation. What a moment was this in the annals of the kingdom of God, when this plain inhabitant of Tarsus, unmarked and unencumbered, made his entry into the world's capital, in which he shall at once win so many subjects for the spiritual kingdom of God, and lay the first foundations of the transformation of pagan into Christian Rome ! Van O.

Section 234.

Acts xxviii. 16-31.

16 AND when we came to Rome, the centurion delivered the prisoners to the captain of the 17 guard : but Paul was suffered to dwell by himself with a soldier that kept him. And it came to pass, that after three days Paul called the chief of the Jews together : and when they were come together, he said unto them, Men and brethren, though I have committed nothing against the people, or customs of our fathers, yet was I delivered prisoner from 18 Jerusalem into the hands of the Romans. Who, when they had examined me, would have 19 let me go, because there was no cause of death in me. But when the Jews spake against it, I was constrained to appeal unto Cæsar ; not that I had ought to accuse my nation of.
20 For this cause therefore have I called for you, to see you, and to speak with you : because 21 that for the hope of Israel I am bound with this chain. And they said unto him, We neither received letters out of Judæa concerning thee, neither any of the brethren that came 22 shewed or spake any harm of thee. But we desire to hear of thee what thou thinkest : for as concerning this sect, we know that every where it is spoken against.
23 And when they had appointed him a day, there came many to him into his lodging ; to whom he expounded and testified the kingdom of God, persuading them concerning Jesus, 24 both out of the law of Moses, and out of the prophets, from morning till evening. And 25 some believed the things which were spoken, and some believed not. And when they agreed not among themselves, they departed, after that Paul had spoken one word, Well spake the 26 Holy Ghost by Esaias the prophet unto our fathers, saying, Go unto this people, and say, Hearing ye shall hear, and shall not understand ; and seeing ye shall see, and not perceive :
27 for the heart of this people is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes have they closed ; lest they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and 28 understand with their heart, and should be converted, and I should heal them. Be it known therefore unto you, that the salvation of God is sent unto the Gentiles, and that they will 29 hear it. And when he had said these words, the Jews departed, and had great reasoning among themselves.

30 And Paul dwelt two whole years in his own hired house, and received all that came in 31 unto him, preaching the kingdom of God, and teaching those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ, with all confidence, no man forbidding him.

THE apostles uniformly appealed to those audiences who were most capable of examining the evidences of Christianity, and were at the same time prejudiced against its doctrines. Jerusalem, the seat of the doctors, the judges of religion, was the first place in which, by the command of their Lord, the disciples preached Christ crucified. They were, therefore, not afraid to have their cause tried by the most rigid test of Scripture, and in the very spot, too, where that Scripture was best understood. When the same apostles carried this gospel to heathen countries, they went to Cesarea, to Antioch, to Thessalonica, to Athens, to Corinth, to Ephesus, to Rome, to the very places where learning flourished most, where sciences were best cultivated, where imposture was most likely to be detected, and where the secular power existed in the most despotic manner, and could at once have crushed them, if they could have been proved to be impostors, or if they had not been under the immediate protection of Heaven. They preached Christ crucified, where it was the most solemn interest of the Jews to disprove their doctrine, that they might exculpate themselves from the murder of Jesus Christ. They preached the same Christ, and the vanity of idolatry, where idolatry existed in the plenitude of its power; and where all its interests required it to make the most desperate and formidable stand against those innovators. G. T.

16. Paul surrendered by Julius to the Custody of the Prefect of the Prætorian Guard.—The name of Christ borne by the chosen vessel has now been brought to Rome. It had passed from Jerusalem through Judea and Samaria; and now it had reached those seven hills which, politically, were the loftiest pinnacle of the earth, and from which it might be carried by the natural channels to the whole circle of subject nations. Wonderful were the ways of God in reaching this result. The imperial legions must furnish an escort, and the imperial exchequer must pay the passage. Even to the stormy waves of the Mediterranean the word of the Lord had come in power: Destroy not this frail vessel, for it bears a blessing to the Western world. Arnot.

Ancient Rome was not, like modern Rome, impressive from its solitude, standing alone, with its one conspicuous cupola, in the midst of a desolate though beautiful waste. Within a circuit of little more than twelve miles more than two millions of inhabitants were crowded. It was a vast city, covering the Campagna, and almost continuously connected by its suburbs with the villas on the adjacent hill, and with the bright towns which clustered on the sides of the mountains. Over all the intermediate space were the houses and gardens, through which aqueducts and roads might be traced in converging lines toward the confused mass of edifices which formed the city of Rome. Here no conspicuous building, elevated above the rest, attracted the eye or the imagination. Ancient Rome had neither cupola nor campanile. Still less had it any of those spires which give life to all the landscapes of Northern Christendom. The Coliseum, the Basilica of Constantine, and the baths of other emperors, and many other buildings which are now regarded as the conspicuous features of ancient Rome, did not then exist. The Pantheon still remains, as a monument of the reign of Augustus. The city was a wide-spread aggregate of buildings, which, though separated by narrow streets and open squares, appeared, when seen from near Aricia, blended into one indiscriminate mass : for distance concealed the contrasts which divided the crowded habitations of the poor and the dark haunts of filth and misery from the theatres and colonnades, the baths, the temples and palaces with gilded roofs, flashing back the sun.

Entering the city by the Porta Capena, or gate of the Appian Way, Julius and his prisoners moved on, with the Aventine on their left, close round the base of the Cœlian, and through the hollow ground which lay between this hill and the Palatine; thence over the low ridge called Velia, where afterward was built the arch of Titus, to commemorate the destruction of Jerusalem; and then descending, by the Sacra Via, into that space which was the center of imperial power and imperial magnificence, and associated also with the most glorious recollections of the republic. The Forum was to Rome what the Acropolis was to Athens, the heart of all the characteristic interest of the place. Here was the Miliarium Aureum (the Golden Milestone), to which the roads of all the provinces converged. All around were the stately buildings, which were raised in the closing years of the republic, and by the earlier emperors. In front was the Capitoline Hill, illustrious long before the invasion of the Gauls. Close on the left, covering that hill, whose name is associated in every modern European language with the notion of imperial splendor, were the vast ranges of the palace—the “house of Cesar” (Phil. 4 : 22). Here were the household troops quartered in a prætorium attached to the palace. And here Julius gave up his prisoner to Burrus, the Prætorian Prefect, who was the official custodian of all accused persons who were to be tried before the emperor. H.—It was a Providential circumstance that prisoners, who were sent on appeal to Rome, were consigned to the custody of the Chief of the Imperial Guard. Thus Paul’s words became manifest in Christ (Phil. 1 : 12), and the gospel was brought home to the hearts of those of Cesar’s household. W.

The strongly favorable report of the centurion Julius concerning Paul, together with the absence of all criminal charge in the official statement of Festus, secured for the apostle at the outset the singular liberty of dwelling outside the prison precincts. At first he abode in a lodging, or guest-chamber of some devoted Christian friend (perhaps Aquila), and afterward in apartments permanently rented (his own hired house, verse 30); both dwellings being in the vicinity of the Prætorium, and not far from the Jewish quarter. But, though privileged in living thus privately, and perhaps having large liberty in going abroad through the city, a prætorian soldier was ever his guard. At home and abroad, by day and night, in his public and social conferences and his private worship, his arm was always linked by a chain to that of a sentinel attendant. As this companion guard was frequently relieved, it naturally occurred that Paul became intimately known to a great number of prætorian soldiers; and this, he intimates (Phil. 1 : 12, 13), happened “for the furtherance of the gospel.” Many touching allusions he elsewhere makes to this always binding chain, though never in tone of complaint. He counts himself the prisoner of the Lord, not of Nero.

17-22. Paul’s First Interview with the Jewish Leaders in Rome.—To the Jew first, had been the invariable rule of his Christian ministry; and this rule he maintains to the end. Though, like his Lord, so often rejected in his fervent endeavor to bless his own people, still, as he had written to the Roman disciples three years before, “his heart’s desire and prayer was that Israel might be saved.” And now prompt, as always, to do what his heart moved him to do, at once he summons the elders and rulers of the synagogue and others socially prominent among the Jews to a conference in his own dwelling. This he did because he could not go to them or properly appear in their synagogue.

By this early conference he would anticipate the coming of his accusers from Jerusalem. In his address, he answers to the prejudices that might have arisen against him from information previously transmitted concerning his missionary career. And he fairly states and answers the accusations that had actually been made against him. But his tone is frankly conciliating and generous throughout. He makes no accusation even against his accusers, save that involved in his appeal. No anger had he, much less malice against them, notwithstanding their murderous hate against him. And concerning the whole Jewish people—his nation, he touchingly calls them—he has nothing to say against them. At this interview he simply justifies himself with regard to the circumstances in which they find him, appealing to Cesar. Though (he said) he had offended against neither Jewish law nor custom, yet the violent opposition of the Jews had constrained him to this appeal. How mistaken this opposition was, that had made and kept him a prisoner, he intimates by the declaration that the highest, truest hope of the Jews found its fulfillment in the grand facts of Christianity. Upon these facts he afterward rests the justification of his strange career and seeming apostasy.

In reply, the leading Jews first refer to what Paul had said about his appeal. Neither by letter nor by messenger from Jerusalem had they heard of any accusation against him. They implied that they had heard of him, by their request to know what he thought concerning this new sect (of Christians). Not only had they heard of the rapid and wide extension of Christianity by report of Jews that opposed it, but for some years a congregation of Christian disciples had maintained a living and effective organization beside their synagogue in Rome. That they spoke so cautiously, and subsequently made no demonstration of hostility against Paul, is readily accounted for. The apostle was held in special favor by the chief officer of Nero’s household; and the Jews of the synagogue were themselves subject to persecution, so that they were powerless to persecute the disciples of Christ. Of Paul’s old accusers of the Sanhedrim we hear no more. They did not follow him to Rome because, with their trivial charges against the apostle, they could hope for no better success from the Emperor than from his Judean deputy.

23, 24. Paul's All-day Exposition of the Kingdom of God, and Testimony to Christ as its King; and the Effects of his Preaching.—Many others accompanied the chief Jews on the day appointed. At an early hour they gathered in his apartment. As always, so now for the last time, Paul takes as his theme that doctrine of the kingdom of God which was the central truth of the Old Testament and of the New; that great disclosure of the prophets which was still, as it had been for centuries, the supreme thought and hope of the whole Jewish people. In their interpretations of the prophet's meaning, in their understanding of the nature of the kingdom, in the person and character, the experiences and achievements of the King, lay the vital difference between the natural and spiritual Israelites, between the Jew and the Christian. Again Paul follows the very line of his risen Lord's exposition to the two disciples on the road to Emmaus. B.—Beginning at Moses and all the prophets, he showed these hearers that the predicted kingdom is not limited to one nation, but coextensive with the world; that if it be limited for a time, it is limited like a seed, only until the set time come for its indefinite multiplication and expansion. He showed them that the King, though universal Lord, yet suffers and dies—gives his life a ransom; that his kingdom is not of this world; that he is King of thoughts, not of armies; that he wins by love—by enduring. He showed them that in Jesus of Nazareth all the conditions of the expected Messiah were fulfilled; he employed the law to shut them up unto the gospel. Arnot.

From his first reported speech at the Pisidian Antioch, which bases all upon the Scriptures, still he goes on with the Scriptures in his hand, till he stands and is judged, "believing all things which are written in the Law and in the Prophets"; and finally parts from the Roman Jews after "persuading them concerning Jesus, both out of the Law of Moses and out of the Prophets, from morning till evening." This then is the position taken at the beginning and fought for to the end; and it is a striking sight to see how resolutely Paul insists that he and his doctrine are the true representatives of the Law and the Prophets, while he is being persecuted and cast out, as having betrayed and blasphemed them. T. D. B.—And as his theme and method were the same which had characterized his whole ministry among the Jews of Judea and Syria, of Asia Minor and Greece, so was the result. A few were won to faith in the Christ; but the many disbelieved the teachings of their own Scriptures, and rejected the suffering Messiah whom those Scriptures so plainly disclosed.

25-29. Paul's Fearful Farewell Words of Warning.—With these solemn words of the Holy Ghost, spoken by Isaiah, Christ had opened his teaching by parables (Mat. 13 : 14, 15), and had finally closed his ministry among the Jews (John 12 : 40). And now Paul, as if himself commissioned by the Holy Ghost as a prophet of the New Testament, sadly redelivers the same message, enforced by the awful emphasis of the Master's double utterance. Thus the apostle, under divine direction, formally and finally seals up the gospel offer to God's disobedient and rejecting people. B.—This part of the original prediction has the form of an ironical commission or command, in which the prophet is required to stupefy and blind the people, which is only a strong and paradoxical mode of commanding him to do his duty or perform his office, with an accompanying intimation of its actual effect upon the people, through their own perversity and unbelief (compare the similar command of Christ in Mat. 23 : 32). In this fearful process there are three distinguishable agencies expressly or implicitly described—the ministerial agency of the prophet, the judicial agency of God, and the suicidal agency of the people themselves. J. A. A.—Spiritually blind and deaf under the brightest light of the gospel and its plainest proclamations, hardening the heart against the most gracious offers of healing and life, and arming themselves against their own salvation with weapons of eternal death, justly were they at last given over by God, and sealed up under incurable obstinacy! D.

And, we add, the warning is equally applicable to Gentiles who will not hear, and who similarly reject the salvation of God, sent now to them. They who make themselves blind and insensate by willfully closing their eyes against the light and hardening their hearts against the grace of God, shall assuredly experience the same exclusion from hope, and be for ever debarred from entrance into the fellowship and joy of God. B.

Close of the History.—Here, so far as the Scripture narrative is concerned, the curtain falls upon the contest of Jewish unbelief against the things that concerned their salvation. And this we incline to regard as the very reason why the history of the Acts breaks off. As the narrative which illustrates the command of Jesus to his apostles, to "preach the gospel to the whole world, beginning at Jerusalem," it opens with the opening of that commission at the religious center of the world; it traces the successive offers to the Jews of Judea, Samaria, and the dispersion; to proselytes and Hellenists, in all the provinces that they frequented; and it shows how their general disbelief caused the Gentiles to be received step by step into their place of privilege; till the apostle, bringing back the offerings of those Gentile converts to bless his countrymen at Jerusalem, was finally rejected by them, and sent in chains to Rome. There, in the capital of the world, the unbelief of the last section of the Jewish family, to whom he revealed their Messiah, completed the first stage in the history of the diffusion of Christianity, at which the mass of the Jewish race are, for the time, cut off from the kingdom of God.

They are not, however, finally left in this fallen state. If the last recorded words of the apostle's living voice proclaimed at Rome their present sentence, the enduring records of his pen, gathering up the substance of the ancient promises, had already embodied, in writing to the Church of Rome, that prophetic announcement of their restoration, the mystery of which remains to be fulfilled, and those three wonderful chapters of the Epistle to the Romans (9-11) may be regarded as a supplement to the Acts. The spread of the gospel over the purely heathen portion of the world belongs to the new chain of history which comes down to our own time; the end of which will be found linked with the fulfillment of the promises concerning the Jews. S.

30, 31. Paul's Unhindered Ministry of Two Years in Rome.—Fully and boldly, to all that visited his humble abode, he proclaimed the establishment of that kingdom of God (foreannounced through the prophets) by the incarnation and the life, the death, the resurrection, and the ascension of the Lord Jesus. And this prolonged, successful, and unfettered ministry of the "prisoner of the Lord" fitly completes this succinct and well-defined account of the great process by which Christianity was carried from its cradle at Jerusalem, not only to its secondary homes in Antioch, Philippi, Corinth, Ephesus, and other cities of inferior rank, but also to its throne in the Eternal City, the locality selected for its highest exaltation and its most profound abasement. J. A. A.

But this history of the planting of the Kingdom of Christ in the world stops short of the mighty convulsion which was shortly to pronounce that Kingdom established as the divine commonwealth for all men. The work of Paul belongs to the preparatory period. He was not to live through the time when the Son of man came in the destruction of the Holy City and Temple, and in the throes of the new age. The most significant part of his work was accomplished, when in the Imperial City he had declared his Gospel "to the Jew first, and also to the Gentile." But his career is not abruptly closed. Before he himself fades out of our sight in the twilight of ecclesiastical tradition, we have letters written by himself (the four Epistles to the Colossians, to Philemon, to the Ephesians, and to the Philippians), which contribute some particulars to his external biography, and give us a far more precious insight into his convictions and sympathies. S.—

From these Epistles we learn that the apostle, though subjected to the restraining and ungenial presence of the Roman sentinel to whom he was chained, was also privileged with the congenial fellowship of long-attached disciples. Among these were Luke and Timothy and Mark; Aristarchus of Thessalonica, Epaphros of Colosse, and Tychicus of Asia; and that Demas who for some time "did run well," but concerning whom at the very last Paul was constrained to write the sad words: Demas hath forsaken me, having loved this present world. B.

So long as he lived, whether free to travel or shut up in prison, Paul would not resign the daily "care of all the churches." One means he had of promoting their welfare daily and hourly, the constant and earnest prayer, which his Epistles prove to have been a chief occupation of his solitude. But he was not shut out from intercourse with the churches themselves. The four Epistles, which are perhaps but some among many that he wrote from Rome, are linked together by a striking resemblance of tone, thought, and argument, as well as by internal marks which place the time of their composition beyond reasonable doubt. They were all written toward the latter part of his imprisonment at Rome, for all refer to the expectation of his release. There is the best reason to believe the prevailing tradition that, after an imprisonment of two years, Paul's case was heard by the Emperor and decided in his favor. The precision with which Luke specifies the duration of Paul's imprisonment justifies the inference that it came to an end at the close of the "two years," that is, in the spring of A. D. 63. S.

As Luke concludes his history with Paul's abode at Rome, before his journey into Spain, we may infer that he wrote both his gospel and the Acts while the apostle was still living, of whose actions he was himself an eye-witness, and by whom it is very probable this book was revised, as the ancients also say his gospel was. D.

The apostolic period we regard as closing about A. D. 100; as the life of John, according to reliable tradition, reached over into the reign of Trajan, A. D. 98-117. This space of seventy years may be again divided into three subordinate periods: 1. The founding of the Christian Church among the Jews, or the labors of Peter. 2. The founding of the Christian Church among the Gentiles, or the labors of Paul, who took the lead in the work of missions during the years 50-64. Through his instrumentality Christianity becomes gradually more independent of Judaism; until, by the destruction of Jerusalem, the last cord that bound the Christian Church to the Mosaic economy is broken. 3. Then follows the final summing up and organic union of Jewish and Gentile Christianity in one fixed, independent whole. This is the work mainly of John, who outlived all his colleagues, and accompanied the Church through the threatening dangers and errors of the last thirty years of the first period to the threshold of the second, thus forming the connecting link between the two.

These three stages in the development of the apostolic church have their local centers in the cities of Jerusalem, the mother church of Jewish Christianity, Antioch, the starting-point of the heathen missions, and Ephesus, the later residence of John and the principal seat of the process of amalgamation, which he completed. At the same time Rome witnesses a similar amalgamation, and becomes a center for Christianity in the West. P. S.

Probable Interval of Five Years between the First and Second Imprisonment of Paul.—It is now generally admitted, first, that the historical facts mentioned in the Epistles to Timothy and Titus can not be placed in any portion of Paul's life before or during his first imprisonment in Rome; and, secondly, that the style in which these Epistles are written, and the condition of the Church described in them, forbid the supposition of such a date. C.

From these Epistles, without encroaching upon the domain of conjecture, we draw the following conclusions: 1. Paul, at some time after leaving Rome, must have visited Asia Minor and Greece, for he says to Timothy, "I besought thee to abide still at Ephesus, when I was setting out for Macedonia." On his way to Macedonia, it is reasonable to suppose that he made a circuit like those of former days—by Antioch and Asia Minor, staying at Colosse, where he had asked Philemon (22) to prepare him a lodging. After being once at Ephesus, he was purposing to go there again (Tit. 3 : 12), and he spent a considerable time at Ephesus. The First Epistle to Timothy proves the magnitude of his work in this city which had been so long the scene of his former labors. The Gentile churches, of which that of Ephesus may be regarded as a type, had begun to feel the want of a more perfect organization. Beginning this work himself, and carrying it out through the ministry of Timothy here, as of Titus in Crete, he had occasion to place on permanent record, in the Epistles written to direct their action, the great principles of ecclesiastical order. 2. He paid a visit to Crete, and left Titus to organize churches there. He was intending to spend a winter at one of the places named Nicopolis, probably the celebrated city in Epirus. 3. He traveled by Miletus, Troas (where he left a cloak or case and some books), and Corinth. 4. He is a prisoner at Rome, "suffering unto bonds as an evil-doer," and expecting to be soon condemned to death. At this time he felt deserted and solitary, having only Luke, of his old associates, to keep him company; and he was very anxious that Timothy should come to him without delay from Ephesus, and bring Mark with him.

Accused no longer merely about questions of the law, but as a common malefactor (for so the Christians were regarded in the Neronian persecution), with no Julius to recommend and no Burrus to protect him, Paul's state may be inferred from the words, feebly rendered in our version, "wherein I suffer trouble, as an evil doer" (or felon), "even unto bonds" (2 Tim. 2 : 9)—bonds more like those at Philippi than his former chain at Rome. But even now, as well as then, he could add, "but the word of God is not bound"; and the converts, whose names appear for the first time in this Epistle—Eubulus, Pudens, Linus, and Claudia—derive a special luster from their profession being made amid such dangers, and from its contrast to the falling away of older friends.

The interval, whether longer or shorter, exhibits the apostle to us in one of the most interesting aspects of his life, as "a pattern to them which should hereafter believe on Christ to life everlasting." An attentive reader of the Second Epistle to Timothy will observe how the glorious principles which sustained the apostle in the prospect of martyrdom are stated for the very purpose of fortifying the disciple. And how these principles sustained the apostle's own mind, and put the climax to the moral grandeur and spiritual glory of his career, can be told in no words except his own. S.

The Martyrdom of Paul.—The privileges of Roman citizenship exempted Paul from the ignominious death of lingering torture, which had been lately inflicted on so many of his brethren. He was to die by decapitation; and he was led out to execution beyond the city walls, upon the road to Ostia, the port of Rome. Through the dust and tumult of a busy throng, the small troop of soldiers threaded their way silently, under the bright sky of an Italian midsummer. They were marching, though they knew it not, in a procession more truly triumphal than any they had ever followed, in the train of general or emperor, along the Sacred Way. Their prisoner, now at last and for ever delivered from his captivity, rejoiced to follow his Lord "without the gate." The place of execution was not far distant, and there the sword of the headsman ended his long course of sufferings, and released that heroic soul from that feeble body. Weeping friends took up his corpse, and carried it for burial to those subterranean labyrinths where, through many ages of oppression, the persecuted Church found refuge for the living and sepulchres for the dead.

Thus died the Apostle, the Prophet, and the Martyr, bequeathing to the Church, in her government and her discipline, the legacy of his apostolic labors, leaving his prophetic words to be her living oracles, pouring forth his blood to be the seed of a thousand martyrdoms. Thenceforth, among the glorious company of the Apostles, among the goodly fellowship of the Prophets, among the noble army of Martyrs, his name has stood preëminent as the great teacher of a universal redemption—the herald of glad tidings to all mankind. C.

THE ACTS AS A DOCTRINAL LINK BETWEEN THE GOSPELS AND EPISTLES.

BETWEEN GOSPELS and Epistles there is need for a connection of a more internal kind. During the intervening time the doctrine was not only spreading, it was clearing and forming itself, or rather was being cleared and formed by the hand of its divine author. This was effected through a certain line of events and through the agency of particular persons. With these events and persons the Book of Acts is occupied. It begins at Jerusalem, it ends at Rome. Between these two points questions have been settled, principles carried out, and divinely implanted tendencies disclosed. Especially have the relations of the gospel to Jew and Gentile been fixed for ever. But the rejection of Jews and admission of Gentiles were not the only result of this long history. Another result has been involved in it: Christianity itself has been finely drawn out of Judaism, the delicate and intricate relations of the two systems being dealt with in such a way, that (so to speak) the texture of living fiber has been lifted unimpaired out of its former covering, leaving behind only a residuum of what was temporary, preparatory, and carnal. In fact, the doctrine of the gospel has been cleared and formed; cleared of the false element which the existing Judaism would have infused into it, and formed of the true elements which the old covenant had been intended to prepare for its use. THE EPISTLES:

THEIR CHARACTER, AND THEIR RELATION TO THE GOSPELS.

Section 235.

OBSERVE the point at which we have arrived, by the time that we finish the book of Acts, and open the Epistle to the Romans. The facts of the manifestation of Christ have been completed, and have been testified in all fullness and certainty by the witnesses chosen of God. They have not only testified of the facts, they have summed them up; have announced their scope and purpose in the counsels of God, as effecting the redemption of the world, and have called men to partake in the fruits of that redemption by believing and being baptized. They have given this testimony, not as of themselves, but with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven, whose witness is united with their own, and whose indwelling presence is given also to those who receive the testimony, in order to open its meaning and to seal its truth. Thus a holy Church is formed, which gradually proves itself catholic, and shows at once its power of expansion and its spirit of unity; and within its protecting framework there exists a communion of saints, a common participation in the same spiritual possessions by all whom a union with Christ has separated and sanctified to God; and thus men are joined to the Lord and united with each other, and rest in the consciousness that they have found the forgiveness of sins, the resurrection of the body, and the life everlasting. In its fundamental articles the creed is now complete.

To this point the book of Acts conducts us, and at this point it leaves us. The Father revealed, the Son incarnate, the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven—redemption wrought, salvation given, the resurrection of the body, the eternal judgment, the second death, the life eternal—new principles of thought, new standards of character, new grounds of duty, new motives, new powers, new bonds between man and man, new forms of human society, new language for human lips—all coming at once upon men's minds, placed them, as it were, in a different world from that in which they had lived before. At the same time they carried into that world of thought all the tendencies, infirmities, and perversities of our nature, and revealed truth had to settle itself into lasting forms, to find its adequate expression, and to have its moral and social consequences deduced, under a variety of influences uncongenial to itself. So critical a period, on which the whole future of the gospel hung, would seem to cry aloud for a continued action of the living Word of God; such as might, with supreme authority, both judge and guide the thoughts of men, and translate the principles which they had received into life and practice.

The Lord recognized this necessity. He met it by the living voice of his apostles; and their Epistles remain as the permanent record of this part of their work. They are the voice of the Spirit speaking within the Church to those who are themselves within it, certifying to them the true interpretations and applications of the principles of thought and life which as believers in Jesus they have received. Christ has been received; Christian life has commenced; Christian communities have been formed; and men's minds have been at work on the great principles which they have embraced. Some of these principles in one place, and others of them in another, have been imperfectly grasped, or positively perverted, or practically misapplied, so as to call for explanation or correction; or else they have been both apprehended and applied so worthily, that the teacher, filled with joy and praise, feels able to open out the mysteries of God, as one speaking wisdom among them that are perfect. These conditions of mind were not individual accidents. Rome, Corinth, Galatia, Ephesus, supplied examples of different tendencies of the human mind in connection with the principles of the gospel—tendencies which would ever recur, and on which it was requisite for the future guidance of the Church that the Word of God should pronounce. It did pronounce in the most effectual way, by those letters which are addressed by the commissioners of Christ, not to possible but to actual cases, with that largeness of view which belongs to spectators at a certain distance from the scene, and with that closeness of application which personal acquaintance dictates and personal affection inspires. Thus the fuller expositions of truth contained in the Epistles are based on what the first principles of the gospel had already wrought in human hearts; and its doctrines are cleared and settled, developed and combined, in correspondence with the ascertained capacities and necessities of believers. T. D. B.

There is a most observable wisdom in that arrangement of the revelation of God to man, by which so large and important a portion of its contents is conveyed in the peculiar form of epistles; of epistles, which, being the exact medium between the familiar flow of ordinary discourse and the methodical precision of the essay, may be said to unite all the characteristic advantages and avoid the peculiar deficiencies of both. Christianity, eminently a practical institute, is taught by practical models; its blessed Founder's precepts live and move embodied in his life; his apostles—like Himself—are not more the deliverers of doctrine than the earnest leaders of action. And just that we may for ever know them as such, we have them with us, not merely in the historical portrait of a contemporary, nor yet in elaborate treatises of their own, where the distinctive personality of the writer might be almost wholly absorbed in his subject—but in letters, that spring out of action and breathe its earnest spirit; in letters, where the soul spontaneously paints its own glowing picture; in letters, the vivid, unconscious transcripts of the inmost heart. W. A. B.

The Epistles resemble the Gospels in their combination of intrinsic unity with extrinsic diversity. As Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, all set before us the same Jesus Christ, so do Paul, James, Peter, John, and Jude, all teach one salvation, one calling, one Comforter, one life, one Church, one hope of the Lord's appearing, one fellowship in faith and love. But, as the evangelists diversify their narratives—each one writing according to his own bent of mind and his own special information, and with adaptation to the persons for or to whom in the first instance he wrote—so do the apostles write variously, in accordance with their intellectual individuality, and with due reference to the state of the churches, or the circumstances of the persons whom they address. The books of the apostles were letters, not decrees; and their directions and commands were accompanied by affectionate persuasions and appeals. They wrote not—"I command you, my people"—but "I beseech you, my beloved brethren." With all his masculine vigor Paul had a wonderful persuasive tenderness. Peter wrote with a beautiful humility. John often used the address of kindness "Beloved," and wrote as a father to his "little children." It is this combination of authority with gentleness, after the manner of Christ himself, which charms us in the Epistles, and makes them so effectual for the inculcation of truth at once on the understanding and on the heart. D. F.

The doctrinal portion of the New Testament consists of thirteen Epistles of Paul, two of Peter, three of John, one Epistle of James, one of Jude, and the anonymous Epistle to the Hebrews, written according to one view by Paul himself, according to another conjecture, by one of his pupils and fellow-laborers, Luke, Barnabas, or Apollos. Most of Paul's Epistles—the two to the Thessalonians, the one to the Galatians, the first to Timothy, the one to Titus, the two to the Corinthians, the one to the Romans—and the Epistle of James, were composed before the Gospels and the Acts, between the years 50 and 60. The Epistles to the Ephesians, to the Colossians, to Philemon, to the Philippian, the second to Timothy, as also the Epistle to the Hebrews and the two Epistles of Peter, and probably that of Jude, belong in the seventh decade, most of them between the years 62 and 64. John's epistles with the fourth Gospel bear all the internal marks of having been written after the destruction of Jerusalem and toward the end of the first century.

The common subject of the doctrine of the apostles is the person of Jesus Christ, the promised Messiah, the true God-man; and the divine life and salvation, which was manifested in Him, was secured to mankind by his self-revelation, death, and resurrection; shaped itself through the Holy Ghost into a church of the redeemed, a means and a fellowship of salvation; is communicated to the individual sinner through faith and the means of grace, the word, and sacraments; works his conversion, justification, sanctification, and eternal blessedness; and will fully develop itself in the glories of Christ's second coming. These are the essential articles of faith, on the living appropriation of which salvation depends, and which the Apostles' Creed (justly called apostolical as to its contents) so beautifully arranges under the three divisions of God the Father and the work of creation, God the Son and the work of redemption, and God the Holy Ghost and the work of sanctification, ending with life everlasting. And in all these points James, Peter, Paul, and John perfectly agree. We can not acknowledge the least inconsistency among the various books of the New Testament either in respect to faith or practice. They are all animated by the same spirit, aim at the same end, and form a truly wonderful harmony. All the apostles and evangelists teach that Jesus of Nazareth is the highest revelation of the only true God; that he perfectly fulfilled the Law and the Prophets; by his death and resurrection reconciled humanity with God and redeemed it from the curse of sin and death; by the outpouring of his Spirit has established an indestructible Church and furnished it with all the means for the regeneration and sanctification of the world; that out of him there is no salvation; that a man must repent and believe in him, and express this faith in his entire life, in order to enjoy the benefits of Christ's mission; and that this life of faith develops itself in individuals and in the Church, under the continual direction of the Holy Ghost through much suffering and tribulation; triumphs at last over all its foes; and becomes gloriously complete at the second advent of the Lord. In short, there is in the apostolical church "one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in you all." P. S.

The surface criticism of Scripture may vary from age to age, but the main lines of interpretation, like the main verities of the faith, are far less likely to undergo change than is the sun to fail in the heavens or the everlasting hills to melt. The Gospel, as it was taught by the Apostles, was a final and perfect revelation. Statements of doctrine may vary in different ages; new statements may be necessary to meet new modes of thought, or fresh forms of evasion, or virtual denials of the original truth, but the number of Christian doctrines can not really be added to, nor can the area of any one Christian doctrine be in any degree enlarged. H. P. L.

We believe these writings to have been intended for what they have since proved, the doctrinal charter of the future Christian Church. Nothing could be less like a system than the teaching of our blessed Lord. In these Epistles, the true comments on that teaching, we may expect great steps to be taken toward systematizing it. The Lord's moral precepts, the Lord's mediatorial acts, are the seeds out of which, under his own direction, by his informing Spirit, the teaching of the apostolic Epistles has grown. The earliest of the Epistles are ever moral and practical, the advanced ones more doctrinal and spiritual. It was not till it appeared that the bulwark of salvation by grace must be strengthened, that the building on the one foundation must be raised thus impregnable to the righteousness of works and the law, that the Epistles to the Galatians and the Romans were given through the great apostle, reaching to the full breadth and height of the great argument. Then followed the Epistles of the imprisonment, building up higher and higher the edifice there consolidated; and the Pastoral Epistles, suited to a more developed ecclesiastical condition, and aimed at the correction of abuses which sprung up later, or were the ripened fruit of former doctrinal errors.

The Chronological order, adopted in the common arrangement of the canon, has been chosen without reference to chronology. It proceeds apparently on consideration of the relative length and importance of the Epistles, giving, however, to Paul the preference. After his thirteen was placed the Epistle to the Hebrews, as being, if not by him, an appendix by some hand almost guided by his. Then followed the "Catholic" Epistles—then the Revelation. This plan has the advantage of something like system, and is, perhaps, for convenience of reference, the best. A.

According to the probable order of time, six were written before Paul's first Roman imprisonment, viz :

- 1 THESSALONIANS, from Corinth, A. D. 52.
- 2 THESSALONIANS, from Corinth, A. D. 53.
- 1 CORINTHIANS, from Ephesus, A. D. 57.
- 2 CORINTHIANS, from Macedonia, A. D. 57.
- GALATIANS, from Corinth, A. D. 57.
- ROMANS, from Corinth, A. D. 58.

Four were written during the first Roman imprisonment (Acts 28), viz :

| PHILEMON, | } A. D. 62. |
| COLOSSIANS, | |
| EPHESIANS, | |
| PHILIPPIANS, | |

Three were written after the imprisonment recorded in Acts 28, probably as follows :

- 1 TIMOTHY, from Macedonia, A. D. 67.
- TITUS, from Ephesus, A. D. 67.
- 2 TIMOTHY, from Rome, A. D. 68. B.

Section 236.

ROMANS I. 1-15.

1 PAUL, a servant of Jesus Christ, called to be an apostle, separated unto the gospel of God,
 2 (which he had promised afore by his prophets in the holy scriptures,) concerning his Son
 3 Jesus Christ our Lord, which was made of the seed of David according to the flesh; and 4 declared to be the Son of God with power, according to the spirit of holiness, by the resur-
 5 rection from the dead: by whom we have received grace and apostleship, for obedience to 6 the faith among all nations, for his name: among whom are ye also the called of Jesus
 7 Christ: to all that be in Rome, beloved of God, called to be saints: Grace to you and peace
 8 from God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ. First, I thank my God through Jesus 9 Christ for you all, that your faith is spoken of throughout the whole world. For God is my witness, whom I serve with my spirit in the gospel of his Son, that without ceasing I 10 make mention of you always in my prayers; making request, if by any means now at length
 11 I might have a prosperous journey by the will of God to come unto you. For I long to see 12 you, that I may impart unto you some spiritual gift, to the end ye may be established; that is, that I may be comforted together with you by the mutual faith both of you and me.
 13 Now I would not have you ignorant, brethren, that oftentimes I purposed to come unto you,
 (but was let hitherto,) that I might have some fruit among you also, even as among other 14 Gentiles. I am debtor both to the Greeks, and to the Barbarians; both to the wise, and to 15 the unwise. So, as much as in me is, I am ready to preach the gospel to you that are at Rome also.

THE Gospel is as old as the first promise. For, from the beginning, man's sinfulness, atonement through vicarious suffering, God's free and righteous mercy, the efficacy of prayer, the necessity of holiness—all were revealed. But now these truths are set forth with new proofs, are enforced by new motives, amid stronger light and for a wider audience. The Gospel is a THREE-fold message—of forgiveness through our Lord, of personal holiness through the renewing and ever-gracious help of the Spirit, of blessedness, amid all earthly changes, for those who love and serve God. Forgiveness, holiness, blessedness! What more can we need? The Gospel is a two-fold message—Christ's work for us, in living, and dying, and pleading, and reigning; and Christ's work in us, beginning in grace and ending in glory. The Gospel is a SINGLE message—of Christ as crucified—the concentrated revelation of the divine holiness and love, the Redeemer and Comforter, the pattern and the sanctifier of us all. This Gospel—threefold, twofold, single—Christ came to found, even more than to teach. Yet it is the gospel he taught, as it is the gospel his apostles taught. And so mighty did it prove that the most successful preacher of the apostolic age resolved, from experience as well as from direct inspiration, to know nothing among men save Jesus Christ and Jesus Christ as crucified. The Jews deemed it no “sign,” no embodiment of power, and the Greeks deemed it foolishness; but he found it to be power and wisdom; nay, more, the power of God and the wisdom of God. J. A.

EPISTLE TO THE ROMANS.

At some time during his stay at Corinth for the winter 57-58, he probably wrote the Epistle to the Galatians. The great subject which the fickleness of the Galatian Church had brought into prominence had been much before his mind. “Ye are all children of God through faith in Christ Jesus”; this wrought, and was kept fermenting by the Divine Spirit in his thoughts, and, as centuries after in him who was to enforce the great doctrine in ages of corruption, so now in the ear of the Apostle of the Gentiles, “The just shall live by faith,” was ever sounding. Coincident with this engrossing of his thoughts by this one great theme, came news from the now growing and important Church in the metropolis of the world; news that in it, as so often elsewhere, the Jew and Gentile elements were not in Christian accord; that questions of precedence and questions of observance wanted settling among them. What more natural than that the apostle should regard the tidings thus brought as furnishing an opportunity for laying forth the great doctrine of “Life by Faith” for the Church of God? He had long been intending to visit the Roman Church. It was of necessity the most important Christian community in the world. It would be sure to receive the greatest future accessions; it had the advantage of the greatest publicity, and the widest ventilation, for any truth delivered to it. An occasion then having arisen for a letter to explain and settle the misconceptions which had grown up among the Romans, what wonder if the great apostle availed himself of it to lay forth to them the whole dispensation of God’s grace to Jew and Gentile? Phœbe, a deaconess of the Church at Cenchrea, the port of Corinth, was traveling to Rome. She had won, by her acts of beneficence to the Church and to himself, the apostle’s approval and esteem. She therefore (for we can hardly otherwise understand chapter 16: 1, 2) becomes the bearer of the Epistle. The letter was most probably sent from Corinth in the spring of A. D. 58. Three years after, in the beginning of A. D. 61, the apostle arrived a prisoner at Rome. A. (Read page 143.)

The history of the Roman community is most remarkable. It grew up in silence, founded by some unknown teachers, probably of those who were present in Jerusalem at the first publication of Christianity by the apostles. During the reign of Claudius, it had made so much progress as to excite open tumults and dissensions among the Jewish population of Rome; these animosities rose to such a height, that the attention of the government was aroused, and both parties expelled from the city. With some of these exiles, Aquila and Priscilla, Paul formed an intimate connection during his first visit at Corinth; from them he received information of the extraordinary progress of the faith in Rome. The Jews seem quietly to have crept back to their old quarters when the rigor with which the imperial edict was at first executed had insensibly relaxed; and from these persons on their return to the capital, and most likely from other Roman Christians who may have taken refuge in Corinth, or in other cities where Paul had founded Christian communities, the more perfect knowledge of the higher Christianity, taught by the Apostle of the Gentiles, would be conveyed to Rome. So complete, indeed, does he appear to consider the first establishment of Christianity in Rome, that he merely proposes to take that city on his way to a more remote region, that of Spain. The manner in which he recounts in the last chapter the names of the more distinguished Roman converts implies both that the community was numerous and that the name of Paul was held in high estimation by its leading members. It is evident that Christianity had advanced already beyond the Jewish population, and the question of necessary conformity to the Mosaic law was strongly agitated. It is therefore the main scope of this celebrated Epistle to annul for ever this claim of the Mosaic law to a perpetual authority, to show Christianity as a part of the providential design in the moral history of man, while Judaism was but a temporary institution, unequal to, as it was unintended for, the great end of revealing the immortality of mankind, altogether repealed by this more wide and universal system, which comprehends in its beneficent purposes the whole human race. Milman.

It seems probable that the Church was composed of Jews and Gentiles in nearly equal proportions. This fact will account for the general character of this Epistle, so unlike that of the Epistles to the Corinthians and Galatians, though written at nearly the same time. The Gospel had to contend in Rome, not specially with Judaism, nor specially with heathenism, but with both together. The letter, evidently, was not written to answer any doubts, or to settle any existing controversies then rife at Rome. It has no special character or application, thus differing widely from the other Epistles just referred to. There is only one instance of special application to the Church of the metropolis. The injunction (13: 1) of obedience to temporal rulers would most fitly be laid upon a Church brought face to face with the imperial government, and the more so as Rome had been the scene of frequent disturbances, on the part of either Jews or Christians, arising out of a feverish and restless anticipation of Messiah’s coming. In the Epistles to the Corinthians and to the Galatians, recently written, we see the attitude of the gospel toward the Gentile and the Jewish world respectively. They are direct and special, evoked by present emergencies, and are full of personal applications. The Epistle to the Romans is the summary of what he had written before, the result of his dealing with the two antagonistic forms of error, the gathering together of the fragmentary teaching in the Corinthian and Galatian letters, in a general form. J. B. L.

Throughout the discussion, constant reference is made to law and justice; and this is characteristic of the Epistle. When Paul wrote to the Corinthians, he gave prominence to wisdom, for the Greeks sought after wisdom. But Rome was the city of imperial law, and the great seat of jurisprudence and government. It was therefore fitting that to Jews and Gentiles residing there, should be addressed this demonstration of the position of mankind, as transgressors condemned by divine law and justice, and unable by deeds to justify themselves. The world centered at ancient Rome; and in a letter sent to Rome was the whole world proved and pronounced to have "been guilty before God." D. F.

1-7. These words are the beginning and end of the long superscription which opens the series of Apostolic Epistles. That superscription forms a close and living union with the preceding book, in which we have known Paul the servant of Jesus Christ, his calling to be an apostle, his separation to the gospel of God, and have left him at its close testifying to that gospel in Rome itself. Here the apostle seems to stand before us as he did in the previous history, firmly holding his ground in the prophetic and historic line of the old covenant, and from that standing-point opening the dispensation of the Spirit, which has its source and its pledge in the resurrection, and claiming "all nations" for the "obedience of faith." T. D. B.—It would seem as if the apostle had before his mind the metropolitan majesty of the imperial city of Rome, and set against it the majesty of the great revelation of the Son of God, the fulfillment of the world-long promise, the temple of the indwelling Spirit poured out upon mankind, the first-born from the dead. He looked upon all the world obedient to the sway of Rome, and he thought upon that wider and grander obedience of faith which should bring under its sway all nations of the earth. There is not a grander thing in literature than this opening of the Epistle to the Romans. A.

2-4. The original and peculiar glory of the Bible is its revelation of the Messiah. Deity must be presented, and not merely in some of his attributes, nor yet as a shadowy form on the distant clouds of his own glory, but as a well-defined personality. God in man, thinking, feeling, speaking, acting in human relations, proposing the recovery of the lost to an immortality of holiness, solving the mighty problem of remitting Law's penalty while adding sanction to its claims, gathering from the apparent weakness of death the resurrection forces of eternal life, and out of the mists of the tomb clothing his redeemed ones with the garments of glory. The Bible utters thoughts that could originate only in Jehovah's breast, pencils the ideal of the man who is his fellow, and reveals the clear impressions of the mold into which was cast the life of Jesus of Nazareth, who at its close was "declared to be the Son of God, with power according to the Spirit of Holiness by the resurrection from the dead." T. D. A.—Nothing speaks more decisively for the divinity of Christ than these juxtapositions of Christ with the eternal God, which run through the whole language of Scripture, and the derivation of purely divine influences from him also. Ols.

14. We might say, he is debtor to God, to Christ, to the Cross. But these are not now in his mind. It is to Greek and Jew, wise and unwise, men of all nations, the whole fallen world, that he feels himself a debtor. It was when Paul became possessed of the unsearchable riches of Christ that he felt himself a debtor to the world. To God himself he can not pay this debt directly, but he can indirectly, by pouring out the God-given treasure upon others. His debt directly is to God; but then, indirectly, it is to the world. Thus the Christian man feels his debt—his obligation to the world because of his obligation to God. Bonar.—When human knowledge and life are spreading out into ever wider circuits, the Christian ministry must seek to show itself a debtor to men of every class and character, and must endeavor to prove that there is no department of thought or action which can not be touched by that gospel which is the manifold wisdom of God. The more we study the way of God's commandments, the more shall we find it as broad as his other works, and increasingly rich to meet all the developments of human nature. Ker.

If Paul felt himself "a debtor both to the Greeks and to the barbarians," what has the Church now become to the whole unchristianized world? A debtor indeed, involved in a debt which she will never have done paying till the last of an unconverted race shall, under her leading, have come home to God. When we call on her members for their silver and their gold—ay, for their whole bodies and souls—we do not call on them for charity; we call on them to aid in the payment of a simple debt—a debt which we most righteously owe. The particular church which will not engage in sending the gospel to the heathen, which perseveringly holds back from this work of debt-paying, can not live. Its very spirit, and the measures which that spirit dictates, will, even at home, shut it out from quickening, life-sustaining influences. It will die. J. S. S.

PAUL'S DOCTRINAL POSITION.

PAUL'S doctrine, like his life, centers in the great antithesis of the want of salvation before Christ and the supply of salvation in Christ. Before Christ and out of Christ is, with him, the reign of sin and death; after Christ and in Christ, the reign of right, eousness and life. There he sees the killing letter; here the life-giving Spirit. There, bondage and curse; here, freedom and blessed sonship. There, a powerless struggle between flesh and spirit and a cry for redemption; here, no condemnation, but wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption, and the inseparable communion of the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus. Hence he opposes no error so decidedly and vehemently as the Judaizing, which would degrade Christianity to the former level of bondage and death.

Much as Paul insists, however, on the absolute newness of Christianity and its infinite elevation, not only above heathenism, but also above Judaism, he still forgets not its historical and religious connection with the Old Testament. He represents the way as positively prepared for the Christian religion by the Old Testament revelation. He calls the law a schoolmaster to lead to Christ, and describes the gospel as promised before by the prophets. There is, therefore, a connecting link between the Jew Saul and the Christian Paul, between the two stages of his religious experience and views. This link is the idea of righteousness, which forms the center and fundamental principle of his system of faith and morals. While a Pharisee, he had striven with all his might after righteousness in the way of obedience to the law of Moses. Even his persecution of Christ, whom he took for a revolutionary opponent of the Old Testament religion, proceeded from this honest effort. But in faith in the very One he persecuted he found righteousness, and with it peace and salvation. After his conversion he saw this to be absolutely impossible without faith in Christ and the renewal of the whole man. Now he learned that all men, Jews as well as Gentiles, are by nature without righteousness, and can be made righteous and be saved only through the merits of Jesus Christ. If he had previously laid the chief stress on the law and on works, he now laid it all on free grace, and on living faith, which appropriates Christ and his atoning death. Hence he may justly be called the apostle of faith, or of the righteousness of faith.

Paul accordingly distinguishes two kinds of righteousness: 1. Man's own righteousness, or the righteousness of the law, also called righteousness of works, which man strives after, but in reality can never attain, by his natural power, and which is therefore altogether imaginary. The ground of this impossibility of a self-righteousness, which would stand before God and establish a claim to salvation, is not in the law—for this is good, holy, spiritual—but in the corruption of man, in his carnal nature, which must be regenerated and renewed by the grace of God, before it can perform anything truly good. 2. The righteousness of God or from God, i. e., the righteousness which comes from God and is acceptable to him; or the righteousness of faith, i. e., the righteousness which springs from faith in Christ as the only and all-sufficient Saviour; is vitally apprehended by faith, and is imputed and given to the believer by God, without merit, without the deeds of the law, in free grace. The righteousness of faith also, being of this character, necessarily excludes all boasting, and yields the glory to God alone.

The divine act, by which man comes into possession of this righteousness, is denoted by the expressions: justification, to justify, to count for righteousness. This Pauline doctrine of justification is evidently founded on the notion of a judicial process. The holy and just God is the judge; the law of God, the accuser; the sinner or transgressor of the law, the accused; conscience, the witness; Christ the advocate and substitute for the accused; the atoning death and the merits of Christ, the price of redemption; faith, the instrument, the spiritual hand of the penitent sinner, by which these merits are appropriated. The justification itself is (1) negative, the judicial sentence of God, in which he pronounces the sinner, for the sake of Christ, free from the curse of the law, from the guilt and punishment of transgression—in other words, the forgiveness of sins, pardon; (2) positive, the imputation and actual communication of the righteousness of Christ to the penitent, believing sinner. The communication on the part of God and appropriation on the part of man take place by means of faith, which is wrought by the Holy Ghost in the Church through the word and the sacraments, and is not, indeed, the objective ground, the efficient cause, yet the indispensable subjective condition and instrumental cause, of justification; since, renouncing all merit of its own, it lays vital hold on the grace of God and the merits of Christ, and receives them into itself. By faith the man is raised out of his sinful state, united with Christ, and wrought more and more into His holy being, so that the old man no longer lives, but Christ lives and moves in him. Of course such a faith is absolutely inseparable from love and good works. An antinomian disjunction of faith from its fruits, as also of justification from sanctification, is a radical and most dangerous abuse of Paul's doctrine, which he himself repelled with horror.

In this comprehensive moral contrast between false self-righteousness, which works death, and the true righteousness of God, which is life and salvation, Paul's whole system centers. It may, therefore, be best presented in two sections. The first part treats of the want of righteousness, or the condition of man before and out of Christ. This is the reign of the first, natural, earthly Adam, or the reign of sin and death, appearing partly in unguided heathenism, partly in the disciplinary institution of legal Judaism; though in the latter case connected with divine promises and significant types and anticipations of the future. The larger, positive section has to do with the gospel, the absolute religion of liberty and divine sonship—setting forth the true righteousness as offered in Christ and appropriated by faith. This is the reign of the second, spiritual, heavenly Adam, or of grace and life.

This plan is not one arbitrarily forced upon the doctrinal system of the Gentile apostle, but lies clear enough on its surface in this, his most methodical and systematic epistle. Here, after the introduction, he first states the essence of Christianity by saying that "it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth; to the Jew first, and also to the Greek. For therein is the righteousness of God revealed from faith to faith: as it is written, The just shall live by faith" (Rom. 1: 16, 17). This is the theme, the leading thought of the Epistle. In unfolding this the apostle first proves that all men, not only the Gentiles (1: 19, 32), but also the Jews (2: 1-3, 20), are by nature destitute of righteousness, and therefore of salvation and life, and are sinners worthy of condemnation. Then from chapter 3: 21 onward he shows that Christ has fulfilled righteousness and procured life and salvation; that these are imparted to us through firm, living faith; that this faith gives the most troubled conscience peace, and reveals itself in a holy life of love and gratitude. P. S.

Every proof that could be made to consist with the rules of evidence establishes the truth of the Christian religion. The subject of the Christian religion is the controversy to which sin has given birth between God and man; the matter of the Revelation it contains is the announcement of absolute forgiveness through the mediation of Christ. And what is the complexion or character of this gospel remission? It is not the consequence of the abrogation of law; it is not a repeal of penalties; it is not a disparagement of supreme Wisdom; it is not a deduction from the supposed power of inflicting punishment; and especially, it is not such a mere act of grace as, in the nature of the case, must not stretch very far, lest the punishment of any should seem a captious severity, and pardon an unavoidable compromise. The pardon of the gospel is pardon for a reason: that is to say, it is pardon granted in compliance with a rule, higher, or more comprehensive, than the law which was broken. The pardon of the gospel, therefore, may be extended without reserve; because the reason whence it flows is greater than all other reasons. Even if it were to appear at the last that the myriad has received pardon, and the thousand has been left to endure punishment, the principles of administration would not be sullied; because, while the demands of justice are definite, the provision of grace is unbounded. Grace encompasses justice. And yet, if in any manner we surrender the Divine dignity of the Mediator, the reason of pardon at once disappears, and the government of God is clouded; or the conscience of man receives no lasting peace. Conscience may indeed remain in its native slumber, or it may embrace flatteries; but when once it is quickened, when once the purity of law, and the impartiality and vigor of the divine government have been admitted, and the thought of standing at the tribunal of God has firmly lodged itself in the mind, the well-founded fear of condemnation is in no way to be allayed, until the substitute of the sinner is known to be the very party whom the sinner has insulted. Section 237.

ROMANS i. 16-32.

16 FOR I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ: for it is the power of God unto salvation to 17 every one that believeth; to the Jew first, and also to the Greek. For therein is the 18 righteousness of God revealed from faith to faith: as it is written, The just shall live by 19 faith. For the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unright-
20 eousness of men, who hold the truth in unrighteousness; because that which may be known 21 of God is manifest in them; for God hath shewed it unto them. For the invisible things 22 of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that 23 are made, even his eternal power and Godhead; so that they are without excuse: because 24 that, when they knew God, they glorified him not as God, neither were thankful; but 25 became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened. Professing them-
26 selves to be wise, they became fools, and changed the glory of the uncorruptible God into an 27 image made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and fourfooted beasts, and creeping things.
28 Wherefore God also gave them up to uncleanness through the lusts of their own hearts, to 29 dishonor their own bodies between themselves: who changed the truth of God into a lie, 30 and worshipped and served the creature more than the Creator, who is blessed for ever.
31 Amen.

26 For this cause God gave them up unto vile affections: for even their women did change 27 the natural use into that which is against nature: and likewise also the men, leaving the 28 natural use of the woman, burned in their lust one toward another; men with men working 29 that which is unseemly, and receiving in themselves that recompense of their error which 30 was meet. And even as they did not like to retain God in their knowledge, God gave them 31 over to a reprobate mind, to do those things which are not convenient; being filled with 32 all unrighteousness, fornication, wickedness, covetousness, maliciousness: full of envy, 33 murder, debate, deceit, malignity; whisperers, backbiters, haters of God, despiteful, proud, 34 boasters, inventors of evil things, disobedient to parents, without understanding, covenant-
35 breakers, without natural affection, implacable, unmerciful: who knowing the judgment 36 of God, that they which commit such things are worthy of death, not only do the same, but 37 have pleasure in them that do them.

MAN had degraded God, says the apostle, and God degraded man. Man can only degrade God in his conceptions of Him. He may think meanly and poorly of God, instead of investing Him in his ideas with every perfection. And this is just what took place. Man might have learned from Nature (for Nature is a revelation of God to a rational creature) the lesson of God's eternal power and Godhead, had he been so minded; His magnificence, wisdom, benevolence, are written in no obscure characters on the whole frame of the universe. But man could not, rather he would not, rise to those lofty conceptions of God's character which Nature, studied with a simple and docile heart, furnishes. Man would not think of God as a Being infinitely raised above even 'the noblest works of His hands; he confounded Him with the creatures that were derived from him, and allowed the religious instinct—the instinct of worship—to fasten upon them instead of the Creator. In a word, idolatry (or the surrounding the creature with the attributes of the Creator) is the original, fundamental sin of man—the point of departure from which man started on his downward course until he reached the lowest depths of wickedness. Man debased God in his conceptions of Him. And God, as the meet recompense of such dishonor done Him, really and actually debased man by abandoning him to the dominion of vices, the very mention of which freezes the blood of an upright man. E. M. G.

17. The words "the just," or "the righteous shall live by faith," might also be understood, "the righteous by faith," "those that are righteous by faith," "shall live." A.—I noticed how the words are connected together, "the righteousness of God is revealed in the gospel, as it is written, The just shall live by faith." I saw the apostle's meaning, that by the gospel is made known that righteousness which avails with God, in which God, out of mere mercy, makes us righteous through faith. On this I felt as if I was wholly born anew. The precious Scripture now appeared quite another thing to me. I ran quickly through the whole Bible, and collected all that it says on the subject. And thus, as I had hated the expression, "God's righteousness," I began dearly to love it as the gladdest word in Scripture; and that passage became to me the very gate of heaven. Luther.—Like a nail in a sure place this saying sticks in Luther's memory. He wanders through the convent, he trudges it to Rome, he crawls up Pilate's staircase, but still the sentence is sounding in his ear. Through seas of anguish and dismay he buffets his laboring path, no ray to guide him but this tiny spark, till all at once at that little spark Luther's soul is kindled, and the Reformation-beacon flames. Hamilton.

18. The origin of the atonement is to be sought in the righteous wrath of God against sin. Paul recognizes the wrath of God as the fundamental fact in which we are to seek for an explanation of that scheme. "Herein," says he (that is, in the gospel), "is the righteousness of God revealed." And then, commencing the explanation necessary to elucidate these words, he adds: "For the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness" (sin against the first table) "and unrighteousness" (sin against the second table) "of men." The idea is perfectly simple. God has given us a law, involving duty to himself and duty to our fellow-men—a law promulgated explicitly to the Jew, and graver in characters, not obliterated, yet dim and confused through the fall, on the hearts of all mankind. God is a Spirit, a searcher of the thoughts and intents of the heart; and, therefore, a mere outward observance of this law, in the letter of it, can never meet his requirements. All mankind have broken the law either literally or spiritually, or both; and, by the violation, God's displeasure is incurred. E. M. G.

"The wrath of God is revealed from heaven." This saying contains a deep and awful truth. God's punishment is God's wrath against sin; and is not merely the consequence of lifeless laws, but the expression of the feeling of a living spirit. It would be most perilous to do away with these words; for if the wrath of God be only a figure, his love must be but a figure too. F. W. R.—The revelation is given on purpose that we may avoid that wrath; for the wrath is future, and we are commanded to flee from it; and faith in it is requisite, before the experience of it, that we may flee from it. The most vivid images of Scripture are but faint and inadequate shadowings forth of the reality; they demonstrate and unveil it as far as possible, but they require belief. Our blessed Lord makes his appeal to our very senses, as far as it can be made. He takes the torture which is most terrible to us, that from which our sensitive nature shrinks back with the greatest horror and repugnance, and constructs a world out of it, and carries us into the midst of that world, as in the tremendous colloquy between Lazarus in heaven and the lost man in hell; so that we see the flames, we hear the wail of souls tormented, we observe the anguish of despair. G. B. C.

20. The apostle says that the invisible things of God, even his eternal power and Godhead, "are clearly seen from the creation of the world" (i. e., God's creation of the world is the source from which true information respecting his lofty attributes may be gained), "so that they" (the Gentiles) "are without excuse," because the lessons which they might have learned of God from Nature are quite sufficient to have condemned their idolatries. E. M. G.—Various as have been God's dealings with the world, there is, after all, a terrible impartiality in his dispensations to his rational creatures. Wherever men possess reason and conscience, they possess in some measure the means of pleasing or displeasing him; whenever they can, in the lowest degree, conceive his law, they are bound to obey it. He can estimate every district and age of the world by the standards appropriate to each. And as He contemplates the vast prospect, Christian and heathen—as he beholds in the one division those to whom Christ was hidden, but who would perhaps have “received him gladly”; in the other those to whom Christ was revealed, but who despised and neglected the revelation—he doubtless can bring men to a level, balancing their opportunities against their actions to a degree wholly unattainable by our weak and perplexed vision. W. A. B.

21. A man may lose the good things of this life against his will; but, if he loses eternal blessings, he does so with his own consent. Aug.—The more carefully we observe the workings of our own wills, the surer will be our conviction that they can ruin themselves. We shall indeed find that they can not be forced or ruined from the outside. But if we watch the influence upon the will itself, of its own wrong decisions and its own yielding to temptations, we shall discover that the voluntary faculty may be ruined from within; may be made impotent to holiness by its own action; may surrender itself to appetite and selfishness with such an intensity and entireness that it becomes unable to convert itself and overcome its own wrong inclination. And yet there is no extraneous compulsion, from first to last, in the process. The man follows himself. He pursues his own inclinations. He has his own way, and does as he pleases. He loves what he inclines to love, and hates what he inclines to hate. Neither God, nor the world, nor Satan himself, forces him to do wrong. It is the most spontaneous of self-motion. But self-motion has consequences as much as any other motion. Because sin is a free act, it does not follow that it has no results, and leaves the will precisely as it found it. It is strictly true that man was not compelled to apostatize; but it is equally true that, if of his own will he did apostatize, he could not then and afterward be as he was before. He would lose knowledge; his understanding would become darkened. And he would lose spiritual power; his will would become impotent to holiness. Shedd.

22. The term spiritual folly includes not only those who are in the common sense of the term foolish, but a great many who are in the common sense of the terms prudent, sensible, thoughtful, and wise. It is but too evident that some of the ablest men who have ever lived upon earth have been in no less a degree spiritually fools. And thus it is not without much truth that Christian writers have dwelt upon the insufficiency of worldly wisdom, and have warned their readers to beware lest, while professing themselves to be wise, they should be accounted as fools in the sight of God. T. A.

23-32. Roman society was a living commentary upon the words of John, “All that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, is not of the Father.” The principle known to formal theology as “concupiscence,” and to popular language as active selfishness, was everywhere dominant. It was embodied in the whole social and political fabric of the empire. It was displayed in its triple form of unrestricted sensuality, unchecked covetousness, and unbounded self-assertion. As sensuality, it was preying upon the strength and manhood of the people. As covetousness, it was drying up the wealth of provinces and the sources of enterprise. As pride, it was everywhere in active conflict with personal and social liberty. But these effects, outward and political, were harmless compared with the degradation inflicted by unchecked self-worship upon the human soul within. When man is his own center, his own ideal, his own end, his own God; when the indulgence of passion, and the acquisition of income, and general self-assertion are leading and uncontrolled principles of action, the human character sinks to a point of degradation which language can shadow out, but which it can not describe. The Roman Christians must have recognized the society around them, the men and women with whom they had daily dealings as fellow citizens, in the dark and terrible touches of this first chapter. H. P. L.

This picture of the moral state of heathendom is not a whit overwrought. Its truth is confirmed by the astounding representations of the corruption of those times of the empire, which we find in the most celebrated and earnest-minded heathen writers. Wherever Tacitus, the greatest of Roman historians, looks, whether to heaven or upon earth, he sees nothing but black night and deeds of cruelty. He feels that the destruction of the world is near, when she must drink the cup of divine wrath to the dregs. The elder Pliny, too, lost in wonder at the works of nature, could enjoy no rest in contemplating them. He could find nothing certain, but that there was no certainty; and nothing more miserable than man. He could wish for no greater blessing than a speedy death; and this he found in the flames of Vesuvius (A. D. 79). P. S.—Paul’s terrible indictment is not more severe than the indignant assertions of Seneca. He compares society, where every one makes his profit by injuring somebody else, to the life of gladiators, who live together to fight each other. “All things,” he says, “are full of crimes and vices. More is perpetrated than can be removed by force. There is a struggle to see which will excel in iniquity. Daily the appetite for sin increases, the sense of shame diminishes. Casting away all respect for right and justice, lust hurries whithersoever it will. Crimes are no longer secret; they stalk before the eyes of men. Iniquity has so free a course in public, it so dominates in all hearts, that innocence is not only rare—it does not exist at all. It is not a case of violations of law in individual cases, few in number. From all sides, as at a given signal, men rush together, confounding good and evil." He then proceeds to specify, in a long catalogue, the forms of iniquity, some of them revolting and unnatural crimes, which exhibited themselves on every hand. G. P. F.—Such was the state of things in the days in which Christianity appeared. Pleasure mounted the throne, shame departed from the heart. Religion, long the fruitful source of unbelief, superstition, and immorality, could not offer a remedy. Even philosophy sat down perplexed. The human understanding had run through the circle in which, left to itself, it could move. A Cato and Cesar dared publicly confess that the belief in an eternal existence was fabulous, and that on yonder side of the grave neither sorrow nor joy was to be expected. The elder Pliny makes the undisguised declaration "that all inquiry after a higher truth may be denominated ridiculous, and that it is to be doubted which is more advantageous to mankind, the skepticism of some or the disgraceful religion of others, yea, that this alone is certain, that absolutely nothing certain exists, and that a more wretched as well as prouder creature than man does not exist." Van O.

28, 29. If you take away a man's knowledge, you do not bring him to the state of an infant, but to that of a brute; and of one of the most mischievous and malignant of the brute creation. For you do not lessen or weaken the man's body by lowering his mind; he still retains his strength and his passions, the passions leading to self-indulgence, the strength which enables him to feed them by continued gratification. T. A.—The result of that old idolatry was the indulgence of fleshly lust. And the language of the apostle precisely describes the connection between the cause and the effect. They did not like to retain God in their knowledge. They had supplied to them ever by their conscience a higher ideal; not perhaps the highest, nor even in itself very high, but still higher than could be represented by their gross worship. They felt higher instincts, higher impulses. But they put the lower above the higher, and the end was the downright dominion of the lower nature. F. T.—The teaching here is plain and indisputable. God gave men the means of knowing his perfections and his will. From these they turned away, because they did not like to retain God in their knowledge, and chose and worshiped the meanest reptiles, nay, even the images of beasts instead of the Creator. Against such awful impiety he displayed his displeasure, or made known his wrath, by allowing them without restraint to pursue their own course. He gave them over. The consequence was, a condition of the most degraded iniquity and more than brutish sensuality and lust. F. W.

Section 238.

ROMANS ii. 1-29.

1 THEREFORE thou art inexcusable, O man, whosoever thou art that judgest; for wherein thou judgest another, thou condemnest thyself; for thou that judgest doest the same things.
 2 But we are sure that the judgment of God is according to truth against them which commit
 3 such things. And thinkest thou this, O man, that judgest them which do such things, and 4 doest the same, that thou shalt escape the judgment of God? Or despisest thou the riches of his goodness and forbearance and longsuffering; not knowing that the goodness of God 5 leadeth thee to repentance? But after thy hardness and impenitent heart treasurest up unto thyself wrath against the day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment of 6 God; who will render to every man according to his deeds: to them who by patient con-
 7 tinuance in well doing seek for glory and honour and immortality, eternal life: but unto 8 them that are contentious, and do not obey the truth, but obey unrighteousness, indignation
 9 and wrath, tribulation and anguish, upon every soul of man that doeth evil, of the Jew
 10 first, and also of the Gentile; but glory, honour, and peace, to every man that worketh
 11 good, to the Jew first, and also to the Gentile: for there is no respect of persons with God.
 12 For as many as have sinned without law shall also perish without law: and as many as have 13 sinned in the law shall be judged by the law; (for not the hearers of the law are just before 14 God, but the doers of the law shall be justified. For when the Gentiles, which have not the law, do by nature the things contained in the law, these, having not the law, are a law 15 unto themselves: which shew the work of the law written in their hearts, their conscience also bearing witness, and their thoughts the mean while accusing or else excusing one another;) in the day when God shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ according to my gospel.

17 Behold, thou art called a Jew, and retest in the law, and makest thy boast of God, and 18 knowest his will, and approvest the things that are more excellent, being instructed out of 19 the law; and art confident that thou thyself art a guide of the blind, a light of them which 20 are in darkness, an instructor of the foolish, a teacher of babes, which hast the form of 21 knowledge and of the truth in the law. Thou therefore which teachest another, teachest 22 thou not thyself? thou that preachest a man should not steal, dost thou steal? Thou that sayest a man should not commit adultery, dost thou commit adultery? thou that abhorrest 23 idols, dost thou commit sacrilege? Thou that makest thy boast of the law, through break-
 24 ing the law dishonourest thou God? For the name of God is blasphemed among the Gen-25 tiles through you, as it is written. For circumcision verily profiteth, if thou keep the law :
 26 but if thou be a breaker of the law, thy circumcision is made uncircumcision. Therefore if the uncircumcision keep the righteousness of the law, shall not his uncircumcision be 27 counted for circumcision? And shall not uncircumcision which is by nature, if it fulfil the 28 law, judge thee, who by the letter and circumcision dost transgress the law? For he is not a Jew, which is one outwardly; neither is that circumcision, which is outward in the flesh :
 29 but he is a Jew, which is one inwardly; and circumcision is that of the heart, in the spirit, and not in the letter; whose praise is not of men, but of God.

BEHOLD the goodness of God in the same view with the manifestation of his mind against sin—the expressions of denunciation accompanying his holy law, and mingled with all his communications to man—how many they are, how decisive, how solemn, and at the same time just! And yet, notwithstanding, the world around us is not made an unmingled scene of vindictive execution; sinful men are not, in every path and dwelling, crushed under the falling judgments of heaven. There is an immense dispensation of benefits. The series of the divine goodness, too, may be counted by the succession of a man's sins. Not one sin, small or great, but close by it were acts and proofs of this goodness. If this had been realized to thought, what a striking and awful admonition! Each and every sin a testimony, a representative of goodness; and what a wonder that the train of goodness should still persist to go on! So, "the goodness of God" is to be viewed in its character of patience and long-suffering. All his lengthened indulgence, his train of favors—what should we in conscience deem it to have been for? What, but that there might be increasing gratitude, devotedness, wisdom, and service?

Conceive the state of a soul hardened under "the goodness of God!" No longer even a perception of his mercies as such—a fixed, impenetrable ingratitude; an established, habitual repency to all his attractions; a cessation, nearly, of regret for not being at peace with him; the man's mind made up, as it were, just to seize and enjoy as much temporal good as God will permit him (not give him) during the remainder of the brief space of life, and leave all that is to follow to be as it may. Consider, on the other hand, how happily the sentiment of "repentance" from a sense of "the goodness of God" mingles and harmonizes with all the noblest and most delightful sentiments of religion—with gratitude, humility, holy reverence, and zeal—and with the aspiration to a better life, where there shall be no more sin. J. F.

Chapters 2, 3, and 4.—The apostle goes on to show that, in this matter of sinfulness before God, all are alike; that none has a right to set himself up above and judge another; for that man's unworthiness and God's long-suffering are universal. And so he passes gradually to the case of the Jews, whom by and by he directly addresses, especially with reference to their supposed and real advantages over others in the knowledge of God; contrasting the pride of the Jews in their law and their God with their actual disobedience to both; showing that by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified; and that Abraham's real advantage was his faith, by which he was justified before God without the works of the law. And this justification by faith was not his alone, but shall be ours also, if we believe the resurrection of Jesus from the dead. This is the state of the main line of argument as far as the end of chapter 4. A.

2, 3. To what in yourself will you ascribe that which in others you ascribe to criminality? Compare yourself with others upon whom you have been sitting in judgment, and wherein are you dissimilar? Be not deceived, God is not mocked. What are you doing, as estranged from him who came to save you, but fulfilling the desires of the flesh and the mind, and walking in your own chosen way? E. M.

4. Where, if not in Christ, is the power that can persuade a sinner to return, that can bring home a heart to God? Common mercies of God, though they have a leading faculty to repentance, yet the rebellious heart will not be led by them. The judgments of God, public or personal, though they ought to drive us to God, yet the heart, unchanged, runs the further from God. Do we not see it by ourselves and other sinners about us? They look not at all toward Him who smites, much less do they return; or, if any more serious thoughts of returning arise upon the surprise of an affliction, how soon vanish they, either the stroke abating, or the heart, by time, growing hard and senseless under it! Leave Christ out, and all other means work not this way; neither the works nor the word of God sounding daily in his ear, Return, return. Let the noise of the rod speak it too, and both join together to make the cry the louder, yet the wicked will do wickedly. L.—Sin hath by so much the greater evil in it by how much it is committed against the greater goodness. As good things received bind us stronger unto duty, so good things abused bind us stronger under guilt. Caryl.—God gives us all the mercies of this life as helps to an immortal state of glory, and as earnests of it. Sensualists know not what a soul is, nor what soul mercies are, and therefore know not the just value of all bodily mercies; but take up only with the carcass, shell, or shadow, instead of the life of their mercies. No wonder they are so unthankful for God's mercies, when they know not the real excellency of them. Bax.

7. Patient continuance. If duty be not so holy a power as love, yet, as long as we remain here, we need the strength of duty as much as we do the fire of love. The steady discharge of the duties of the day saves our religious life from being a mere weak alternation of fits of joy and fits of depression. The resolute will that allows no mere mood ever to interfere with the appointed work of the present moment is the backbone of the truly religious character. The instinct of love, glorious as it is, yet may degenerate into mere dreamy feeling, into sentimental sorrow for sin, and sentimental longing for a holier life. That which saves it from this degenerate end is the strong, steady sense of duty. And there is no one quality which it is better for us, in every sense, to form, to retain, to cherish in our souls than this. F. T.

Glory and honour. Nothing in all the successes of Satan in his management of the world's affairs is so saddening to contemplate as the false direction he has been enabled to give to the enthusiasm of men. Enthusiasm is a beautiful and sacred thing, implanted in us that we might launch forth on sublime enterprises of mercy to man and of glory to God. Enthusiasm would make of a holy man a seraph. Men hardly know what to do with this divine faculty. They thirst for glory, honor, immortality, but limit their conceptions of these things to what the world, the fallen, doomed world, can give. G. B.

Eternal life. Christ and his apostles seem to have given less space than we might have expected to the particulars of the soul's condition after death. A few great, simple, commanding, comprehensive assurances are made to stand out before us, with outlines that are very sharp and foundations that are very broad and firm. The fact of the Christian's immortality, the fact of the judgment at the entrance, the fact of the separation of the righteous from the wicked, the fact that this judgment proceeds on one principle, and that this separation is determined by one affection or the absence of it, the fact that afterward there are two parted families, each of them a social state, the perfect blessedness of the one consisting supremely in the fully recognized presence and love of the Lord, and the complete wretchedness of the other in absence from Him—these are all. On these the Scriptures lay all the stress. Around and under them they spread out all that immortal land. To the faithful who seek by patient well-doing there shall be glory, honor, and immortality, but tribulation and anguish to every soul that loveth and doeth evil. F. D. H.—When it is told us that the consciousness we inherit is strictly indestructible—that no mutations in the mode of existence, no accidents, no alterations in the laws of nature, not even the upturning of the material universe, nor the extinction of all things visible, can bring about the annihilation of man—then, indeed, it becomes a question of unutterable consequence, "What is God?" for we, even we, are to be the companions of his eternal duration! The creatures of a day, of a summer, of a century, might be imagined, when they stand upon the threshold of their term of existence, to make inquiry concerning the attributes and dispositions of the Creator and the rules of his government: for these are to give law to their season of life, and to be the measure of their enjoyments. But with what intenseness of anxiety might the Sons of Immortality put such questions, as they come severally to set foot upon a course that shall have no end, and that must always be gathering to itself importance! Apart from the doctrine of immortality, the doctrine of the divine attributes might be tranquilly dealt with, as we deal with any abstruse matters, or with mathematical principles. They are of some moment; but it is bounded by the brief period of our own connection with the material world. How much otherwise is it when every attribute, natural and moral, of the Infinite Being shall for ever concentrate its rays, as in a focus, upon the immortal created spirit; so that this spirit shall draw to itself, in some manner, and without end, a special consequence from the omnipo-tence and the omniscience, from the rectitude and the benignity of God! When once the soul awakes, as from a dream, to the rational consciousness of either truth, with what force and majesty does the other present itself to the mind! The belief of immortality brings God before the soul, as if visibly manifested; the knowledge of God kindles the conception of endless life. I. T.

Faith acts its noble energy forth into righteousness, works by love, bears the fruit of philanthropy, integrity, patience, temperance, emancipation, brotherly kindness, charity. Everlasting life is the result. The soul has reached its period of victory. From the far country it has traveled back till it has come home—home—O word of unspeakable and unexhausted meaning! The door of the Father's house was open, and it has entered in. This is life eternal. Henceforth there shall be labor, indeed, because labor is the best satisfaction of a spiritual being. But it shall be labor in the Master's society—labor under the encouragements of his friendship—labor with the crown on the head, and the seal in the forehead, and the reconciliation in the heart. Faithful continuance in well-doing has brought the disciple to his Lord; and when he looks up, behold! glory and honor and immortality are the spiritual trophies that adorn his dwelling. F. D. H.

8. In the end of this verse "damnation" does not mean what we now commonly understand by it, and would be better, therefore, expressed by "condemnation." A.

11. God has no respect to the outward appearance or circumstances of a man in dealing with him. God takes him for what he is, not for what he seems. The word translated "person" means mask or face-covering; that which disguises a man, and makes him look different from what he is. God regardeth not the person or appearance of a man. To God the man is just what he is, exactly, and neither more nor less. An.

12-16. The whole world is under a solemn economy of government and judgment. A mighty spirit of judgment is in sovereign exercise over all, discerning, estimating, approving, or condemning. Now, it was requisite there should be something in the soul to recognize this; that it should not be as some vague, unperceived element around us; and something more and deeper than the mere simple understanding that such is the fact; a faculty to be impressed, to feel obligation and awe and solemn apprehension; something by which the mind shall be compelled to admit the indwelling of what represents a greater power. Conscience is to communicate with something mysteriously great, which is without the soul, and above it, and everywhere. It is the sense, more explicit or obscure, of standing in judgment before the Almighty. And that which makes a man feel so is a part of himself; so that the struggle against God becomes a struggle with man's own soul. Therefore conscience has been often denominated "the God in man." J. F.—Conscience is a very busy faculty of the soul, and it hath many offices. It is a register, to take notice of and record what we do. It is a witness against us when we do amiss. It is a judge, and gives sentence; it sits upon a throne as God's deputy to award life or death. It has the office of a tormenter; it is that worm which dieth not and a fire that never goeth out. The lost shall feel the sting of conscience for ever, though here they have bribed it and blinded it that it might not trouble them. Caryl.

Men who have not the revealed law of God do have in their consciences the sense of obligation to the self-same duties which that law commands; and even when they disregard truth, justice, honor, purity, fidelity, in their own actions, they exact these virtues from others toward themselves. But he who condemns another for theft, fraud, lying, murder, shows that he has in his own heart a law, a standard of right and wrong; and by that law he himself shall be judged. God deals with men according to their light; but all men have light enough to know the difference between right and wrong. God is patient toward sinners and seeks to win them by his love; but, if they will not repent, the warnings of conscience shall be followed by the judgment of the last day. J. P. T.—These acts of conscience, in the present life, have a final respect to God's tribunal; and, though the accounts are so vast, there shall be an exact agreement between the books of God's omniscience and of conscience in the day of judgment. It will be one of the miracles of that day, to enlarge the view of conscience to all sins. Now the records of conscience are often obliterated, and the sins written therein are forgotten; but then they shall appear in so clear an impression, that the wicked shall be inexcusable to themselves, and conscience subscribes their condemnation. And oh the formidable spectacle, when conscience shall present to a sinner in one view the sins of his whole life! Bates.—Conscience! it will cry amen to every word that the great God doth speak against thee. It will hold pace with the witness of God, as to the truth of evidence, to a hair's breadth. The witness of conscience is of great authority; it commands guilt and fastens it on every soul which it accuses. Bun.

16. The thought of the coming of Christ to judgment almost inevitably leads the mind to the two great revelations which will then be made: the revelation of the secrets of the hearts of men and the revelation of the true substance and nature of things. At present there is a perpetual contradiction between faith and experience; justice does not rule the world, and obedience to the Law of God, which ought to be the one supreme force in the world, is thrust aside by what is plausible, by what is resolute, by mere accident even and blind chance. But on that day the higher harmony which rules all these discords shall be revealed; the wrong shall either be set right before our eyes, or shall be shown never to have been wrong, but only to have been misunderstood. So, again, at present we live with good and with evil, which none knows except the man himself, and even he but imperfectly and fitfully. But then we shall be seen and known of all men; for the judgment will be a public judgment, and all will acknowledge its justice. F. T.—All sins, whether secret or open and visible, shall be accounted for. Those sins that have been acted in the most secret retirement, so that no eye of man could take cognizance of them, shall then be made manifest. Nay, the sins of the thoughts and affections, of which Satan could not accuse men, when the inward fire of lust or malice is not discovered by the least smoke or sparkles, by no expressions—all those shall be brought to judgment. God will judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ. Bates.

Section 239.

ROMANS iii. 1-31.

1 WHAT advantage then hath the Jew? or what profit is there of circumcision? Much 2 every way: chiefly, because that unto them were committed the oracles of God. For 3 what if some did not believe? shall their unbelief make the faith of God without effect?
 4 God forbid: yea, let God be true, but every man a liar; as it is written, That thou mightest
 5 be justified in thy sayings, and mightest overcome when thou art judged. But if our un-
 6 righteousness commend the righteousness of God, what shall we say? Is God unrighteous
 7 who taketh vengeance? (I speak as a man.) God forbid: for then how shall God judge
 8 the world? For if the truth of God hath more abounded through my lie unto his glory;
 9 why yet am I also judged as a sinner? And not rather, (as we be slanderously reported, 10 and as some affirm that we say.) Let us do evil, that good may come? whose damnation is 11 just. What then? are we better than they? No, in no wise: for we have before proved 12 both Jews and Gentiles, that they are all under sin; as it is written, There is none righteous, 13 no, not one: there is none that understandeth, there is none that seeketh after God. They 14 are all gone out of the way, they are together become unprofitable; there is none that doeth
 15 good, no, not one. Their throat is an open sepulchre; with their tongues they have used 16 deceit; the poison of asps is under their lips: whose mouth is full of cursing and bitter-17 ness: their feet are swift to shed blood: destruction and misery are in their ways: and the 18 way of peace have they not known: there is no fear of God before their eyes.
 19 Now we know that what things soever the law saith, it saith to them who are under the 20 law: that every mouth may be stopped, and all the world may become guilty before God.
 21 Therefore by the deeds of the law there shall no flesh be justified in his sight: for by the 22 law is the knowledge of sin. But now the righteousness of God without the law is mani-23 fested, being witnessed by the law and the prophets; even the righteousness of God which is 24 by faith of Jesus Christ unto all and upon all them that believe: for there is no difference:
 25 for all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God; being justified freely by his grace
 26 through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus: whom God hath set forth to be a propitia-27 tion through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins that 28 are past, through the forbearance of God; to declare, I say, at this time his righteousness:
 29 that he might be just, and the justifier of him which believeth in Jesus. Where is boasting 30 then? It is excluded. By what law? of works? Nay: but by the law of faith. There-31 fore we conclude that a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law. Is he the 32 God of the Jews only? is he not also of the Gentiles? Yes, of the Gentiles also: seeing it 33 is one God, which shall justify the circumcision by faith, and uncircumcision through faith.
 34 Do we then make void the law through faith? God forbid: yea, we establish the law.

If God is to be honored and loved by human beings, he must present himself in the light of those qualities which we may call by the name of justice, and of those to which we give the names of goodness, kindness, tenderness; or mercy. Christ united these two sides of character in their due mixture in his one person. This is remarkable in regard to our Lord, that one who should have become acquainted only with his traits of love, as forbearance, patience, mildness, pity, and forgiveness, would be apt to suppose that he had seen the whole framework of his character; while another person who heard his awful rebukes of the Pharisees, and saw with what zeal he defended the rights of God, and observed what he thought of sin and what were his threatenings against it, would take him for a man made out of iron justice alone. But he united in unrivaled harmony both these aspects of character. The strength of his holiness and justice proves the depth of his love, and his love was the stronger, because it rested on the fixed rock of justice and holiness. Christ then, with such a nature, would be the loving Saviour, the friend of sinners, but he would be also the wise law-giver and the just judge. He is thus like God and fitted to represent God; he embodies that idea of God, which, with the help of the noblest passages of the Old Testament, our minds, in their best frames of thought and feeling, are able to form. And if, in a larger sphere, the Son of man shall judge the world he came to save, it will not be in a new character, but only in a new office. T. D. W.

2. Oracles of God. Good men have ever felt that the words must be living oracles, ever flowing forth freshly from the seat of God's majesty, yesterday, to-day, and for ever the same; addressed to them as to their fathers, to their children as to them. T. A.

3. The faith of God without effect. By faith of God is meant faithfulness of God. The word has not only the objective sense of faith, belief, confidence in another, but also the subjective sense of faithfulness to an agreement, promise, or pledge. We may read, "Because that unto them were intrusted the oracles of God. For what if some were unfaithful? Shall their unfaithfulness make the faithfulness of God without effect?" Crosby.

5. Is God unrighteous? This objection was leveled against that grand pillar of a sinner's hope, justification by faith only; as if it were a doctrine tending to licentiousness, and to the overthrow of morality and good works. This, the apostle says, some did not scruple to affirm; but he adds that the report was slanderous. Hill.

9. The Greek word, which we here translate sin, signifies to fail of an end; to lose one's way. The sinner is a being lost; he is a traveler, with a destination before him, but misled to a route which does not lead to it. Or, putting in place of the figure what it signifies: the sinner is one who ought to follow a certain moral direction, and who takes the opposite. Monod.

10-18. The world over, in its serious hours the heart longs, sighs, groans, and travails with sorrows that can not be uttered, to be delivered from the bondage of sin and death. The Scripture has no other doctrine of the matter on any of its pages; and scarcely one page where this is not. Read the burning confessions of the fifty-first Psalm, and of many another before and after it, where the fire of remorse, which is only the lurid reflection of sin, almost visibly scorches the Psalmist's heart; read the terrible descriptions of that state of man with out his Redeemer written by Paul to the Romans; or the tragic picture of Paul's own fearful struggles with the law of his members; or the awful prophecies of a society forgetting its Lord, given in Jude. Recall the narratives of depravity in Scripture history, and the denunciations upon it by prophets, and the thrilling exhortations against it by apostles. Remember that the Bible begins with the first inroad of sin, and finishes with warnings of its punishments. Above all, remember that the first word of the new dispensation was "Repent," and its consummation was the Cross built on Calvary to assure forgiveness to "repentance toward God and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ"; and you will hardly need to multiply these convincing tokens that all the ministrations of our religion to the human soul presuppose that we all have sinned, are sinners still. F. D. H.

There is a vast, immortal want stirring on the world and forbidding it to rest. In the cursing and bitterness, in the deceit of tongues, in the poison of asps, in the swiftness to blood, in all the destruction and misery of the world's ruin, there is yet a vast insatiate hunger for the good, the true, the holy, the divine, and a great part of the misery of the ruin is that it is so great a ruin; a desolation of that which can not utterly perish, and still lives, asserting its defrauded rights and reclaiming its lost glories. And therefore it is that life becomes an experience to the race so tragic in its character, so dark and wild, so bitter, so incapable of peace. The way of peace we can not know, till we find our peace, where our immortal aspirations place it, in the fullness and the friendly eternity of God.

18. If sin is weak, if it is mean, little, selfish, and deformed, and we are ready to set humanity down as a low and paltry thing of nothing worth, how terrible and tragic in its evil grandeur does it appear, when we turn to look upon its defiance of God, and the desperate obstinacy of its warfare! There is no fear of God before their eyes. In one view there is fear enough, the soul is all its life long haunted by this fear, but there is a desperation of will that tramples fear and makes it as though it were not. H. B.

19. This is the genuine voice of the law, "Do and live"; "but the soul that sinneth shall surely die." It knoweth no middle sentence between these two; it doth not whisper one word of mercy; but the smallest deviation subjects the transgressor to the justice of God, and to all the fatal effects of his indignation. This being the case, it is easy to discern the use of the law to lead men to the Saviour. The law discovers sin, and at the same time demands an unerring obedience. None of us can plead innocence, and the law admits of no excuse for guilt. Nay, it is not only silent as to the doctrine of forgiveness, but in plain and awful words pronounces the sentence of death. Thus the sinner's mouth is stopped, and nothing remains for him but to continue in misery, and bear the curse of God, or else to appeal from the law to the gospel, and to claim the benefit of that indemnity which Christ hath purchased with his blood. R. W.—Alas! he who boasteth himself in the works of the law, he doth not hear the law. When that speaks, it shakes Mount Sinai, and writeth death upon all faces, and makes the Church itself cry out, A Mediator! else we die. The law out of Christ is terrible as a lion; the law in him is meek as a lamb. Bun.

20. Justified. We seem by the Scriptural language to be introduced to a court: there are a law, a sanction, a tribunal, a judge, an accusation, a condemnation, an advocate, a surety, an acquittal. But there is not a syllable about changing the character; it is only a change of standing, or relation to law. To justify is not to make just, in the sense of making holy, but to declare just. When the judge justifies a man, he does not by that act render him any better than he was before: he simply adjudges him to be innocent. Justification, therefore, is an act of God, whereby he remits our sins, and accepts us as righteous. J. W. A.

21-24. All that merits salvation for sinners is in Christ; and faith accepts Christ as God offers him, and so makes his merit the believer's own. If there be any worthiness, then, in Christ, any sufficiency in his precious blood-shedding for the removal of sins, any glory in his righteousness and obedience to the law, for man—faith, giving the sinner a personal interest in all these, brings at once a full and finished salvation into his soul. This blessing belongs not, indeed, to the thousands who say they believe, while their whole walk gives the lie to their assertion; but to all who do believe, and that simply because they do. The chief of sinners is a justified person, "justified" eternally "from all things," that instant that he brings his sins, in humble confession of them, to God, and believes God's testimony of his Son, that he is indeed the Lamb, the sacrifice provided of God, which "taketh away the sins of the world." In this way, the vilest may be saved—freely pardoned, through the tender mercy of our God, who has laid our trespasses upon Jesus. "Being justified freely, by his grace, through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus." And as this is the first hope of a sinner, so it is the only hope to the last, by which any man, though holy as Paul himself, can draw nigh unto God. In the pilgrimage of life, in the hour of death, in the day of judgment, his only acceptable plea is summed up in this: Christ my atonement, Christ my righteousness. Goode.

25. God hath set forth. If there is a necessity of justification for God's pardoning the guilty, there is also a necessity of justification for God's offering up his own Son. How could he do it without an infinite and eternal reason? How could he do it for any expediency or necessity short of infinitude? How could he do it, but under the sanction, which indeed he has revealed to us, of the power of an endless life for guilty creatures on the one hand if redeemed, and the power of an endless death inevitable on the other hand if not redeemed? G. B. C.—To be a propitiation through faith in his blood. Here behold the significance and the life of those bloody sacrifices instituted when man fell and flaming up to heaven for four thousand years! Here see the grand fulfillment of the law and the prophets, as all down the ages they point with unerring finger to this divine man who is to bear sin by the shedding of his blood for the world! Where now are the bloody altars? the priestly sacrifices? the hierarchy of Aaron? the temple service? They heard the cry from the Cross, "It is finished!" The real sacrifice for sin is offered and bled for ever. Altar, priest, temple, all crumbled to dust, while the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the world, proclaims to all men free forgiveness and eternal life for every one who in humble faith will receive and obey him as the Redeemer. Now a spiritual, universal kingdom is possible; for humanity is redeemed, and faith, repenting, receiving, loving him, is the sole condition of citizenship. S. W. F.

If the apostolic doctrine of justification through faith be clearly held and cordially admitted, it will occupy the foremost place in our regards; for it is the ground of all our hopes, and the relief of every fear: it is the luminous center of all religious truth. It is the sun in our heavens; it is the source of light and the source of vital warmth. We do not, therefore, hesitate to affirm that it is scripturally held only by those who do assign to it this prominent position; who recur to it ever and again with delight; who never feel it to be an exhausted theme; who build their own hopes upon it firmly; who invite others to do the same with confidence; who neither distrust it in theory nor dishonour it in practice; who enounce it freely and boldly;

and of whose piety it is the spring and reason. I. T.

27. It was "the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ" which separated you from an ungodly world and made you laborers for heaven. It is the same grace that keeps you from forsaking the work which you have begun. You are working out your salvation, solely because God in his mercy continues to "work in you both to will and to do of his good pleasure." "Where is boasting then? It is excluded." The pride of your hearts can find nothing to rest in. The simple question, "Who made thee to differ?" lays it low. And what a crowd of feelings rise up one after another in its place! Wonder, joy, love, praise, and perhaps, stronger than all, self-abasement and shame! C. B.

29. The truth that God is not a national God, not the God of any one tribe or people, but the God and Father of all men, and that the gospel is designed and adapted to all mankind, however little it may affect us, filled the apostles with astonishment and delight. They were slow in arriving at the knowledge of this truth; they had no clear perception of it until after the day of Pentecost. Before that event, they were Jews; afterward, they were Christians; before, they applied all the promises to their own nation; the only Jerusalem of which they had any idea was the city where David dwelt; the only temple of which they could form a conception was that in which they were accustomed to worship. But when they received the anointing of the Holy Ghost the scales fell from their eyes; their nation sank and the Church rose on their renovated sight; the Jerusalem that now is disappeared when they beheld the New Jerusalem descending out of heaven; the temple on Mount Zion was no longer glorious, by reason of the excelling glory of that temple which is the habitation of God by his Spirit. C. H.

31. We establish law. Grace, in its turn, leads back to the law. Grace, as it is manifested in the gospel, is the most splendid homage, the most solemn consecration, which the law can receive. This grace is of a peculiar character. It is not the soft indulgence and the easy indifference of a feeble father, who, tired of his own severity, shuts his eyes to the faults of a guilty child. It is not the weakness of a timid government, which, unable to repress disorder, lets the laws sleep, and goes to sleep along with them. It is a holy goodness; it is a love without feebleness, which pardons guilt, and executes justice at the same time. It is not possible that God, who is the supreme sanction of order, should tolerate the shadow of disorder, and leave unpunished the least infraction of the holy laws he has given. Thus, in the work of which we speak, condemnation appears in the pardon, and pardon in the condemnation. The same act proclaims the compassion of God, and the inflexibility of his justice. God could not save us without assuming our nature, nor assume our nature without sharing our misery. The Cross, the triumph of grace, is the triumph of law. A. V.

Man must "die, or justice must." Divine Justice becomes man, and dies to meet the obligation. In the stains of holy blood upon the ignominious tree, upon the accursed earth, and upon the fair, cold body of the lovely Redeemer, the believing sinner reads, as in letters of crimson, Obligation, Obligation. This is a matter of experience. All true penitents find it so. Who shall affront my deepest sensibilities and holiest apprehensions of generous love, by charging that this my view of gratuitous redemption by the blood of the Cross tends to diminish my conscientious sense of duty to him who died! What spectacle in heaven, earth, or hell, so magnifies the law as the spectacle of Christ expiring in the tortures of law, and of vicarious suffering? J. W. A.

The gospel is called the law of faith and the law of the spiritual life. This law of grace is very different from the law of nature that required entire innocence, and for the least omission or accusing act passed an irrevocable doom upon the offenders; for that strictness and severity is mollified by the gospel, which accepts of sincere persevering obedience though imperfect; accordingly it is called the law of liberty. But the law of faith is unalterable, and admits of no dispensation from the duties required in order to our being everlastingly happy. Bates.

28. First in systematic order as well as in magnitude is the doctrine of the propitiation, effected by the Son of God—so held clear of admixture and evasions as to sustain in its bright integrity the consequent doctrine of the full and absolute restoration of guilty man to the favor of God, on his acceptance of this method of mercy; or, as it is technically phrased, "justification through faith." A doctrine this which in a peculiar manner refuses to be tampered with or compromised, and which will hold its own place or none. It challenges for itself not only a broad basis on which it may rest alone, but a broad border upon which nothing that is human may trespass. This doctrine, when unadulterate, not only animates orthodoxy, but shows us why it was necessary to lay open the mystery of the divine nature so far as it is laid open in scriptural Trinitarian doctrine; for we could not have learned the method of salvation without first learning that he who "bore our sins" was indeed able to bear them, and was in himself "mighty to save."

Whatever belongs to the divine nature must be incomprehensible by the human mind, and therefore the incarnation is incomprehensible; and therefore the atonement involves a mystery incomprehensible; but not so the consequent doctrine of justification through faith. This doctrine turns upon the well-understood relations of a forensic substitution; and as to transactions of this order, they are among the clearest of any with which we have to do as the subjects of law and government. A forensic act, authoritatively announced, and in consequence of which the condemned stands exempt from the demands of law, must be in its nature absolute. It is not an undefined indulgence; it is not a weak connivance; it is not a timid compromise; it is not an evasion which must be held to condemn, if not the law, its administrators.

In the justification of man through the mediation of Christ, man, individually, as guilty, and his divine sponsor, personally competent to take upon himself such a part, stand forward in the court of heaven, there to be severally dealt with as the honor of law shall demand; and, if the representative of the guilty be indeed thus qualified in the eye of the law, and if the guilty, on his part, freely accept this mode of satisfaction, then, when the one recedes from the position of danger, and the other steps into it, justice, having already admitted both the competency of the substitute and the sufficiency of the substitution, is itself silent. Now, in the method of justification through faith, God himself solemnly proclaims that the rectitude of his government is not violated, nor the sanctity of his law compromised. It is he who declares that, in this method, he "may be just while justifying the ungodly." After such a proclamation from Heaven has been made, "who is he that condemneth? It is God that justifieth!" I. T.

Section 240.

ROMANS IV. 1-25.

- 1 WHAT shall we say then that Abraham our father, as pertaining to the flesh, hath found?
- 2 For if Abraham were justified by works, he hath whereof to glory; but not before God.
- 3 For what saith the scripture? Abraham believed God, and it was counted unto him for
- 4 righteousness. Now to him that worketh is the reward not reckoned of grace, but of debt.
- 5 But to him that worketh not, but believeth on him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is
- 6 counted for righteousness. Even as David also describeth the blessedness of the man, unto
- 7 whom God imputeth righteousness without works, saying, Blessed are they whose iniquities
- 8 are forgiven, and whose sins are covered. Blessed is the man to whom the Lord will not
- 9 impute sin. Cometh this blessedness then upon the circumcision only, or upon the uncir-
- 10 cumcision also? for we say that faith was reckoned to Abraham for righteousness. How
- 11 was it then reckoned? when he was in circumcision, or in uncircumcision? Not in circum-
- 12 cision, but in uncircumcision. And he received the sign of circumcision, a seal of the right-
- 13 eousness of the faith which he had yet being uncircumcised: that he might be the father of
- 14 all them that believe, though they be not circumcised; that righteousness might be imputed
- 15 unto them also: and the father of circumcision to them who are not of the circumcision
- 16 only, but who also walk in the steps of that faith of our father Abraham, which he had be-
- 17 ing yet uncircumcised.
- 18 For the promise, that he should be the heir of the world, was not to Abraham, or to his
- 19 seed, through the law, but through the righteousness of faith. For if they which are of
- 20 the law be heirs, faith is made void, and the promise made of none effect: because the law
- 21 worketh wrath: for where no law is, there is no transgression. Therefore it is of faith,
- 22 that it might be by grace; to the end the promise might be sure to all the seed; not to that
- 23 only which is of the law, but to that also which is of the faith of Abraham; who is the
- 24 father of us all, (as it is written, I have made thee a father of many nations,) before him
- 25 whom he believed, even God, who quickeneth the dead, and calleth those things which be
- 26 not as though they were. Who against hope believed in hope, that he might become the
- 27 father of many nations, according to that which was spoken, So shall thy seed be. And
- 28 being not weak in faith, he considered not his own body now dead, when he was about an
- 29 hundred years old, neither yet the deadness of Sarah's womb: he staggered not at the
- 30 promise of God through unbelief; but was strong in faith, giving glory to God; and being
- 31 fully persuaded that, what he had promised, he was able also to perform. And therefore
- 32 it was imputed to him for righteousness.
- 33 Now it was not written for his sake alone, that it was imputed to him; but for us also,

24 to whom it shall be imputed, if we believe on him that raised up Jesus our Lord from the 25 dead ; who was delivered for our offences, and was raised again for our justification.

EXPIATION is provided by Christ, in his vicarious obedience, suffering, and death on the Cross. In the mystery of his divine condescension, of his unspeakable love for sinners, he voluntarily was made a human subject of the law which he had given. He obeyed it as a man. He expressed in all his life its purity. He even met that death of a strange anguish, unspeakable, unsearchable, with the hiding of the face of the Father himself attending and crowning it, when standing in the sinner's place. And so he honored and magnified the law, and showed most clearly God's infinite regard for it ; and made it possible for the penitent to be pardoned. He made the law as clearly supreme in God's administration as it would have been if every man had been perfectly holy, or every sinner had been for ever condemned. R. S. S.

Strikingly in the instance of Abraham are the nature and value of faith made evident ; that in its foundation and essence it is through all eternity the same, whether directed toward the promises of salvation of a yet hidden or of an already revealed and accomplished gospel. True faith is an immovable trust in the promises of salvation. Faith dwells specially in the heart ; it does not rest on our insight, but on the foundation of God's word and testimony ; and even "hoping against hope" it holds fast this testimony, because it looks away from seen and temporal things up to the unseen, concerning whom it is persuaded that he is faithful and almighty. Let it be often with us as though we heard the voice : "Look up now to heaven." The stars we can count even less than Abraham ; but beyond them lives the author and finisher of the faith, which even Abraham practiced imperfectly. His light disappears not from your gaze ; his fidelity guards you here, his love awaits you yonder. Van O.

1-12. Jewish objections met by appeal to the Old Testament and the example of Abraham. Abraham's belief in God's promises foreshadows Christian faith, Christians being by virtue of their faith the spiritual children of Abraham, and heirs of the promises. C.

3. Faith is not that which constitutes the ground of our acceptance with God, but which places us upon that ground ; it is not our justifying righteousness, but that which unites us to Christ, and appropriates his righteousness to ourselves. "Abraham believed God, and it was reckoned to him 'to,' 'in order to,' or 'toward,' his justification." It is not, then, for our faith, but by it, that we are justified : faith, as an act of ours, is no more the meritorious ground of our justification than any other of our performances ; for, if it were, we should still be justified by works, as faith is as much a work as penitence. J. A. J.

5. I do not say that the Spirit of Christ gives the least liberty to sin ; God forbid ; but his convictions are of a more saving and refreshing nature than the convictions of the law, and do more constrain the soul to holiness than that : the law saying, Work for life ; the Spirit saying, Now to him that worketh not (for life), but believeth on him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness. One saying, "Pay me that thou owest" ; the other, "Thou art freely forgiven all." Bun. — Believing is the most wonderful thing in the world. Put anything of thine own to it and thou spoilest it ; Christ will not esteem it believing. When thou believest and comest to Christ, thou must leave behind thee thine own righteousness (that is hard), all thy holiness, sanctification, duties, tears, humblings, and bring nothing but thy sins, thy wants, and miseries, else Christ is not fit for thee, nor thou for Christ. Christ will be a perfect Redeemer and Mediator, and thou must be an undone sinner, or Christ and thou can never agree. It is the hardest thing in the world to take Christ alone for righteousness ; that is, to acknowledge him Christ. Wilcox.

6-8. The New Testament idea of pardon is not merely the forgiveness of sin, nor even its virtual annihilation so that the sinner may be deemed innocent, but it is justification—something by which he may be deemed "righteous." And Paul says that this was the Psalmist's idea, though he only appears to express the half of it. "Even David," he affirms, "described the blessedness of the man unto whom the Lord imputeth righteousness, without works." So that, according to Paul, the non-imputation of sin is either to be regarded as the same thing as the imputation of righteousness, or that with God the one act implies and is always accompanied by the other. One thing is certain, that the whole transaction is based upon, and springs out of, the redemptive work of Christ ; that in that work, whatever may have been its precise nature, there is a reason presented to the divine eye, on the ground of which God can look upon the sinful man who trusts in Christ as so identified with him as to have his faith counted for righteousness, and thus, in Christ, or for his sake, to be accounted justified as well as forgiven. T. B.

8. The term, "to impute," or "put to the account of," is a term borrowed from pecuniary transactions among men; and, as applied to sin, contemplates it in the light of a debt, which is put by consent of all parties to the account of a surety, and is thus made his own and discharged by him for the debtor. This state of a sinner wherein God lays no sin to his charge is called a state of justification; which as a term of law signifies the declaring a person righteous. It supposes the arraignment of the criminal before God at the bar of conscience. The case is tried. The charge of sin and desert of wrath is brought home to the soul by the Holy Spirit. The convinced man admits it all; sets up no defence of works done, or to be done; thou art "just," saith he, in "judging, and clear in condemning"; but, Lord, thou hast thyself provided me with an all-sufficient plea—the atonement and righteousness of Christ: thou hast assured me of my personal interest in them, when I take them as meant for me, on the faith of thy own word. Lord, I believe. I plead with thee to do as thou hast said; to deal with me as righteous, seeing I present to thee that perfect righteousness of Christ, which is mine by believing acceptance of him as thy gift to men. This plea God admits. The debt (to look again at sin in this light) is hereupon "blotted out." The sinner is declared righteous. Goode.

9-11. We are justified by believing. In accepting God's testimony to the righteousness—in crediting his word concerning this justification—we are justified at once. The righteousness becomes ours; and God treats us henceforth as men who are righteous, as men who, on account of the righteousness which has thus become theirs, are entitled to be dealt with as righteous, out and out. Of Abraham it is said, "His faith was counted for righteousness"; that is, God counted this believing man as one who had done all righteousness, just because he was a believing man. Not that his act or acts of faith were substituted as equivalent to work, but his believing brought him into the possession of all that working could have done. Thus, in believing, we get the righteousness. Bonar.

16. Of faith . . . by grace. Man, the disinherited, is brought back and reestablished in that for which he was made; or, his lost and forfeited inheritance is restored. All is done, too, as originally planned. The divine purpose is accomplished, the divine promise fulfilled. It is "of faith," and "by grace." It is the one, that it may be the other. T. B.

17. God quickeneth the dead. First in the resurrection this great declaration of Paul comes to its full accomplishment. Death still reigns here below, although for the Christian his terror is vanquished; we expect, however, the arrival of the hour in which the song of triumph, "Death is swallowed up in victory," shall no more lack one note. Sin's last word is death, but the last word of God Almighty is life; and what matters it though the eye of sense at times can see nought else but dissolution and decay? This earth is passing away with all that is subject to death, but the great Resurrection morn is coming, of which at once the hallelujah and amen shall be this word, that God, and God alone, is he who quickeneth the dead. Van O.

20. Strong in faith. What did Abraham believe? What God was pleased to reveal. That Abraham should become the father of many nations, was but a small part of what was revealed and of what he believed. The sum of what God revealed to him was, that one of his descendants was to be the promised Saviour of men; and that both he and his spiritual seed were to be saved by faith in him. Why did he believe this? Just because God had said it. He had no other ground for it. Everything else would have led him to doubt or disbelieve it. His faith was firm and hopeful, and no seeming impossibilities could shake it. J. B.

A gracious soul knows that if he is rich in faith he can not be poor in other graces; he knows the growth of faith will be as the former and latter rain to all other graces; he knows that there is no way to outgrow his fears but by growing in faith; therefore his cry is, "O Lord, whatever I am weak in, let me be strong in faith; whatever dies, let faith live, whatever decays, let faith flourish." Brooks.—Faith is faith, whether it be as a grain of mustard-seed, or like the tree in whose branches "the birds of the air lodge." Faith must grow in strength. At its birth it is only as a little child, but, by the training grace of God, it grows up to the strength of youth and of manhood. As faith is, so also is the soul. The soul is strong when faith is strong. A. C.

24. Imputed. The union of believers with Christ is the ground of their receiving his righteousness. That is set to their account which has become theirs by this gracious connection. This, and no more, is what we mean by the imputation of Christ's righteousness. Instead of an arbitrary ascription to us of something contrary to fact, it is God's beholding us as intimately connected with the Great Surety. The obedience which he rendered was rendered by him in our nature, in our name, and as our covenant head. It was in its very intention that it should be regarded as ours. It had no other intention. Faith completes the union, long contemplated in the covenant, and thenceforth God regards the believer no longer in himself, but in Christ, and the Church of elect saints as the body of Christ, invested with his righteousness. J. W. A.

25. My sin is gone; for it is forgiven. The righteousness of Jesus is mine; for he has given me faith in him. The separation from my God and Saviour is ended by the forgiveness of sins in the blood of Jesus; the union between me and my God is restored by Christ, the Crucified and Risen One. He is my righteousness; and, since I have him, my sins can no longer terrify me. This is what Paul saith: "Christ was raised again for our justification." A. C.—It was impossible Christ should be holden by death. It was naturally impossible upon the account of the divine power inherent in his person; and legally impossible because divine justice required that he should be raised to life; partly to vindicate his innocence, for he was reputed and suffered as a malefactor, and principally because he had fully satisfied God. Accordingly the apostle declares, he died for our sins and rose again for our justification. Briefly, our Saviour's victory over death was obtained by dying, his triumph by rising again. He foiled our common enemy in his own territory, the grave. Bates.

How amazing that there should be found in all the wide world a single being reluctant to avail himself of the expiation thus made for sin. The utmost eloquence of men, the most terrible warnings in providence, the profoundest experience of the misery springing out of their league with sin, all fail to obtain for this wondrous gospel of the grace of God entrance into the hearts of men. They say unto God, day by day, hour by hour, "Thou holy God, impute unto us all our offenses. Let it be with us as though Christ had not died. Let there be no Gethsemane or Calvary for us." G. B.

Section 241.

ROMANS V. 1-11.

1 THEREFORE being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus
 2 Christ: by whom also we have access by faith into this grace wherein we stand, and rejoice
 3 in hope of the glory of God. And not only so, but we glory in tribulations also: knowing 4 that tribulation worketh patience; and patience, experience; and experience, hope: and 5 hope maketh not ashamed; because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the 6 Holy Ghost which is given unto us. For when we were yet without strength, in due time
 7 Christ died for the ungodly. For scarcely for a righteous man will one die: yet peradven-8 ture for a good man some would even dare to die. But God commendeth his love toward 9 us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us. Much more then, being now 10 justified by his blood, we shall be saved from wrath through him. For if, when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more, being reconciled, 11 we shall be saved by his life. And not only so, but we also joy in God through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom we have now received the atonement.

THE one thing which meets man's great want, which alone fits him to live and prepares him to die, without which he is orphaned from hope, and with which no calamity can more than temporarily depress him, the one thing which leads him to live with a right purpose, which consecrates all his aims, which gives him a constant refuge, which gilds with light the darkest cloud, which brings relief to fear and foreboding, which makes the weary journey of life a pilgrimage to heaven, and which alone teaches the triumphant song, "O death! where is thy sting? O grave! where is thy victory?"—the one thing that does all this is religious faith, the faith by which being justified we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ. E. H. G.

Amid all the accusations of the past the believer enjoys permanent calm. He has peace literally, as regards God in the way of atonement, by which all that lies behind him is wholly covered, and the filial relation completely restored. If the conscience is yet wounded at every turning, the balsam of consolation pours forth in streams. God beholds us in Christ; and he who is really one with Him, however much by nature a child of wrath, is in the sight of the Most High unspeakably well-pleasing. Thus has also the redeemed sinner in regard to the future a well-founded hope. Can it be more forcibly expressed than in the heart-elevating passage: "We stand and rejoice in hope of the glory of God?" Verily it might sound too high, were it not preceded by this testimony regarding Jesus Christ, "By whom also we have access by faith into this grace." Hitherto the entrance had remained closed, no hope, but miserable fear could alone be ours; there could be no mention of standing, but rather of the sinking of despair;

of no vaunt of hope, but of an endless lamentation over disappointed expectation. On the other hand, where peace from above has descended into the heart, it can not be otherwise than that the hope of salvation should also come to dwell there; he who sees his sullied past obliterated, knows at the same time his eternal future to be safe. Van O.

WITH this chapter begins the general statement, for Jew and Gentile alike, of the blessed consequences of this justification by faith; of the nature and extent of the blessings bestowed on us by the death and resurrection of Christ; their extent being as wide in their saving influence as Adam's sin was in ruining; yea, wider, because the nature of a free gift is of itself wider and more spreading than that of a prescribed and limited condemnation. And the very use of the law was this, to make abundant and multiply the grace of God, by creating sin, over which grace might triumph.

In verse 2, render, "we glory in the hope of the glory of God." In verses 3, 4, for "patience," "endurance," and for "experience," "approval," both twice. A.

1-5. Faith is the door of the heart by which peace enters. Love is the tender shelter beneath which peace reposes. The essence of peace consists in the inward assurance of salvation. This assurance brings us the confident hope that we have the love of God, and that we enjoy friendship with him. A. C.—A cordial reception of the two great truths of spiritual Christianity, justification through faith, and the sovereign, indwelling influences of the Holy Spirit, brings with it a settled and affectionate sense of security, or peace and joy in believing, which becomes the spring of holy tempers and virtuous conduct. Through the knowledge of the gospel, and the hearty reception of its promises, we are "made partakers of the divine nature." But God is "blessed for evermore." Shall we then be drawing near to this nature continually, without a happy consciousness of the felicity we are approaching? Shall we come up to the fountain of light, and receive thence no illumination? Those do not appear to know much of human nature who are jealous of happiness as an energy of virtue; or who suppose that virtue on earth will not show whence she has descended and whither she is going. I. T.

1. Justified by faith. If a man believes, he is saved. Not as if in faith itself there was any merit. We often hear belief in the gospel of Christ spoken about as if it, the work of the man believing, was, in a certain way and to some extent, that which God rewarded by giving him salvation. What is that but the whole doctrine of works come up again in a new form? It is Christ's life, Christ's blood, Christ's sacrifice, Christ's intercession, that saves. Faith is simply the channel through which there flows over into my emptiness the divine fullness; or, to use the good old illustration, it is the hand which is held up to receive the benefit which Christ lays in it. A living trust in Jesus has power unto salvation, only because it is the means by which the power of God unto salvation may come into my heart. On that side is the great ocean, Christ's love, Christ's abundance, Christ's merits, Christ's righteousness; or, rather, that which includes them all, there is the great ocean, Christ himself; and on this is the empty vessel of my soul—and the little narrow pipe that has nothing to do but to bring across the refreshing water—that is the act of faith in him. There is no merit in the dead lead, no virtue in the mere emotion. It is not faith that saves us; it is Christ that saves us, and saves us through faith. A. M.

Peace. The peace, which by simple faith in Christ the conscience obtains, is the first step in sanctification. And still through our whole course Christ's blood of atonement and his life of perfect righteousness are the great fountains of peace which travel with us, just as the stream, which flowed from the smitten rock, followed Israel in the pilgrimage. E. M. G.

2. Access by faith. Thou hast done away with the barrier by thy fulfillment of the law, and we have now free access to God. Thou art our access, our way; for thy fulfillment of the law is ours; thy righteousness is ours. The divine satisfaction which rested on thee now rests on us. A. C.—Rejoice in hope. Faith, upon the authority and credit of the divine promise, persuades the heart that there is such a glorious state of things reserved for the saints, and so serves instead of eyes in the divine light to view those glories; or it presents them to view, whence hope reaches forth to them and possesses them; gives the soul an early anticipated fruition of them for its present support and relief—so that it rejoices in the hope of the glory of God. Howe.

Faith looks to Christ as dead, buried, and ascended; and hope to his second coming. Faith looks to him for justification, hope for glory. Faith fights for doctrine, hope for a reward; faith for what is in the Bible, hope for what is in heaven. Faith purifies the heart from bad principles, hope from bad manners. Bun.

3-5. "And not only so, but we exult also in our [present] sufferings; for we know that suffering gives the steadfastness of endurance, and steadfast endurance gives the proof of soundness, and the proof of soundness gives strength to hope, and our hope can not shame us in the day of trial; because the love of God is shed forth in our hearts by the Holy Spirit, who has been given unto us." C.

We have here the genealogy of hope. The experience we have of God's power and mercy in saving us out of former troubles begets and nourishes hope against future times of trouble. Tribulation worketh patience, and patience experience, and experience hope. Caryl.—Tribulation. It is derived from the Latin tribulum, which was the threshing instrument, or roller, whereby the Roman husbandmen separated the corn from the husks; and "tribulation," in its primary significance, was the act of this separation. Sorrow and adversity being the appointed means for the separating in men of whatever in them was light, trivial, and poor, from the solid and the true, their chaff from their wheat, therefore these sorrows and trials are called "tribulations," threshings, that is, of the inner spiritual man, without which there could be no fitting him for the heavenly garner. T.—It is one of the mortifying proofs what stubborn and unteachable pupils of the Divine Master we are, that no way could be found of bringing us to our immortality but through such a system of checks and penalties. We must be baffled, smitten, scourged; we must ache, and weep, and die; we must suffer the stripes of misfortune, of disease, of mortified ambition, of bleeding affections, of mortal separation. The very word "tribulation" predicts the result, as well as describes the process. The flail (tribulum) in the hand of the thresher is to bruise the sheaves and break out the wheat from the straw. In every threshing-floor there is tribulation; and that is the world over. Blows of pain have to divide the spirit and flesh. The pure fruit of goodness does not come from us but by breaking off the worldly crust. F. D. H.

Patience. Patience is the endurance of any evil, out of the love of God, as the will of God. There is nothing too little in which to approve ourselves to God; nothing too little in which, without God, we should not fail; nothing too great which, with the help of God, we may not endure. The offices of patience are as varied as the ills of this life. We have need of it with ourselves and with others; with those who love us and those who love us not; for the greatest things and for the least; against sudden inroads of trouble and under our daily burdens; disappointments as to the weather or the breaking of the heart; in the weariness of the body, or the wearing of the soul; in our own failure of duty, or in others' failure toward us; in every-day wants, or in the aching of sickness or the decay of age; in disappointment, bereavement, losses, injuries, reproaches; in heaviness of the heart or its sickness amid delayed hopes, or the weight of this body of death, from which we would be free, that we may have no more struggle with sin within, or temptation without, but attain to our blessed and everlasting peace in our rest in God. In all these things, from childhood's little troubles to the martyr's sufferings, patience is the grace of God, whereby we endure evil for the love of God, and keep ourselves still and motionless, that we offend not God. Pusey.

Experience. Faith, in its reproductive power and process of growth, may be compared to the great Oriental banyan tree. It springs up in God, rooted in God's Word, and soon there are the great waving branches of experience. Then from these very branches the runners go down again into God's Word, and thence spring up again, new products of faith and new trees of experience, till one and the same tree becomes in itself a grove, with pillared shades and echoing walks between. So experience just grows out of faith, and then a greater faith grows out of experience, the Word of God being all the while the region of its roots, and again a still vaster, richer experience grows out of that faith, till every branch becomes not only a product, but a parent stock, set in the same wood. Thus it is that experience is founded in faith, not faith on experience. Faith is from God and in God, and so produces the work of God, a holy experience of God in the soul. G. B. C.

5. This love of God which is poured out in our hearts, and is here declared to be our ground of confidence in him, is his love to us, and not ours to him. T.—Observe how constantly the Scripture word looks to the love of God, for the ingeneration of love in men, and so for their salvation. The radical, everywhere present idea is, that the new love wanting in them is to be itself only a revelation of the love of God to them, or upon them. Thus the newborn life is to be "the love of God, shed abroad in the heart by the Holy Ghost." The gospel plan proposes the unbosoming of God's love to man, that it may be shed abroad in him by the Holy Ghost, and become a salvation, as it begets, by the Spirit, an answering love. H. B.—It is through the intimate personal operation of the Spirit of God, by his indwelling light and grace shed abroad in the souls of them that believe, that the heart is discharged of selfishness and sin, and is filled with the holy beauty and triumph of a supreme virtue. The truth is his instrument, but only the instrument. The essential power by which this amazing change is wrought, is that same energy of the Holy Ghost by which prophets and apostles before were inspired, which in the Lord was ever revealed. It reaches the inmost springs of life; turns gloom to gladness, passion to peace; till the soul becomes a temple alight with love, ringing with praise, the breath of constant supplication filling it as with incensed air. R. S. S.

6. Without strength. The old system is right in laying so urgent a stress on conviction of sin. The grand significance of the gospel is help. The measure of man's eagerness to receive help, is it not his feeling of helplessness? It is no secret, probably, that in most of the persons we meet in the streets, and even in our meeting-houses, it would be difficult to find any such thing as a vital consciousness of sin at all. F. D. H.

Died for the ungodly. He assumed our nature expressly that he might be able to suffer in our stead; for the distinct and deliberate object of pouring out his blood, and of making his soul an offering for sin. He planned a cross, and presented to the world a prodigy of mercy of which this is the only solution, that he "so loved us." He took our place in the universe, espoused our interest, opened his bosom, and welcomed to his heart the stroke which we had deserved. J. H.—Christ is not a critic on the soul's frail steps, as it comes tottering home to him, a prodigal from the far country, or a penitent from the sinful ways of the city. Every promise of his gospel is a pledge to accept sinners, not after they have ceased to be sinners—for when would that be?—but while yet they are sinners. This is the glory of the Cross. The dying is for the ungodly. The Physician is for the sick. The scarred shoulders of the Shepherd are for the sheep that was lost. F. D. H.—He died for the unrighteous, the enemies, choosing to be an exile from heaven, that he might carry us back to heaven; a tender Friend, a wise Counselor, a strong Helper. "What shall I render to the Lord for all that he has rendered to me?" I have but two little things, yea, very little, to give—a body and a soul: or rather, one little thing, my will; and shall I not give up that to his will, who, being so great, was the first to visit one so little as I with such great benefits, and bought all that I am with all that he is? Bernard.

7. "Righteous" here is a man who righteously fulfills the duties of life, and "good" is the good and benevolent man with whom we ourselves have been brought into contact. C.—The whole strength of our affections can be elicited only when goodness is manifested toward us individually. That which should call forth our strongest affections would evidently be a being of perfect moral excellence, putting forth effort and sacrifice on our behalf. M. H.

8. Commendeth his love. The very causes, and the only causes, which could check that love, have not checked it, have only served to draw forth its most abundant stream. All our guilt, instead of drawing forth the thunders of the Almighty and sinking us in the flames of his wrath, has only furnished the occasion for the triumph of his mercy. It was in view of this that angels sang with raptures of wonder and joy, "Glory to God in the highest!"

Here is the love of God in meridian brightness and glory. N. W. T.—There has never yet been found an intellectual or moral or social condition too high or too low for this doctrine. No debasement has been too vile, and no natural purity has been too refined, for it. The explorations of Christian missionaries have found no nation or tribe on the face of the earth—even where the very idea of any deity was most nearly extinct—in which this simple message, "Christ died for us," has not been apprehended, seized, rejoiced in, and lived upon, as the opening eye welcomes light. F. D. H.

10. The first argument is: "If God did so much for us when enemies, what will he do for us when friends?" The second is: "If Christ's death has done so much for us, what will his life do?" He loved and blessed us when enemies; will he not much more love us when friends? He loved us when we hated him; will he not love us more when we return his love? When subjected to the dominion of him who had the power of death, he yet conquered for us, and won glorious spoils; what will he not do now when he has led captivity captive, and completed his mighty victory? If the Cross and the tomb have done so much for us, what will not the throne secure? Here, then, are two truths which, in assuring us of pardon, assure us of everything. "Jesus died, and Jesus liveth"—these are the truths which contain everything for us. "Jesus died!"—that contains everything that we need for reconciliation and peace: "Jesus liveth!"—that contains everything pertaining to the promised inheritance. "Jesus died—Jesus liveth!" The simple knowledge of these simple truths is salvation, forgiveness, peace, eternal life. All that can come forth from his grave, or down from his throne—all that a dying and a living Saviour can do, is ours! Joy, glory, dominion, royalty, priesthood, and a boundless inheritance—all these are ours, and all of them made irreversibly sure to us from the fact that "Jesus liveth." He was dead and is alive; yea, and he liveth for evermore. This is our pledge for the perpetuity of our possession. Bonar.

Saved by his life. The powerful influence of the life of Christ upon everything that belongs to complete salvation is manifest in the justification of believers, which, purchased by the death of Christ, is rendered sure and permanent by his restored life. The life of Christ is no less available to insure the sanctification of all who believe on him. For this end did he enter into the heavenly sanctuary, that from thence he might send forth his conquering Spirit to cleanse and purify the hearts of those whom he had washed with his blood; that, as no guilt might be left to provoke the justice of God, so neither should there be any defilement to offend his holiness. Further, the life of Christ doth effectually secure an honorable issue to all the afflictions and temptations of his people. He carried his pitying nature to the throne, and is still touched with the feeling of our infirmities, and disposed to help us in every time of need. Lastly, the life of Christ secures to his people the resurrection of their bodies, and the happiness of the whole man, in the full and everlasting enjoyment of God. Therefore praise and magnify that compassionate Saviour, and faithful high priest over the house of God, who ransomed us with his blood; and amid all the splendors of his exalted state is not unmindful of his charge upon earth, but continually appears in the presence of God for us; whose ear is always attentive to the voice of our supplications; whose mouth is ever open to plead in our behalf; and, as if it had not been love enough to die for us, still lives and reigns for us. R. W.

11. By whom we have atonement. If an atonement were necessary, and for that we must trust the express warrant of Scripture, we know not where the vicarious victim was to be sought without insuperable objections on the score of justice and of goodness, except in the offended Judge himself. Our atonement appears to demand, from the very nature of the case, a Person not less than divine. And thus, hidden in the depths of justice and mercy, is found the solution of this astonishing coalition of glory and of woe. Essential happiness thus embraces essential misery, because the God of happiness is also the God at once of infinite purity and infinite love. We first start aside at the impossibility; we gaze longer and deeper, and the conviction slowly rises that it could not be otherwise, and God be what he is. The sacrifice, strange as it is, is but the natural growth of this being; it is but the child of eternal mercy wedded to eternal truth; and their spousal home is in the heart of God. Hence it is that the life and happiness of the universe, in its love at once of justice and of us, comes, through the medium of the inferior nature, in direct contact with misery and death. W. A. B.

Before going into another division of the discourse, instituting his immortal parallel between the first Adam and the second Adam, between the offense and the grace, between condemnation and salvation, he utters a burst of satisfaction, as he surveys the goodly prospect, and thus expresses the joy of a soul which accepts Christ: "And not only so, but we also joy in God, through our Lord Jesus Christ, through whom we have now received the atonement." The same Greek word is elsewhere translated reconciliation. The joy here spoken of is that high exulting joy, when the soul is lifted up with complacency in the blessing possessed. This is a summing up of all the bright and stupendous things contained in the foregoing verses. And so all the gospel, the good news, the glad tidings, is in this one word, Reconciliation. This is the message sent by the word of preaching to be believed, that God is reconciled; and he that believes this is saved. J. W. A.

Section 242.

ROMANS v. 12-21.

12 WHEREFORE, as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death 13 passed upon all men, for that all have sinned: (for until the law sin was in the world: but 14 sin is not imputed when there is no law. Nevertheless death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression, who is the 15 figure of him that was to come. But not as the offence, so also is the free gift. For if through the offence of one many be dead, much more the grace of God, and the gift by 16 grace, which is by one man, Jesus Christ, hath abounded unto many. And not as it was by one that sinned, so is the gift: for the judgment was by one to condemnation, but the free 17 gift is of many offences unto justification. For if by one man's offence death reigned by one; much more they which receive abundance of grace and of the gift of righteousness 18 shall reign in life by one, Jesus Christ.) Therefore, as by the offence of one judgment came upon all men to condemnation; even so by the righteousness of one the free gift came upon 19 all men unto justification of life. For as by one man's disobedience many were made sin-20 ners, so by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous. Moreover the law entered, that the offence might abound. But where sin abounded, grace did much more abound:
 21 that as sin hath reigned unto death, even so might grace reign through righteousness unto eternal life by Jesus Christ our Lord.

We can not hesitate to perceive that the powers of evil consist of two great detachments, which speculative men have called physical and moral evil, which plain people are familiar with under the titles of pain and guilt—pain, which seems naturally to tend to weakness and death; and guilt, which, by a process as natural, descends into habitual and irremediable sin. Distinct as are these two forms of evil, even in our own experience we detect traces of a connection between them; but it is to Revelation that we are indebted for the clearest intimation of their secret but indissoluble association; to Revelation, which announces that physical infirmity and death entered our human creation in the footsteps of willful sin, that willful sin is the forerunner of pains eternal. To these powers, then, the two great engines of the adversary, Christ is revealed as the counteracting agent. He came to triumph over both; his work is respectively directed to each. In relation to sin, he is a mediator of justification and holiness; in relation to death and pain, he is the author of endless life and glory. W. A. B.

12-21. Whatever else this important and somewhat difficult Scripture may contain, it contains at least these things: that Adam was a type of Christ, in the extraordinary sense of the latter's being set over against the former in all moral relations to our race; that as Adam brought sin and death upon all, so Christ brings righteousness and life to all; that as Adam, by one act of transgression, brought condemnation, so Christ, from many acts of transgression, brings justification; and that, while the evils of Adam's sin are unconditional, absolute, the benefits of Christ's righteousness are conditional, contingent. By his sin Adam actually, positively brought death, temporal and spiritual, upon all men. By his righteousness Christ brings life, spiritual and eternal, conditionally, under terms, to all men. By his first disobedience, Adam opened and spread the broad roll of a flying curse over the whole race of man. His act, which was one of rebellion, cut the race off from God; and, thus cut off, the whole fell into a state of moral separation from him: a state which rendered it certain that every individual would, on reaching years of moral action, commit actual sin. That state of the race, including this attendant certainty, constitutes original sin. It is a state over which "God's wrath and damnation" rest; and, at the same time, one which includes every individual of the race, from Adam to the last of his stock. Thus much of the fall. In the recovery, Christ, the second Adam, by his obedience unto death, brought in a blessing, which, in the possibilities of its application, is co-extensive with the primal curse. He threw the reach and embrace of mercy around the entire race. He "tasted death for every man." He opened the door of the kingdom of heaven to all mankind. He made eternal life possible to the whole race, from Adam to the last of his stock. And thus much of the recovery. J. S. S.

The doctrine of the apostle is that as all men are, in certain points, treated as if they were sinners, entirely on account of the first sin of the first man, Adam, so all men who are justified are treated as if they were righteous entirely on account of the obedience to death of him of whom the first man was an image—the Lord from heaven. All the evil that befalls mankind, either in the present or the future world, may be considered as originating in the first sin of the first man, directly or indirectly. Some of these evils are realized, however, only through the individual, in his own person, becoming an actual violator of the divine law, and are realized by him in the degree in which he does so. There are others that come directly on the race, as the manifestation of the displeasure of God at the first sin: Death, including a life longer or shorter, it might be, but liable to disease, doomed to death; and the greater loss of that divine influence which is the soul of the human soul, the principle of its true excellence and highest happiness. These—mortality and destitution of spiritual goodness—come equally on all men, without reference to personal acts of guilt; and these are the evils, the manner of incurring which the apostle employs as an illustration of the manner in which the great blessing of justification is obtained for man. This seems plain from the apostle's object, for evils not resulting entirely from Adam's sin would not have corresponded with blessings resulting entirely from our Lord's obedience; and further, it appears from his obviously contrasting the judgment of the one offense, which is executed, with the judgment of the many offenses, which is graciously removed in justification. J. B.

The meaning of the latter part of this chapter, as Augustine loves to draw it out, is as follows: The apostle had spoken in what went before of Christ's death, and the fruits of that death; but the question might well present itself: How should the death of one have such significance for all? Paul answers the question. This one is not merely one; he stands in a relation to all men which can only find its analogy in the relation in which Adam stood to all. He may be rightly called a "second Adam." In Adam the whole natural development of man was included; the entire human race is but the unfolding of that first, that one man. Exactly so Christ is a spiritual head. The whole race of regenerate men was shut up in him, is unfolded from him. As the huge oak with its trunk and all its spreading branches is rudimentally wrapped up in the single acorn; so the world, or mankind natural, in Adam, and the Church, or mankind spiritual, in Christ.

Only from this point of view, of the race, namely, as included in Adam, do we attain any right apprehension of the significance of Adam's sin. The injury which by that sin Adam inflicted on himself, he did not inflict on himself alone. It was a flinging of poison into the fountain head, and thus an infecting lower down of every drop of the stream. And only so do we attain any right apprehension of the significance of Christ's righteousness; for that other is but one side, the sadder and the darker side, of the same truth. That which held good for death held good also for life. The same law of intimate union between the members of the race and their head, which made one man's sin so diffusive of death, has made one man's obedience or righteousness so diffusive of life. Christ shall diffuse himself no less effectually than Adam, as the one by generation, so the other by regeneration. Nay, there shall be, as there ever must be, a mightier power in the good than in the evil ; for while the one sin was sufficient to ruin the world, the righteousness of one did not merely do away with that one sin, but with all the innumerable others which had unfolded themselves from it. T.

The dogma of original sin implies and affirms these propositions: 1. That God, in creating man, has created him an agent, moral, free, and fallible. 2. That the will of God is the moral law of man, and obedience to the will of God is the duty of man, inasmuch as he is a moral and free agent. 3. That, by an act of his own free will, man has knowingly failed in his duty by disobeying the law of God. 4. That the free man is a responsible being, and that disobedience to the law of God has justly entailed on him punishment. 5. That that responsibility and that punishment are hereditary, and that the fault of the first man has weighed and does weigh upon the human race. The authority of God, the duty of obedience to the law of God, the liberty and responsibility of man, the heritage of human responsibility are, in their moral chronology, the principles and facts comprised in the dogma of original sin. Guizot.

Most evangelical divines are divided between the Augustinian or realistic, the federal or forensic, and the Arminian theories. It should be remembered that the main difficulty lies in the fact itself—the undeniable, stubborn, terrible fact—of the universal dominion of sin and death over the entire race, infants as well as full-grown sinners. No system of philosophy has ever given a more satisfactory explanation than the great divines of the Church. Outside of the Christian redemption, the fall, with its moral desolation and ruin, remains an impenetrable mystery. But immediately after the fall appears, in the promise of the serpent-bruiser, the second Adam, and throws a bright ray of hope into the gloom of despair. In the fullness of the time, according to God's own counsel, he appeared in our nature to repair the loss, and to replace the temporary reign of sin by the everlasting reign of superabounding grace, which never could have been revealed in all its power without the fall. The person and work of the second Adam are the one glorious solution of the problem of the first, and the triumphant vindication of divine justice and mercy. This is the main point for all practical purposes, and in this, at least, all true Christians are agreed. P. S. —We offer a summation of the whole subject: 1. The vast majority, not only of Calvinists, but of Christians, hold that the race so had its probation in Adam's first trial, that it fell in his fall, and the consequences of his sin to himself passed over to his posterity. 2. The majority hold that his descendants did not sin in him really and literally. 3. A great majority hold that death is the penalty of sin, and includes every kind of penal evil. 4. A great majority hold that death thus extending to soul and body was visited upon Adam and his posterity by sin. 5. A great majority hold that Adam's sin was so reckoned to the account of (imputed to) the race, that its loss of the divine favor and communion with God, and, by consequence, its lapse into sin, was a visitation in judgment for that sin. 6. A great majority believe that evil inflicted on moral beings for sin, in support of law, is punishment, and that the present degradation of our race came in this way. 7. A great majority believe that Christ bore our sins, only as he bore their penalty, and had the chastisement of our peace laid upon him, and hence that sin may be so imputed to or reckoned to the account of those who did not personally commit it, that they shall bear its penalty. If this is possible in one extraordinary case, it may be in another. 8. A great majority believe that Christ is the second Adam, of whom the first was a type, inasmuch as, being condemned for the sin of the first Adam, we are justified by the righteousness of the second. "As by the disobedience of one many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous." Herein are found the elements of the true doctrine of original sin. These pregnant words of Pascal can not be gainsaid. "It is astonishing that the mystery which is farthest removed from our knowledge (I mean the transmission of original sin) should be that without which we can have no knowledge of ourselves. It is in this abyss that the clew to our condition takes its turns and windings, inasmuch that man is more incomprehensible without this mystery than this mystery is incomprehensible to man." C. H.

12. By Jesus we have received the reconciliation (v. 11); by one man sin entered into the world. In stating this similarity, the apostle draws the attention of his readers from Abraham, the father of the Jewish nation, of whom they boasted, and through whom they inherited many blessings, to a more remote ancestor, from whom both Jews and Gentiles were descended, and through whom they both inherited the same dismal legacy. In ascending to Adam, the distinction between Jews and Gentiles is lost, and the necessity of a Saviour is laid in that condition, which is common to all mankind. G. Hill.

13, 14. The 12th verse states that all mankind are exposed to death in consequence of the first sin of the first man. The proof of this fact is contained in the 13th and 14th verses, which refer to infants. These die entirely on account of the sin of the first man, without reference to their own personal violation of the divine law. J. B.

17, 18. Sin is death's parent. Had there been no sin, no one would have died. The first man received God's commandment on condition that if he kept it he should live, if he violated it he should die. By not believing that he would die, he did what caused him to die; and found that to have been true which the Giver of the law had affirmed. Thence came death, thence man became mortal, thence came labor, thence misery, thence the second death after the first, that is, after temporal death, death everlasting. This tradition of death, this law of destruction, binds every man who is born, except that one Man who became Man that man should not perish. For he came bound by no law of death; therefore he is called in the Psalm, "Free among the dead"; who lived without sin, who did not die because of sin; sharing in our penalty, not in our offense. Death is the penalty of offense; our Lord Jesus Christ came to die, did not come to sin; by sharing in our penalty without our offense, he annulled both our offense and penalty. What penalty? That which was due to us after this life. So he was crucified, that on the Cross he might show the dying out of our old man; and he rose, that in his own life he might show our new life. Aug.

Verse 18 should stand, "Therefore as through one trespass the issue was unto all men to condemnation: even so through one righteous act the issue was unto all men to justification of life." A.

19-21. When our unrighteousness was consummated, and full proof was given that punishment and death were to be looked for as its reward, and the time was come which God had preordained for the manifestation of his own loving-kindness and power (for the love of God, which proceeds from his transcendent benignity, is peerless), he did not hate us, nor repel us, nor did he remember evil, but showed his long-suffering, bore with us, himself took upon him our sins, gave up, of himself, his own Son as a ransom for us, the Holy for the lawless, the Innocent for the wicked, the Just for the unjust, the Incorruptible for the corruptible, the Immortal for the mortal. For what else but his Son's righteousness was able to cover our sins? Wherein was it possible for us, the lawless and impious, to be justified, save in the Son of God alone? O that sweet substitution! O that unsearchable plan! O those unexpected benefits! That the transgression of many should be covered by one righteous, and the righteousness of one should justify many that were unrighteous. Epistle of 2d Century.

How by one man's obedience could many be made righteous? The answer is not far to seek. The transcendent worth of that obedience which Christ rendered, of that oblation which he offered, the power which it possessed of countervailing and counterbalancing a world's sin, lay in this, that he who offered these, while he bore a human nature, and wrought human acts, was a divine person; not indeed God alone, for as such he would never have been in the condition to offer; nor man alone, for then the worth of his offering could never have reached so far; but that he was God and man in one person indissolubly united, and in this person performing all those acts: man, that he might obey and suffer and die; God, that he might add to every act of his obedience, his suffering, his death, an immeasurable worth, steeping in the glory of his divine personality all of human that he wrought. T.—The obedience of Christ is expressly declared to be the ground of our acceptance, and the sufferings of Christ are but a part of that obedience. Taken together, the active and the passive obedience constitute that one righteousness which is the sole meritorious ground of our acceptance. What he did, and what he suffered, are but one object in the sight of the law; a glorious righteousness, with which we are graciously invested; wrought out by our head, in our nature, but deriving infinite value from the hidden fountain of the Godhead. J. W. A.

CONDITION OF THE INFANT DEAD.

WHAT the Scriptures teach on this subject, according to the common doctrine of evangelical Protestants, is, all who die in infancy are saved. The Scriptures nowhere exclude any class of infants, baptized or unbaptized, born in Christian or in heathen lands, of believing or unbelieving parents, from the benefits of the redemption of Christ. C. H.—In the case of those who die in infancy, with original sin only affecting their natures, Christ, it would seem, stands to them for good, over against Adam for evil. As they are brought under the condemnation of original sin through Adam, so they receive remission of it through Christ. And the condition (involuntarily enjoyed, indeed, on their part, but voluntarily secured to them on God's)—the condition on which they receive this remission is, that they have committed no actual sin. Being taken away from the ordinary conditions of the gospel, they need no other. For if, in receiving this grant of remission, their relation to Christ be involuntary, so, in becoming subject to the sin forgiven, was their relation to Adam involuntary. Is it not reasonable, therefore, that, on the condition named, Christ, the greater, should remove what Adam, the less, entailed? It is the great law of the Church under the gospel that—while, in the case of those who live to commit actual sin, the death of Christ can be rendered effectual only by being applied in the exercises of faith and repentance, or of that inward renewing which is the work of the Spirit in the use of truth—in the case of all who die in infancy and without actual sin the death of Christ itself is effectual, without being so applied. As they have not become voluntary in following the first Adam's sin, so need they not be voluntary in relying on the second Adam's righteousness. Had it not been for Christ, the whole race had perished. But since he "hath tasted death for every man," they only perish who, to the fact of original sin, as an infection from our common head, add the guilt of actual sin, as the intelligent and voluntary issue of their own minds; and who, thus guilty and defiled, never become renewed and sanctified by the Holy Ghost unto repentance, faith, and holiness; but, on the contrary, either by an actual volition, or by cherishing tempers which would prompt such an act, reject the offer of pardon and life through the Saviour, and thus seal, beyond reversal, the sentence of their own condemnation.

This view of the effects of Christ's death and sacrifice accounts for the fact that so little is said in the Bible of those who die in infancy. Toward infancy and childhood as states of life, the Bible is full of the tenderest regard. The language of Christ to those who would have kept the little children from him may be taken as the best expression of that regard in summary; while it shows that between original sin in infancy and actual sin in subsequent years there is a broad and important difference. But the case of those who die in infancy the Bible leaves in almost unbroken silence. The comforted mourning of the penitent David over his dead child, "I shall go to him, but he shall not return to me" (2 Sam. 12 : 23), is the plainest and loudest if not the only word ever uttered to break that silence. But, in the remarkable silence which it generally observes, it plainly intimates that this is a case to which the ordinary conditions of the gospel do not apply; that, as "what the law says, it says to them that are under the law," so what the Bible anywhere says, it says to them that are under the Bible, and can understand its elementary and fundamental teachings; that dying infants not belonging to this class are in God's hands; and that, as he sees good to take them away from the ordinary lot of sinful men, so he probably takes them to that bosom of mercy, to that freeness of pardon for Christ's sake, to which the actual transgressor can be admitted in no other way than that fully prescribed in the gospel. This leads to bright and blessed views of their future lot; views full of the sunlight of hope, and rich with the blessedness of anticipated glory, to all whom God, in his chastening goodness, is pleased to beckon away ere the stain of actual sin has rested on their spirits. If they can not have, neither do they need, that specifically renewing and sanctifying change which God demands of all others. If they do not live to receive that gift of a renewed mind which Christ came to bestow, neither do they live to feel that voluntary breaking out of the disease of sin, the workings of which Christ came to destroy. Through Christ's sacrifice, the fact of original sin is, it may be believed, forgiven them; through God's intervention, the stain of actual sin is not contracted. The pains of temporal death come upon them, not in punishment of voluntary guilt, but as that only part of the original penalty which follows involuntary infection. In them, Adam still dies for his first offense. In them, Christ now lives, through his satisfying obedience. The first Adam plunged them into the peril of original sin. The second Adam travailed for them in bloody pain, and delivered them out of their peril. The former left them to a state of misery, as the inevitable consequence of introducing sin into the world. The latter wins them to a life of blessedness, as part of his promised reward for becoming a sacrifice for sin. J. S. S.

Section 243.

ROMANS vi. 1-23.

1 WHAT shall we say then? Shall we continue in sin, that grace may abound? God for-
2 bid. How shall we, that are dead to sin, live any longer therein? Know ye not, that so 3 many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ were baptized into his death? Therefore we 4 are buried with him by baptism into death: that like as Christ was raised up from the 5 dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life. For if we 6 have been planted together in the likeness of his death, we shall be also in the likeness of 7 his resurrection: knowing this, that our old man is crucified with him, that the body of 8 sin might be destroyed, that henceforth we should not serve sin. For he that is dead is 9 freed from sin.

8 Now if we be dead with Christ, we believe that we shall also live with him: knowing 9 that Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over 10 him. For in that he died, he died unto sin once: but in that he liveth, he liveth unto 11 God. Likewise reckon ye also yourselves to be dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God
12 through Jesus Christ our Lord. Let not sin therefore reign in your mortal body, that ye 13 should obey it in the lusts thereof. Neither yield ye your members as instruments of un-14 righteousness unto sin: but yield yourselves unto God, as those that are alive from the 15 dead, and your members as instruments of righteousness unto God. For sin shall not have 16 dominion over you: for ye are not under the law, but under grace.

15 What then? shall we sin, because we are not under the law, but under grace? God for-16 bid. Know ye not, that to whom ye yield yourselves servants to obey, his servants ye are 17 to whom ye obey; whether of sin unto death, or of obedience unto righteousness? But 18 God be thanked, that ye were the servants of sin, but ye have obeyed from the heart that 19 form of doctrine which was delivered you. Being then made free from sin, ye became the 20 servants of righteousness. I speak after the manner of men because of the infirmity of your 21 flesh: for as ye have yielded your members servants to uncleanness and to iniquity unto 22 iniquity; even so now yield your members servants to righteousness unto holiness. For 23 when ye were the servants of sin, ye were free from righteousness. What fruit had ye then in those things whereof ye are now ashamed? for the end of those things is death.
22 But now being made free from sin, and become servants to God, ye have your fruit unto 23 holiness, and the end everlasting life. For the wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord.

THE rich contents of this chapter may be summed up in this single proposition: the believing Christian can not possibly be a minister of sin. The true Christian can not live in sin, because the love of sin is destroyed in his heart since he really entered into fellowship with Him who died through sin and for it, that we might live through Him. The courage to strive against sin is enkindled by the union of faith with Christ; this faith awakens love to the Lord Jesus, and it is impossible that love and sin should permanently subsist together. Nay, through this courage is procured strength to obtain the victory, since he is indissolubly united, not merely with the dead, but also with the risen Christ: the spirit of life is in the Christian; and wherever He dwells and works, he must necessarily manifest himself as a purifying fire, consuming all unrighteousness. We may go yet a step further, and maintain that the true Christian will not serve sin, just because he feels himself free and happy under the dominion of grace. Experience testifies that the stumbling of true believers is really something different from the iniquity of the wholly unregenerate; the last live in sin, the first feel with deep pain that sin yet lives in them, and the history of centuries shows that the power of sin is most thoroughly broken by living faith and free grace where these have subjugated the life. Van O.

Our bodies—our natural bodies—will die alike in all of us. This is one death; but besides this shall all die another, the death of our sins or the death of our souls. Remember that one of these two deaths, both painful, we must die, every one of us. Which shall it be then? Shall it be the death of our sin or the death of our soul? The death whose pain comes at first most, yet even then, by Christ's grace, it is endurable; but afterward the suffering and the struggle lessen, and there comes the rest of death, and the vigor and the freshness and the glory of that divine and eternal life which the death of our sins has given birth to; or shall it be the death whose first strokes are silent and painless, which pours in its poison and we feel it not—more and more triumphant, and we more and more insensible; till behold, its work is accomplished, and then the agony is neither to be uttered nor conceived, and Christ is gone from us for ever, and life and death are become one for our destruction; a death of all good, a life of all evil. T. A.

1-23. There are two aspects in which the religion of Christ may be viewed, and we should never magnify the one at the expense of the other—as a Principle of Life and Happiness, and as a Principle of Subjection and Obedience—life that quickens obedience, obedience that manifests life—life that makes obedience delightful, obedience that makes life visible and practical. In the sixth chapter, you will find this representation a clew to the involutions of its rapid eloquence. This chapter is composed of the answers to two objections, and the objections and their respective answers (so often hastily confounded) are specially directed to special and distinct views of the gospel. The former objection speaks of life, and it is answered out of the nature and characteristics of spiritual life and death; the latter objection speaks of subjection, and it is appropriately answered by citing the characters and contrast of the sinful and the righteous service. The one asks (v. 1), Shall we abide—or “live” (v. 2) in sin, that grace may abound? and the answer is that we are dead to sin, that the old nature is crucified (v. 6), and that therefore it is unnatural, in the nature of things incompatible, that we should live to it. This death to sin is declared to be publicly solemnized in the expressive rite of baptism; and in it, as well as in the resurrection that follows it, we are declared to be copyists and partakers of Christ—“baptized into him,” into his death, his resurrection, and his eternal life (vs. 3-11). The consequence drawn from this (vs. 12-14) is that sin should not “have dominion over us,” that it should not be suffered any longer to intrude its foreign tyranny upon the purchased possession of God: and this forms the transition to the topic of the second objection, which turns upon the cardinal idea of subjection, and asks, “Shall we sin because we are not under the law but under grace?” The course of animated appeal that replies to this interrogatory (vs. 16-20) is fitted to it with exact and exclusive propriety. We are declared to be no longer “the servants of sin,” but “the servants of righteousness”; that, whereas in the bitter bondage of nature and the law men were “free from righteousness” (v. 20), they are under the dispensation of grace “free” (or rather freed)—emancipated—from sin, and formally articulated to that holy servitude of godliness and love, whose “gift is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord” (v. 23). Having thus concluded his double course of illustrative exposition, Paul passes (v. 21) to a further consideration, which results from both, and manifestly is framed to allude to both. He speaks of “the fruits,” or consequences, of the ways of nature and grace; and to each he applies the notions, before so copiously treated, of service and of life. Now, the “fruit” of bondage is properly its “wages,” the fruit of God's service is “a gift.” And therefore it is that, binding the whole argument and all its topics—life and freedom—death and bondage, and the fruits of each—into one summary, he declares that, “being freed from sin, and servants to God, ye have your fruit unto holiness, and the end everlasting life; for the wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life.” W. A. B.

3. His argument is briefly this: The abounding of grace in the free pardon of sin by Jesus Christ neither encourages nor tolerates sin, because, in accepting by faith that covenant of grace which is sealed in baptism, we come under the most solemn obligations to abstain from all sin; while at the same time, if we are not hypocrites, we have that inward principle of the new life which the Spirit quickens in us through the truth, and which ultimately works the utter death of all sin in our natures. So far, therefore, as his language in the third verse is concerned, there is no need of seeking for anything more, or for anything else, than the idea intimated in the paraphrase, that "as many as are baptized in the name of Jesus Christ are baptized with a profession of that inward renewing which makes us dead unto sin, even as Christ once died for sin." J. S. S.—Christians are here said to be baptized, as in another Epistle they are said to be circumcised, by their union to Christ (Col. 2 : 11). As the one expression describes a state of mind, represented by an outward act, but never produced by it, so does the other. Both ceremonies were useful, as other means of religious instruction, and other ways of religious profession; but that they had any peculiar power to change the spiritual condition of men, is nowhere taught in the Bible. This is now universally admitted of circumcision, and it is equally true of water-baptism.

4. Buried. The resemblance of the Christian to his Lord, which is here described, must be moral and spiritual, and not corporeal. As the death referred to is a state of mind, and the crucifixion which precedes death, and the life which follows, so must the burial be. It is nothing outward and formal. The mention of burial connects the death with the resurrection spoken of; and it shows more fully the separation of the Christian from the world. He is crucified, he dies, and he is buried. These are figurative representations of the spiritual state of all who have faith in Christ, and follow him. The same figure is repeated by the apostle in another Epistle, where they who have the circumcision of Christ are said to be buried with him in this baptism (Col. 2 : 11). The interchange of these terms shows that both denote simply a spiritual purification and consecration. J. H. G.—The Spirit is not tied to baptism, but he may act out of the sacraments as well as in them. Understand this of the bare want of baptism, not of the contempt or willful neglect of it. How did the thief upon the cross enter into Paradise which Christ promised him? Without baptism. So that one may enter into heaven without baptism by water, though not without the baptism of the Spirit. Charnock.

Walk in newness of life. Not by merely trying not to sin, but by entering farther and farther into the new life, in which, when it is completed, sin becomes impossible; not by merely weeding out wickedness, but by a new and supernatural cultivation of holiness, does the saint of the New Testament walk on the ever-ascending pathway of growing Christliness, and come at last perfectly to Christ. This is the true difference between law and grace; and the New Testament is the book of grace. Oh, that the richest, and liveliest, and most personal word in all the language did not sound so meager, dead, and formal! In its fundamental character the New Testament is a book not of prohibitions but of eager inspirations. P. B.

5. Literally, have become partakers by a vital union [as that of a graft with the tree into which it is grafted] of the representation of his death [in baptism]. The meaning appears to be, if we have shared the reality of his death, whereof we have undergone the likeness. C.—6. In our inward renewal, professed and sealed in baptism, our old man is crucified with Christ for the very purpose that henceforth we should not serve sin. 7. For he who has thus died to sin is Christ's free man, and no longer a slave to sin.

8, 9. The sense of the passage is as follows: "If, as we profess at baptism, we be really 'dead with Christ,' really penitent for sin, thoroughly determined to renounce it, and inwardly deadened to its power, 'we believe we shall also live with him'; shall continue to cherish and cultivate and enjoy the spiritual life which our repentance and faith imply; and not only so, but shall ultimately rise, like Christ, from the dead, and live with him for evermore. 'As death hath no more dominion over him,' so shall it have no more over us, either in the tyranny of sin in this life, or in the abiding power of the grave over us, when this life shall have ended." It is probable that, at baptism, the early converts to Christ professed their faith in the great doctrine of the resurrection from the dead, based on the FACT of the resurrection of Christ. J. S. S.

Faith looks so steadfastly on its suffering Saviour, that it makes the soul like him, assimilates and conforms it to his death, as the apostle speaks. That which Papists fabulously say of some of their saints, that they received the impression of the wounds of Christ in their bodies, is true, in a spiritual sense, of the soul of every one that is indeed a saint and a believer. It takes the very print of his death, by beholding him, and dies to sin; and then takes that of his rising again, and lives to righteousness; as it applies it to justify, so to mortify, drawing virtue from it. Thus said one, "Christ aimed at this in all those sufferings that, with so much love, he went through; and shall I disappoint him, and not serve his end?"

10. He that is one with Christ by believing is one throughout in death and life. As Christ rose, so he that is dead to sin with him, through the power of his death, rises to that new life with him, through the power of his resurrection. And these two are our sanctification, which whosoever do partake of Christ and are found in him do certainly draw from him. All they that do really come to Jesus Christ come to him as their Saviour, to be clothed with him and made righteous by him; they come like wise to him as their Sanctifier, to be made new and holy by him, to die and live with him.

11. No sinner will be content to die to sin, if that were all; but if it be passing to a more excellent life, then he gaineth, and it were a folly not to seek this death. It was a strange power of Plato's "Discourse of the Soul's Immortality," that moved a young man, upon reading it, to throw himself into the sea, that he might leap through it to that immortality. Were this life of God, this life to righteousness, and the excellency and delight of it, known, it would gain many minds to this death, whereby we step into it. L.

12, 13. The real seat of sin is in the will, alienated from God, and set upon the gratification of self. The motives to sin, and its agents also, are the passions and desires of our lower nature—the flesh as acted upon by the enticements of the world. The senses and members of the body become the occasions and the instruments of unrighteousness. But, through yielding to these, the will itself becomes their slave; and the man who should rule the body and have dominion over the world by his spiritual nature, which is the image of God, subjects that nature to the body, and is ruled by the world, the flesh, and the devil. J. P. T.—The divine laws are the rule of duty to the entire man, and not to the soul only. And they are obeyed or violated by the soul and body in conjunction. The soul designs, the body executes; the senses are the open ports to admit temptations. Carnal affections deprave the soul, corrupt the mind and mislead it. The love of sin is founded in sensible pleasures: "And the members are the servants of iniquity." The heart is the fountain of profaneness, and the tongue expresses it. And the body is obsequious to the holy soul in doing or suffering for God, and denies its sensual appetites and satisfactions in compliance with reason and grace. The "members are the instruments of righteousness." Bates.

Yield yourselves. The gospel binds us to the service of a God of truth and purity, and only in this way can its blessings be enjoyed. When we accept the gospel, we not only receive something from God, we give something to him. In the language of the apostle, "we yield ourselves unto God." Where this is forgotten altogether, where service is passed by, it is what the apostle terms "receiving the grace of God in vain," and where it is put into the background, it produces a weak, sinewless Christianity, which seeks a comfortable home for itself, and does small work for the cause of either God or man. Ker.

14. The believer is not still struggling, trying sorrowfully to get faith enough, any more than works enough, to be saved by. He is up on the heights of spiritual liberty, no longer under law, but in grace. He knows whom he has believed, and is assured that he is "saved already" in that he does believe—"passed from death unto life." And thus, being emancipated from the hindrance of self-interest, he obeys from love, brings his body more and more under, for the pure Master's sake, goes from grace to grace, and has "peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ." F. D. H.

15. Where, in the New Testament, can we find a single word that should lead us to suppose ourselves less debtors to the law, because Christ became our ransom? He pardons the criminal, he has paid the debt, but he does not abrogate the law. Nay, how he "magnified" it, by himself becoming a perfect example of obedience! R. Hill.

16. The living belief which has really been implanted in the soil of thought and feeling can not but bear its proper flower and fruit in the moral and intellectual life of a thoughtful and earnest man. H. P. L.—In all the articles comprised in the Creed, my belief is unclouded by doubt. Would to God that my faith, which works on the whole man, confirming and conforming, were but in just proportion to my belief—to the full acquiescence of my intellect, and the deep consent of my conscience! S. T. C.—Remember that so many waking hours as we have in every day, so many hours have we of sin or of holiness: every hour delivers in and must deliver its record; and everything so recorded is placed either on one side of the fatal line or on the other; it is charged to our great account of good or of evil. Yes, all that countless multitude of unremembered thoughts and words and deeds take their places distinctly, and swell the sum for condemnation or for glory. In themselves, like ciphers, there is a little figure to be placed before them which gives to them an infinite value; there is faith on the one hand to give them all a virtue for good, there is carelessness on the other hand to make them all count for evil. For whatsoever is not of faith is sin; but whatever is sanctified by a holy and careful general intention, is done, even though it be so common a thing as eating and drinking—is done to the glory of God, and therefore to our own salvation through Christ Jesus. T. A.

17-19. "But God be thanked that you, who were once the slaves of sin, have obeyed from your hearts the teaching whereby you were molded anew; and when you were freed from the slavery of sin you became the bondmen of righteousness. I speak the language of common life, to show the weakness of your fleshly nature (which must be in bondage either to the one or to the other)." C.

18. Sin itself is an element of discipline; and as for the affections enthralled by its despotism, they are sinful, not in themselves as affections, but in their depravation; they are meant to be, not the

'bond-slaves of evil, but the liberated "servants of righteousness"; they are born for eternity and for God! W. A. B.

19. The body has changed its master. It always serves, but instead of serving the mind it serves the flesh. Yes, the body serves the flesh, for the flesh and the body are not the same thing. They are often distinguished from each other in the gospel; and here Paul shows us the partisans of a fictitious holiness, treating the body with harshness for fear of flattering the flesh. The body or the members, which we ought, according to Paul's expression, to make the servants of righteousness and holiness, are, under the orders of the flesh or animal principle, the servants of impurity and unrighteousness. The body, then, is a servant to be restored to its true master, who is the Spirit; but the true enemy of the Spirit is the flesh; and, accordingly, in the gospel it is not the body but the flesh which is condemned; for, as Paul says, it is with the flesh, not with the body, that we serve the law of sin (Rom. 7 : 25). Jesus Christ, clothed mysteriously with this thoroughly and universally tainted flesh, has condemned sin in the flesh. A. V.

20. Much discourse and much ink hath been spilt upon the debate of free will, but truly all the liberty it hath, till the Son and his Spirit free it, is that miserable freedom the apostle speaks of here: While ye were servants to sin, ye were free from righteousness. And as we are naturally subject to the drudgery of sin, so we are condemned to the proper wages of sin, which the apostle tells us is death, according to the just sentence of the law. But our Lord Christ was anointed for this purpose, to set us free himself, both to work and to publish liberty, to proclaim liberty to captives, and the opening of the prison-doors to them that are bound. Having paid our complete ransom, he sends his word as the message and his Spirit to perform it, effectually to set us free, to let us know it, and to bring us out of prison. L.

21. God has not intrusted these sensitive souls to us to be experimented upon by a vain curiosity or a headstrong self-confidence. They are to be guarded at every point from all that blights and all that defiles. They are to be surrounded with blameless associations, with companions that act and speak no guile. Every hour while contamination is postponed, and corruption kept away, is so much saved for virtue. The powers of right in the soul are strengthening. Good habits are getting formed and confirmed. The currents of desire, of thought, and of emotion, are learning to run in fixed and lawful channels. F. D. H.

The end is death. Not the dissolution of the body, not extinction of being, but that final separation from all that is holy and blessed; that hopeless abandonment to all that is evil and tormenting; that unutterable anguish of a mind in perpetual conflict with itself and with God, which constitute most truly the death of the soul; a death to be endured, not for a few years, not for a single century, not for thousands of ages, but for eternity. And shall not he, who beholds the sinner slumbering on the verge of perdition, warn him of his danger? Shall he be censured for preaching terror, and for attempting unduly to move the passions of his hearers, who tells them, in the language of inspiration, the end of these things is death, they shall be tormented day and night for ever and ever? Tappan.—

23. The wages that sin bargains with the sinner are life, pleasure, and profit; but the wages it pays him are death, torment, and destruction. He that would understand the falsehood and deceit of sin must compare the promises and the payment together. R. S.

Eternal life through Jesus Christ. Oh that we might feel our dear obligations to him who has "delivered us from the wrath to come," and purchased for us a felicity perfect, and without end! How engaging is the love of Christ, who raised us to the bosom of God, the seat of happiness! Bates.—Undeterred by anticipated sorrows, undismayed by evils from which every other being in the universe would have shrunk, he gave himself to win the prize of life eternal for you—will he, think you, withhold, or be reluctant to bestow, that prize upon you now that his pains and toils are ended, now that he has only to speak the word, and it is yours? The salvation of your soul was an end so glorious, that he was willing to reach it though the way to it led through blood and darkness and death—can you entertain any doubt that he is willing to secure it now when nothing intervenes, when every difficulty has been overcome, when he has but to stretch out the hand of mercy, and the consummation of all his sufferings is attained? No, it can not be. It is impossible to exaggerate the certainty and freeness of that salvation that is in Christ for all who will but lay hold of it. It is impossible that anything in the universe can lie between you and eternal life, if you but accept it as "the gift of God through Jesus Christ our Lord." Caird.

Section 244.

ROMANS vii. 1-25.

1 Know ye not, brethren, (for I speak to them that know the law,) how that the law hath 2 dominion over a man as long as he liveth? For the woman which hath an husband is bound by the law to her husband so long as he liveth; but if the husband be dead, she is 3 loosed from the law of her husband. So then if, while her husband liveth, she be married to another man, she shall be called an adulteress: but if her husband be dead, she is free 4 from that law; so that she is no adulteress, though she be married to another man. Wherefore, my brethren, ye also are become dead to the law by the body of Christ; that ye should be married to another, even to him who is raised from the dead, that we should bring forth 5 fruit unto God. For when we were in the flesh, the motions of sins, which were by the 6 law, did work in our members to bring forth fruit unto death. But now we are delivered from the law, that being dead wherein we were held; that we should serve in newness of spirit, and not in the oldness of the letter.

7 What shall we say then? Is the law sin? God forbid. Nay, I had not known sin, but by 8 the law: for I had not known lust, except the law had said, Thou shalt not covet. But sin, taking occasion by the commandment, wrought in me all manner of concupiscence. For 9 without the law sin was dead. For I was alive without the law once: but when the com-10 mandment came, sin revived, and I died. And the commandment, which was ordained to 11 life, I found to be unto death. For sin, taking occasion by the commandment, deceived me, 12 and by it slew me. Wherefore the law is holy, and the commandment holy, and just, and 13 good. Was then that which is good made death unto me? God forbid. But sin, that it might appear sin, working death in me by that which is good; that sin by the command-14 ment might become exceeding sinful. For we know that the law is spiritual: but I am 15 carnal, sold under sin. For that which I do I allow not: for what I would, that do I not;
16 but what I hate, that do I. If then I do that which I would not, I consent unto the law
17 that it is good. Now then it is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me. For I 18 know that in me (that is, in my flesh,) dwelleth no good thing: for to will is present with 19 me; but how to perform that which is good I find not. For the good that I would I do 20 not: but the evil which I would not, that I do. Now if I do that I would not, it is no
21 more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me. I find then a law, that, when I would do 22 good, evil is present with me. For I delight in the law of God after the inward man: but I 23 see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into 24 captivity to the law of sin which is in my members. O wretched man that I am! who shall 25 deliver me from the body of this death? I thank God through Jesus Christ our Lord. So then with the mind I myself serve the law of God; but with the flesh the law of sin.

WHEN the divine law, as interpreted and applied by Christ, reaches to the very depths of man's consciousness of sin; when it sets before him its inviolable sanctity and its irreversible obligations; when it forces him against his will to test himself by its solemn and searching light; when it reveals the depths of his sin and guilt, far, far below the careless, worldly thoughts and feelings that usually engross and blind the soul; when sin by the commandment becomes exceedingly sinful, and is pictured in all its blackness upon the vivid, stainless background of the imperial rule of rectitude; and when this supernal light is flashed into all the recesses of the quivering and guilty soul with a brightness clearer than that of the noonday's radiance—then, then it is that man comes to know himself, to know himself as a sinner not only against a holy law, but also against a holy God—to know the terrible power of his depravity and guilt as clinging to the very roots of his being. H. B. S.

When the aspiration after a purer, nobler life begins to rise within the breast, and the long-passive spirit rouses its energies to check the pride of evil, to force back and stay the current of unholy desire and passion; when the softening principle of divine love and grace begins to thaw the icy coldness of a godless heart, then it is that the soul becomes aware of the deadly strength of sin. Nor is it only in the first struggles of penitence that sin is revealed in its true character to the soul. With every increase of spirituality, whatever of evil remains in it becomes more repulsive to its keener sensibilities, more irksome to its aspiring energies. Faults and errors, unapparent or venial to its former consciousness, become in the higher stages of the spiritual life more and more odious ; and in the purest and best actions more of evil is now discerned than formerly in the basest and worst. The quickened conscience feels the drag of sin at each successive step the more heavy ; and as the believing spirit yearns with an intenser longing for the life of God, with a more indignant impatience does the cry break from the lip : " Who shall deliver me from the body of this death ? " Caird.

PAUL'S view of the Christian life, throughout the sixth, seventh, and eighth chapters, is that it consists of a death and a resurrection ; the new-made Christian dies to sin, to the world, to the flesh, and to the law ; this death he undergoes at his first entrance into communion with Christ. But no sooner is he thus dead with Christ, than he rises with him ; he is made partaker of Christ's resurrection ; he is united to Christ's body ; he lives in Christ, and to Christ ; he is no longer " in the flesh," but " in the spirit." C.

1-6. The illustration obviously describes a great change—a dissolution of old connections and a formation of new ones ; the government of the law and the espousal to Christ are manifestly contrasted, and the readers are pointedly warned of the duties that belong to that great and blessed engagement. Paul has established the two great characteristics of the new dispensation—the death to sin which heralds the life to righteousness, and the emancipation from sin which gives the Christian freedom to the service of his God. With both these great ideas—prominent and governing ideas in his view—he enters upon the passage under consideration. In reaching it, however, his mind passes through, and takes the tincture of, an important connecting notion, the notion of the " fruits," the results in heart and habits, of the dispensations of law and grace. In the fourth and fifth verses it is said that we are " to bring forth fruit unto God " instead of " bringing forth fruit unto death " ; and this blessed result is declared to follow upon the espousal in the allegory, upon our being " married to another, even to him who is raised from the dead." This passage, then, confirms, repeats, all that has gone before ; it does not alter its bearings or displace its relations. Like it, it speaks of a soul that once lived to sin and lived to bondage ; like it, of a death which exalts the same soul to righteousness and to freedom. How then shall we dispose the personages of the allegory, to harmonize perfectly with itself and with all that precedes and follows it ? Shall we not say that the Wife indeed, the subject of the mighty change, represents the Soul ; that the deceased Husband, whose claim or power expires, symbolizes, not the Law, but the Principle of Sin to which the Law ministered, and to which so much of the preceding chapter describes the regenerate soul as " dead "—dead to sin because sin is dead ? And when Paul describes the woman as " loosed from the law of the husband," " free from that law," and " answerably dead to the law," shall we not plainly perceive that " the law " in the parable is not represented by the dead husband, but by " the law of the husband," the matrimonial obligation, which kept the soul in bondage as long as sin was alive, but which ceases for ever when sin, the soul's gloomy consort and tyrant, has expired ? Under this interpretation all is complete and consistent. The law, by the universal principle of law, has dominion over the woman, as it has over all, as long as life lasts. But with death the obligation terminates ; over her that is mystically dead the condem-

ing law loses its stern control. How then is this death produced ? The second and third verses purposely tell us, with a view to preparing the way for the new connection that is to follow that mysterious death. It is itself a result or necessary accompaniment of the death of the husband. Here is the momentous peculiarity of this case : the husband is the principle of sin, and the death of sin in the soul is the death of the soul unto sin. In this way, conformably to the apostle's assumption in the first verse, the power of the law—that is, in the allegory, the old matrimonial bond—expires ; in point of fact, by the simultaneous death of both the parties, but mainly (for this is the chief scope of the whole) by the death of the wife, as he had said above (so exquisitely harmonious is the management of the figure all through), " the one that is dead is freed from sin." Thus is she freed from the obligation of her miserable bondage ; she is enfranchised by him who has slain her accursed companion ; through his victorious sacrifice, she is " dead to the law by the body of Christ." The death of sin and unto sin liberates from the law and opens the way for the new and celestial union. The law bound the wretched soul in servitude to sin, for " the strength of sin is the law"—it gave sin its sinfulness and gave no power to escape it ; nor could this terrible espousal to evil be broken in the nature of things and God's providential dispensation, except by that decease of sin, which left the soul correspondingly " dead to sin," " dead, then, to the law " (which can only govern the living), and free to form the new and sacred union. The main subject of the allegory, then, is not the death of the law, but the death of the soul to sin and the law ; it is this which assimilates it to the reasoning it follows, and incorporates it in the mass and current of the apostle's discourse. The interpretation which considers the deceased husband to be the conquered principle of sin is strongly confirmed by the form of expression in the fifth verse ; while the sixth verse furnishes a proof that the two great subjects of life and service were never out of the apostle's calculation through all this comparison, and hence as a proof how closely it is connected with the entire. Summing up the past discussion before he proceeds to a new one, he recalls again the two main characteristics of the gift of God which he had bound together in the illustration—the death to sin and the new service to Christ. " We are delivered from the law, that—namely, sin—being dead (or, ' we being dead to that ') wherein we were held ; that we should serve in newness of spirit and not in the oldness of the letter." Surely this, a professed inference from the passage we have discussed, evidences that that passage itself must contain these elements ; must embody in one forcible example the fundamental doctrines of the spiritual death to sin as the great initial step in the Christian course, and the fruits of obedience to God as the manifestation of the spiritual resurrection.

4. You are dead to the law as a sole covenant of life, for it is " the ministration of death " ; you are dead to it as a principle of life, for "the letter killeth" and "the flesh profiteth nothing." To this law you are "dead" in being dead to sin; you stand in the same relationship to it as those whom men call dead, but who indeed are "alive unto God"—who, "through the grave and gate of death," have passed into another world and a higher form of existence. The law—solitary and terrible—was as such an element in the old world of sin and weakness; it was the curse suspended over the head that could not stir to escape it. All perfect indeed, for it was a copy of the mind of God; but dreadful to behold, for it was above the strength of man. It was the presence of Jehovah in a world unworthy of him; and it consumed where it shone. To this frowning and fearful avenger you are dead, "the body of Christ" has wrought this glorious decease, the lightnings of heaven have fallen on Calvary and expired there, and you can now triumph by death as He has done! W. A. B.

6. "We are delivered from the law, that we should serve in newness of the spirit, not in oldness of the letter." The spiritual man acts, not from the thought of external command or of external denunciation. He is a law unto himself. The impulses and instincts of "the divine nature," of which the saved are "partakers," make duty a necessity, labor a delight, obedience a spontaneous service, conformity to the law a privilege and a joy! T. B.

7-11. He gives an actual experience of his own; he states what none can deny, and what finds an echo in the history of a thousand souls. "The law is not sin"; far be the thought. Yet (not "nay," which obscures and blunders the whole) so near is the law to being sin, that the law first introduced me to sin—first made me acquainted with it. But how? I was in the habit of coveting. I did it, unconscious of any fault. But the law came in, became heeded by me, with its voice, "Thou shalt not covet"; and my coveting started up into sin, became sinful to me, and in my esteem. And, as we are ever prone to enjoy that which is forbidden, sin thus got life and zest for me, and I indulged in all manner of coveting, just because stolen waters were sweet, and sin wrought upon my human perverseness. Before this forbidding voice spoke within me, before the commandment "came," I lived; was alive and well; enjoyed a kind of innocence and free will of my own; but after this, not I, but sin in me, lived and wrought its will. And the very prohibition which was for life, by waking up the sense of sin and the desire for sin, killed me, set me lusting for that evil which is death, and slew my free will and my former peace and joy. Yet notice that it was not the commandment itself, but sin, the sinful principle in me, awakened into life by the commandment, that thus killed me; and the commandment only brought out that which was there before, but latent and dormant: brought it out for good, and for the behalf and the life of the better and worthier "I," the "I" in conflict with sin, the complex man, the "I Paul" of the time present. A.

9-11. Paul himself rested contented with his pharisaism and outward righteousness, until, by a serious application of the rule, he found that to be a merit of death which he had formerly reckoned upon as a plea for life. Not until the law came with its spiritual power did Paul look upon himself as a doomed and devoted malefactor, thankful for the offered pardon of the gospel, and humbly acquiescing in its proposals, and its ways for his acceptance with God. T. M.

Amiability of natural character, correctness of moral deportment, strict integrity in our dealings with our fellow-men, are not the holiness which the law requires. In the believer these acts are the fruit of supreme love to God, entire submission of spirit to his sovereign authority, and apprehension of the beauty and blessedness of holiness. In the natural mind the very same acts are the fruit of self-love, desire of esteem, pride of character, self-righteousness. Hence these actions, good in themselves and wisely ordered for the preservation of the frame of society, are so far from being holiness in the eye of the heart-searching God, that they are often direct evidences of enmity to him, in those who perform them; and when the defects of all such obedience are exposed in the light of the holy law of God, the enmity will instantly discover itself. Goods.

Law constantly keeps in advance of our performance, and yet condemns us for not keeping up with it. With the august and awful splendor of its purity, it frowns upon our pollution, shames our inconsistencies, threatens our guilt. The farther we go in complying with its demands, the keener our sense of its perfection grows; the higher the standard rises, the clearer the command sounds, and the more hopeless our self-disgust and our agony become. There is no satisfaction there. Just in proportion as we come consciously under law, and law alone, we are wretched. It is warning, and nothing but warning. Paul's wondrous spiritual insight saw that; and so he says, in his energetic phrase, that sin comes by the law; the strength of sin is the law; when the commandment came, sin revived. That is, by the law, the rule of right, comes a knowledge of transgression. No law, no violation of law—and so no accusing conscience. And the more law, that is, the more clearly you see the command, the more sin. This is logical; and it is experimental. F. D. H.

12. The Christian hath now nothing to do with the law as it thundereth and burneth on Sinai, or as it bindeth the conscience to wrath and the displeasure of God for sin ; for from its thus appearing he is freed by faith in Christ. Yet he is to have regard thereto, and is to count it holy, just, and good ; which that he may do, he is always to remember that he who giveth it to us is merciful, gracious, long-suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth. Bun.

13. In what we call the moral world there is an element which is absolutely, intrinsically, wholly, and always bad. Its very name is, with emphasis, EVIL ; we call it also vice, depravity, wickedness, and, in Scriptural language, it is named SIN. It is the Divine Law, amply and spiritually apprehended, that must expose the malignity of sin—displaying the essential nature and principle of “that abominable thing” (to make the true devil stand confessed), while it names or defines, generally and in detail, the things that are sin—the practical forms which it takes in doing its mischief among the creatures of God. It is this law, clearly and solemnly manifested and apprehended, that exposes the true quality of sin—shows it to be exceedingly sinful—its own name being the worst word that could be found to express its quality. J. F.

Sin is not something which has penetrated into our nature from the outside ; it is not learned like a lesson of evil, nor caught like an infectious disease. It has its springs in the very sources of our being. It can not be torn up by the roots. It can not be treated by any medicine which discipline, or education, or example can supply. There is one power, and one only, which can lay hands on the enemy with whom we are contending ; and that power is the power that first made the soul itself. He who stands as it were behind the secret fountains from which our being issues, he and he alone can deal with this awful disease by which we are all afflicted ; he and he alone can attack sin in the very citadel of its dominion, and win the victory which we could never win. Our justification must come from him, and therefore must begin with that which he puts into us, that movement of the heart and conscience, which we call faith ; and can not come from the regulation and discipline of our habits and our deeds, which is what is meant by works. The regulation of the deeds is excellent, but it is still absolutely and always subordinate. F. T.

15, 16. Those sins shall never be a Christian's bane that are now his greatest burden. It is not falling into the water, but lying in the water, that drowns. It is not falling into sin, but lying in sin, that destroys the soul. If sin and thy heart are two, Christ and thy heart are one. Brooks.—Every child of God knows that he is justified by faith only : and that true faith necessarily begets holiness and good works. Yet in the knowledge of this truth many a gracious soul goes to work quite at the wrong end, and thereby loses both the privilege and comfort of looking as a sinner directly at Christ. The Scripture exhortations show us more what we ought to be than what any attain to. But try the secret workings of thy heart. Dost thou consent unto the law that it is good ? Is sin thy grief and burden ; and though it prevail again and again, dost thou strive and pray against it ? If such be the workings of the heart, be assured that it proceeds from the blowings of the sweet Spirit of grace upon thy garden ; and though the fruits and blossoms may be blown off by the nipping blasts of sin and temptation, yet there is life in the root, which will surely sprout out again, and endure unto everlasting life. Hill.

19. The godly man hates the evil he possibly by temptation hath been drawn to do, and loves the good he is frustrated of, and, having intended, hath not attained to do. The sinner, who hath his denomination from sin as his course, hates the good which sometimes he is forced to do, and loves that sin which many times he does not, either wanting occasion and means so that he can not do it, or through the check of an enlightened conscience possibly dares not do ; and though so bound up from the act, yet the habit, the natural inclination and desire in him, is still the same, the strength of his affection is carried to sin. So, in the weakest sincere Christian, there is that predominant sincerity and desire of holy walking, according to which he is called a righteous person : the Lord is pleased to give him that name and account him so, being upright in heart though often failing. L.—The Christian has within him both flesh and spirit, yet he is not a double-minded man ; he is often led captive by the law of sin, yet it never gets dominion over him ; he can not sin, yet he can do nothing without sin. He does nothing against his will, yet maintains he does what he would not. Bacon.

20. It is one great work of the Spirit of God to make us feel this distinctness between us and the evil which is in us. The good and the evil are no longer in a state of blind contradiction, but of distinct, self-conscious opposition. The renewed man knows that he has an adversary, but, for his comfort, he knows also that this adversary is not his very self, but another, so that, if he resist him, he will flee from him ; he knows that the power which that other exercises over him is a usurpation, and that it will be a righteous thing for God to cast out him who obtained that power by fraud and violence. T.

21, 22. Whoever he may be that is speaking, he says in one verse, “I would do good” ; in another, “I delight in the law of God” ; and surely these are expressions which never yet came with truth from unhallowed lips, that never could come from any but a renewed heart. Besides, this complaint itself marks the character of him who uttered it. It designates one hating sin in a very extraordinary degree, and striving against it with every power of his soul; and Paul himself was a man of this class. We infer, therefore, that the apostle is describing his own feelings in this passage, and consequently right feelings, exactly those feelings which in a world like this we should expect to find in a partially renewed mind. And he speaks here not merely as a Christian, but as a very experienced Christian; as one arrived at a state of rare maturity in grace, a state in which sin appears to the mind, as it appears to the divine mind, an intolerable evil, a thing so hateful that the very remains of it are not to be endured; they must be got rid of, at all events they must be controlled and counteracted, or the heart will break. And the holiest will be the most willing to take this view, and never so ready to look at it in this light as in their holiest hours. C. B.—Was not this Paul's malady, When I would do good, evil is present with me? But know once, that though thy duty is to eschew evil and do good, yet thy salvation is more surely founded than on thine own good. That perfection which answers justice and the law is not required of thee: Thou art to walk, not after the flesh, but after the spirit; but in so walking, whether in a low or high measure, still thy comfort lieth in this, that there is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus, as the apostle begins the next chapter after his sad complaints. So then mourn with him and yet rejoice with him, and go on with courage as he did; still fighting the good fight of faith. L.

It is not to be supposed that Christians ever have any experiences in this world that are wholly pure, entirely spiritual, without any mixture of what is natural and carnal. The beam of light, as it comes from the fountain of light upon our hearts, is pure, but as it is reflected thence it is mixed; the seed, as sent from heaven and planted in the heart, is pure, but as it springs up out of the heart, is impure; there is commonly a much greater mixture than persons for the most part seem to have any imagination of. Edwards.

Grace and nature both act in a regenerate man, and both at once. Nature only acts in an unregenerate man. So that, though sin be directly contrary to the Christian's walk, and as regenerate he hates it and can not commit it, yet the old nature in a believer can never love holiness. Hence that continual, never-ceasing war in a child of God between flesh and Spirit, sin and grace, the law in the members and the law in the mind. The law of grace must finally triumph over the law of sin. During this desperate combat all the believer's confidence is in Christ, in whom he is always "complete," and in whom he has such a righteousness as neither the law, sin, death, hell, nor the grave can sully or find fault with. Paul did not talk about the remainder of indwelling sin: his complaints were of "a body of sin," a "law in his members warring against the law in his mind." I feel, by sad experience, that my own nature, which I carry about with me here below, is earthly and selfish; but I know, by infallible truth, that my own nature, which is in Christ, is perfectly pure and holy, "without spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing." A believer is imperfectly a new creature in himself: perfectly a new creature in Christ. Hill.

24, 25. He complains of himself and he rejoices in Christ almost at the same instant. He is comforted in the very midst of his wretchedness. Nay, in one sense, he owes his comfort to his wretchedness. It sends him to his God. It brings him near that blessed Comforter, in whom is treasured up a ready and full relief for all his sorrows. Look on him as he stands alone, he is "of all men the most miserable"; view him as leaning on his beloved Lord, and there is not a being out of heaven so happy. "Sorrowful yet always rejoicing, having nothing and yet possessing all things," his whole life is a glorious paradox. "I thank God," he says, and says it often, and says it joyfully, "I thank God, through Jesus Christ my Lord. He has given me deliverance. Sin lives in me still, but he does not suffer it to reign." Turn then to the blameless Paul, to him of whom, after his conversion to God, the Holy Ghost has not left on record one sin or one folly. What says his experience? It tells you that there may be conflict in a pardoned heart; and it tells you more—that there may be in that very heart, amidst all its conflicts, a sense of forgiveness, a triumphant assurance of pardon. It tells you that a man may groan under a sense of sin, and yet look on himself as an heir of glory. C. B.

The Progress of Grace.—The awakened soul sees the evil of sin, the spirituality of the law, and the holiness of God. In these views he can behold nothing but wrath and condemnation before him. He resolves upon better obedience. The Spirit discovers to him more and more the law's spirituality. His very best actions fall short of its infinite demands: all he does, all he is, all he has, is tainted with sin. Then the Spirit shows him that the gospel looks for no goodness in the creature, and that it gives a free welcome to all sorts and degrees of sinners, without exception; that, as no holiness foreseen in him could move God to love him and give him his grace, so no sins in him could induce God to hate him and to deny him that grace. In proportion as these discoveries are made to him, all the objections which self-righteousness and unbelief can bring fall, like so many Dragons, before the mighty truth, that "Christ died for the ungodly." From these views spring a sincere desire of obedience, hatred of sin as such, and desire and purpose to forsake it. H.W.

Section 245.

ROMANS viii. 1-13.

1 THERE is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus, who walk
 2 not after the flesh, but after the Spirit. For the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus
 3 hath made me free from the law of sin and death. For what the law could not do, in that 4 it was weak through the flesh, God sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and 5 us, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit. For they that are after the flesh do
 6 mind the things of the flesh; but they that are after the Spirit the things of the Spirit.
 7 For to be carnally minded is death; but to be spiritually minded is life and peace. Because 8 the carnal mind is enmity against God: for it is not subject to the law of God, neither 9 indeed can be. So then they that are in the flesh cannot please God. But ye are not in 10 the flesh, but in the Spirit, if so be that the Spirit of God dwell in you. Now if any man
 11 have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his. And if Christ be in you, the body is dead 12 because of sin; but the Spirit is life because of righteousness. But if the Spirit of him
 13 that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead
 14 shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you. Therefore, brethren, 15 we are debtors, not to the flesh, to live after the flesh. For if ye live after the flesh, 16 ye shall die: but if ye through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live.

TAKE all the guilt of all who believe, past or present, the laver of Jesus' blood avails to cleanse it away. God is satisfied for it. "There is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus." "Thou wilt cast all their sins into the depths of the sea" (Mic. 7 : 19). The justification of the believer is not an imperfect work, so that he may be justified to-day and condemned again to-morrow: it varies not with the variations of his feelings: the work on the faith of which justification rests is a finished work; and, therefore, if once recognized as mine, it must eternally clear me from all possible charge. The fluctuations of faith will cause fluctuations in my enjoyment of Christ's salvation; but the salvation itself is unchangeable. Satan may bring a charge of sin, and succeed in fixing it upon the conscience, through my indistinct apprehension of Christ's sufficiency; but God brings no charge; and therefore the apostle proclaims that triumphant challenge, "It is God that justifieth; who is he that condemneth?" Therefore, with the impossibility of condemnation of the believer, he declares the impossibility of separation from "the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord." Here, then, let the tempted Christian take his stand, and hold fast this vital truth, when a daily sense of his hated evil, yet warring in his members, oppresses him, and arrays God in terrors. Jesus has made an end of sin. When it is brought in penitential acknowledgment to the Cross of Christ, that blood, sprinkled upon the conscience, takes it all away. God remembers it no more. Goode.

1. Omit the clause "who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit." It has probably been interpolated here from verse 4. In sense, at first sight, it fits in well; here, as there, being a distinctive and correct statement of those in Christ to whom there is no condemnation; but on looking further, it clearly appears to be out of place here, since at present the assertion is general, respecting all those who are in Christ, and afterward the distinction is raised, and their true and spiritual character defined. A.

No condemnation. At the blessed moment of justification, the sinner is at once admitted to the favor of God. He is accepted as righteous. The law is as fully satisfied with regard to him as if he had never sinned. The righteousness of Christ is now his righteousness. He can no more come into condemnation than Christ can come into condemnation. He is delivered from the guilt and penalty of all his sins. With regard to sins which he may hereafter commit, he is not indeed pardoned; because it would be incongruous to say that sins are pardoned before they are committed; but God has graciously accepted the righteousness of Christ even in respect to these, and in process of time pardon is dispensed. The effect of this grace is to remove all condemnation and all punishment. That sin which has been visited on the Surety will not be visited on us. The afflictions of this life are not legal pains, but fatherly trials and corrections. And death itself, being deprived of sin which is its sting, and the law which is its strength, is despoiled of all its punitive force. J. W. A.

2. There are three great forms of law, to which our immortal being bears an inevitable and eternal relation. These are, first, the Law of God for our government; second, the Law of Sin and Death in our depraved nature; third, the Law of the Spirit of Life in Christ Jesus. Under the first we are, as immortal beings, eternally responsible; under the second we are, if not redeemed by grace, eternally in bondage; under the third we are not in subjection naturally, but may, by divine grace, if we will, be brought beneath its blessed power, redeemed by it from sin for ever. Hath made me free. The work of grace shall conquer the work of depravity; the law of the Spirit of life in Christ shall set free the soul from the law of sin and death. Nothing else could do it, nothing external to the soul, nothing that did not work within the soul as a principle of life. By this new principle introduced, the man is set at liberty to serve God out of love, no longer bound in slavery to the law of sin and death in an evil nature. This is the great deliverance; this is freedom indeed. G. B. C.

The spiritual and the vitally eternal are united in Scripture phraseology, whenever it has occasion to speak of the "law of the Spirit of life," of that "Spirit" which "is LIFE because of righteousness," of that "spiritual-mindedness" which "is LIFE" as well as "peace." The more you rest upon these profound sayings, the more you will feel that they speak of some mystic intimacy of inward connection, which answers to all that we can conceive of an absolute unity of nature; and that, had we faculties to see these things, we might perceive that a deathless permanence belongs to the spiritual thing inherent in the regenerate mind, if it indeed evidence its genuineness by there abiding and fructifying through the earthly life. W. A. B.

3-5. The gospel is the heir of the law; it inherits what the law had prepared. The law, on its national and ceremonial side, had created a vast and closely woven system of ideas. These were wrought out and exhibited by it in forms according to the flesh—an elect nation, a miraculous history, a special covenant, a worldly sanctuary, a perpetual service, an anointed priesthood, a ceremonial sanctity, a scheme of sacrifice and atonement, a purchased possession, a holy city, a throne of David, a destiny of dominion. Were these ideas to be lost, and the language which expressed them to be dropped, when the gospel came? No! It was the heir of the law. The law had prepared these riches, and now bequeathed them to a successor able to unlock and to diffuse them. The gospel claimed them all, and developed in them a value unknown before. It asserted itself as the proper and predestined continuation of the covenant made of God with the fathers, the real and only fulfillment of all which was typified and prophesied; presenting the same ideas, which had been before embodied in the narrow but distinct limits of carnal forms, in their spiritual, universal, and eternal character. The body of types according to the flesh died with Christ, and with Christ it rose again a body of antitypes according to the Spirit. Those who were after the flesh could not recognize its identity; those who were after the Spirit felt and proclaimed it. T. D. B.

There never was a better law than the moral law, nor was legislation ever attended with circumstances better fitted to secure the perfect love and obedience of men. But in that beautifully simple way in which the Bible relates the thoughts of God as of a man, this is spoken of as an experiment that failed, leading the law-giver to devise another expedient. In the words, For what the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh, we have a striking confession of weakness even in the law of God, on account of strength superior to it in the stubbornness of the human heart. But the law of God still holds its place, only there is a gospel added to make the law efficacious; for the expedient resorted to, for the purpose of reaching the transgressor by the atonement, aims to reestablish the law of God as the rule of duty. N. A.

3. Condemned sin. As the crucifixion was not the whole of the sacrifice offered up by Christ for the sins of the world, but only its closing, perfecting act—as the whole of our Saviour's life was one continual sacrifice for sin—so was it one continual warfare against sin, and victory over sin, and judgment against sin. Hare.—When Jesus came the Sun of Righteousness arose, darkness was scattered, and the light of God's glory, reflected from the face of his Son, darted its rays through heaven, earth, and hell. The Cross became the center of universal attraction, displayed the perfections of Deity in singular and rare combination, and was the source at once of rapture to angels, of terror to the lost, and of hope to men. The death of Christ is without doubt the sublimest event in the annals of time or the records of eternity. And in what a light does it present the malignity of sin! What a commentary upon its intrinsic demerit and turpitude is furnished in the groans, agony, and anguish of the Son of God! In the Cross it is proclaimed, in living characters, to be the abominable thing which God hates. J. H. T.

4. The law of the Ten Commandments is still the rule of life to the believer. From the law, as a covenant, we are eternally delivered, through Christ. We may plead our title to heaven on the ground of our perfect fulfillment of its righteousness, inasmuch as Christ's fulfillment of it is imputed to us who believe. We may plead perfect exemption from its curse; for Christ has been "made a curse for us." As a means, therefore, of meriting life, we have nothing whatever to do with the terms of it. Eternal life is given us in Christ. But we are therefore "delivered from the law," "that the righteousness of the law may be fulfilled in us, who walk, not after the flesh, but after the Spirit." The law of Christ is indeed a law of love; but still, this "new commandment" is the "old commandment which ye had from the beginning." Goode.—The apostle represents the same fact and the same truth which provides for the forgiveness of sin as the source and instrument of deliverance from its dominion. It reconciles to God, and it makes like him. It excites love to duty, and loyalty to law; it renders obedience possible and attractive; it supplies motives, aids, and facilities, grace to help and power to pursue, making work pleasant and service song. T. B.

5. The influence of education may develop in a beautiful symmetry the constitutional excellences. It may repress constitutional excesses and correct constitutional vices. It may cultivate the natural sentiments, refine the tastes, exalt and ennoble the temper and tone of the mind, give dignity and grace to the manners, light and authority to conscience, force and principle to character. It may inspire respect and reverence for the rites and solemnities of religion, form religious habits, and fill the breast with high religious veneration. But there are some things it can not do: it can not shed abroad the love of God in the heart, nor displace our natural enmity to God, nor bring the soul under the power of the Cross, nor diffuse through it the spirit of Jesus, nor teach it to live by faith, nor introduce into it any one of those fruits of the Holy Spirit, without which all virtue is reprobate, all religion a name or a delusion, and all check upon native depravity ineffectual and temporary. T. H. S.

6. For the spiritual being, man, the only real life is in goodness. Only so far as we share in the Father's goodness, are we partakers in his life. The measure of our being, as living souls, is precisely the measure of our excellence. In proportion as our actions are in harmony with divine laws, and our familiar frame of feeling with God's will, we live. Herein is the apostolic saying true, "To be spiritually minded is life." F. D. H.

In verse 7, for "is not subject . . . neither indeed can be," substitute "doth not submit itself . . . neither indeed can it." A.—While we are saved by believing, yet believing is obeying. We accept Christ by renouncing sin, by subjecting our will to his will, by walking in his steps. The carnal mind, or, more exactly, carnal-mindedness—a state of mind in which the affections and aims are fixed upon the things of this world as the chief good—such love of the world is in opposition to the will of God, and can never be reconciled to the law of God. J. P. T.—The object of the gospel is both to pacify the sinner's conscience and to purify his heart, and what mars the one of these objects mars the other also. The best way of casting out an impure affection is to admit a pure one, and by the love of what is good to expel the love of what is evil. Thus, the freer the gospel, the more sanctifying is the gospel; and the more it is received as a doctrine of grace, the more will it be felt as a doctrine according to godliness. This is one of the secrets of the Christian life, that the more a man holds of God as a pensioner, the greater is the payment of service that he renders back again. On the tenure of "Do this and live," a spirit of fearfulness is sure to enter; and the jealousies of a legal bargain chase away all confidence from the intercourse between God and man; and the creature, striving to be square and even with his Creator, is, in fact, pursuing all the while his own selfishness, instead of God's glory; and, with all the conformities which he labors to accomplish, the soul of obedience is not there, the mind is not subject to the law of God, nor indeed, under such an economy, ever can be. T. C.

8. Cannot please God. The impossibility arises from the enmity. This is the real secret of man's inability for that which is good: it arises not from original constitution, defect of created capacity thereto, but is the deadly and unconquerable aversion of a corrupt heart from all that is spiritual and godly. So that this inability for good, real as it is, instead of being an excuse for man's wickedness, is of its very essence. Goode.

9. The Spirit of Christ. By his sacred signature we are appropriated to Christ, and visibly distinguished from the world. For though the secret and pure influences of the Spirit in the soul are only known to the person that feels them, yet his active inspirations are declarative of his presence and power in the outward conversation. Bates.

The Holy Ghost lives in the soul under this dispensation as the Spirit of Christ; we are not to regard him in the mere simplicity of his infinite deity, but as sent forth by the God and man, Christ Jesus, as his; nor is the abiding presence of this holy principle less essentially divine because bestowed and operative under special conditions and a special aspect. On this account he is perpetually described by titles which impress how truly his function is transmissory of perfections that dwell in Christ, and are ours only because his. The Spirit is the "Spirit of the Son," the "Spirit of Jesus Christ." W. A. B.

Christ is eminently present with us by the presence of his Spirit. He is with us invisibly, but as truly as he was in the streets of Jerusalem or on the shores of the lake of Galilee; and the children of the Spirit see him, contemplate him, cling to him, as did the disciples of old. H. P. L.—No rich, nor beautiful, nor accepted life can be lived by us, except Christ be its inspiration. Hope will not reach up to immortality, except it climb by the Cross. Let not your lives be dead shapes of outward decency—the carved and gilded wood of an ark and a tabernacle deserted by the Spirit—but vital branches, filled with leaping and vigorous currents of holy feeling, on the living vine! "For if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his." F. D. H.

10. If Christ is in us, a great part of our original nature with which we were born must be dead. He uses the expressions, dead unto sin, being crucified with Christ, the body must be dead because of sin, and the like, in order to show us that what he means is very great; that he speaks of a great change in us, a change not to be wrought in an instant, nor by any means to be effected without our feeling it, like the various processes of our bodily growth and nourishment, which go on unconsciously within us. T. A.—The Spirit is life. God the Holy Ghost calls us, regenerates us, and sanctifies us in Christ. Christ is his call; Christ is his light; Christ is his justifying sentence. It is in Christ that he creates us as new creatures. He glorifies Christ in our life, and brings us, for the strengthening of our faith, ever deeper into the life with Christ. A. C.

11. The regeneration of the soul in this life, and that of the body in the life to come, are both expressly said to make us "the sons of God," because the one only completes and consummates the other. And hence it is that Paul in the one supernatural gift finds the source of both the blessings. "If the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you." The Spirit which gives the adoption here is the germ of the Spirit which gives the resurrection hereafter; and the resurrection itself is but the adoption made visible in glory. W. A. B.

—The glorious, corporeal life like our Lord's, which is promised for heaven, is great and wonderful, but it is only the issue and last result of the far greater change in the spiritual nature which by faith and love begins here. It is good to be clothed with the immortal vesture of the resurrection, and in that to be like Christ. It is better to be like him in our hearts. His true image is that we should feel as he does, should think as he does, should will as he does; that we should have the same sympathies, the same loves, the same attitude toward God, and the same attitude toward men. It is that his heart and ours should beat in full accord, as with one pulse, and possessing one life. Wherever there is the beginning of that oneness and likeness of spirit, all the rest will come in due time. As the spirit, so the body. The whole nature must be transformed and made like Christ's, and the process will not stop till that be accomplished in all who love him. A. M.

12. Get thou thy soul possessed with the Spirit of the Son, and believe thou art perfectly set free by him from whatsoever thou by sin hast deserved at the hand of revenging justice. This doctrine unlooseth thy hands, takes off thy yoke, and lets thee go upright; this doctrine puts spiritual and heavenly inclinations into thy soul, and the faith of this truth doth show thee that God hath so surprised thee and gone beyond thee with his blessed and everlasting love that thou canst not but reckon thyself his debtor for ever. "Therefore, brethren, we are debtors not to the flesh, to live after the flesh." Bun.

13. Spiritual quiet is promoted by the mortification of sin. Sin is the sole cause of all the discord, perturbation, and misery in the universe. The Holy Spirit begins at regeneration a work which is to end in extirpation of all sin. If you catalogue the causes of your discontent, your restlessness, your excitement, your feverish fretfulness, you will find the names to be such as these: Pride, Hate, Envy, Revenge, Anger, Lust, Covetousness, Fear, Inordinate Affection. Till these caged wild beasts are driven out of the soul, there can be no quietness; sanctification drives them out. Therefore, the more a man advances in piety, the more his inward tranquillity ought to increase. The day grows calmer as the sun draws near its setting. J. W. A.

Section 246.

ROMANS viii. 14-27.

14 FOR as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God. For ye have 15 not received the spirit of bondage again to fear; but ye have received the Spirit of adop-16 tion, whereby we cry, Abba, Father. The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that 17 we are the children of God: and if children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint heirs with 18 Christ; if so be that we suffer with him, that we may be also glorified together. For I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory 19 which shall be revealed in us. For the earnest expectation of the creature waiteth for the 20 manifestation of the sons of God. For the creature was made subject to vanity, not will-21 ingly, but by reason of him who hath subjected the same in hope, because the creature itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the 22 children of God. For we know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain 23 together until now. And not only they, but ourselves also, which have the firstfruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the 24 redemption of our body. For we are saved by hope: but hope that is seen is not hope:
 25 for what a man seeth, why doth he yet hope for? But if we hope for that we see not, then 26 do we with patience wait for it. Likewise the Spirit also helpeth our infirmities: for we know not what we should pray for as we ought: but the Spirit itself maketh intercession 27 for us with groanings which cannot be uttered. And he that searcheth the hearts knoweth what is the mind of the Spirit, because he maketh intercession for the saints according to the will of God.

UNLESS we are wedded to Jesus Christ by the simple act of trust in his mercy and his power, Christ is nothing to us. Ceremonies are nothing, notions are nothing, beliefs are nothing, formal participation in worship is nothing. Christ is everything to him that trusts him. You can begin upon the low step on which you can put your foot, the humble act of faith, and can climb up. If faith, then new birth; if new birth, then sonship; if sonship, then "an heir of God and a joint heir with Christ." But if you have not got your foot upon the lowest round of the ladder, you will never come within sight of the blessed face of Him who stands at the top of it, and who looks down to you at this moment, saying to you, "My child, will thou not cry unto me, 'Abba, Father'?" A. M.

A profound Christian truth may be clothed in the language of a heathen proverb: "A divine spirit is within us who treats us as he is treated by us." We may offer our supplications, with no penetrating sense of the necessity of supernatural aid. There may be no childlike consciousness of infirmity which should lead us to cry out for help. The inspired words, often on our lips, may seldom come from the depth of our hearts: "We know not what we should pray for as we ought." We make prayer itself one of the standard subjects of prayer; yet on what theme do our devotions more frequently degenerate into routine than on this? Have we a sense of indigence when we ask for the indwelling of God in our souls? Have we such a sense of need of it, as we have of the need of air when we are gasping with faintness? It is the law of divine blessing that want comes before wealth, hunger before a feast. We must experience the necessity in order to appreciate the reality. A. P.

14. Led by the Spirit. The term here employed refers to an even, constant, unbroken force, acting not less powerfully on the mind because it acts gently and steadily: the leading of a Spirit who abides always at his gracious work on the heart, and does not come and go. Those who are so led, and are willing, in the yielding up and surrender of their hearts, to be so led by this faithful Spirit of God, are called by the noblest of all titles, and share the most exalted of all honors. "They are the sons of God." F. D. H.—What vaunt of faith more sublime and beautiful than that which is here expressed? and what privilege on earth can be named at the same time as that of being guided by the Spirit of God, and of being in truth his children? Van O.

15. Abba. The Syriac term for father, the insertion of which here beautifully represents the union of Jewish and Gentile believers in their devotions, which were dictated by a filial spirit. D.—Father. The sense of fatherhood, which is in the Christian's heart and becomes his cry, comes from God's Spirit. This passage and that in the Epistle to the Galatians, which is almost parallel, put this truth very forcibly when taken in connection. "Ye have received," says the text before us, "the Spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father." The variation in the Epistle to the Galatians is this: "Because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying (the Spirit crying), Abba, Father." So, in the one text, the cry is regarded as the voice of the believing heart; and in the other the same cry is regarded as the voice of God's Spirit. Every Christian may be sure of this, that, howsoever feeble may be the thought and conviction in his heart of God's fatherhood, he did not work it, he received it only, cherished it, thought of it, watched over it, was careful not to quench it; but in origin it was God's, and it is now and ever the voice of the divine Spirit in the child's heart. A. M.—To call God Father was rare among the saints in Old Testament times; but now, in New Testament times, he is called by no name so often as this. The Lord Jesus first made this name common among the saints, and taught them in their discourses, their prayers, and their writings, so much to use it. By this name we are made to understand that all our mercies are of God, and that we, who are his children by adoption, may take more boldness to pray for great things. I have often found that, when I can say but this word, Father, it doth me more good than when I call him by any other Scripture name. Bun.—A father's love, not content in securing the good of its object, looks for a warm return of the same personal fondness. Is a father satisfied in providing a fortune for his children, and in sending them well abroad, just as a legal guardian might do? A father must have a reciprocity of love or he is not happy. The heart of a father yearns to receive, every day, the undoubted expressions of filial affection. Is then God our Father? The gospel declares it as a fundamental truth; and it shows that this language of sacred affection is to be understood, not in a sense lowered and vague as compared with that which it bears in its ordinary acceptation, but in a sense of incalculably greater intensity and depth. I. T.

18. When the child of God is led to prayer, to the Scriptures, and to Christ—when these become the necessities of his life and soul—then the Holy Spirit bears witness to his adoption. A. C.—The witness of the Spirit is far from being any immediate suggestion or revelation; but that gracious effect of the Spirit of God in the hearts of saints: the disposition and temper of children appearing in a sweet, childlike love of God which casts out fear or the spirit of the slave. The Spirit of God gives the evidence by infusing and shedding abroad the love of God, the spirit of the child in the heart, and our spirit receives and declares this evidence for our rejoicing. Edwards.—The heart with its love, the head with its understanding, the conscience with its quick response to the law of duty, the will with its resolutions—these are all, as sanctified by Him, the witness of his Spirit; and the life with its strenuous obedience, with its struggles against sin and temptation, with its patient persistence in the quiet path of ordinary duty, as well as with the times when it rises into heroic stature of resignation or allegiance, the martyrdom of death and the martyrdom of life, this too is all (in so far as it is pure and right) the work of that same Spirit. The test of the inward conviction is the outward life; and they that have the witness of the Spirit within them have the light of their life lit by the Spirit of God, whereby they may read the handwriting on the heart, and be sure that it is God's and not their own!

17. Given, the sonship—if it is to be worked out into power and beauty, there must be suffering with Christ. But, unless there be sonship, there is no possibility of inheriting God; discipline and suffering will be of no use at all. A. M.—Along with the dark hours, the days of heavy sorrow, comes the Holy Spirit, whom the Saviour promised to send, and lifts up man's downcast eyes from temporal things to eternal; he raises the fearing heart to prayer, and intercedes for it with unutterable groanings; he purifies, comforts, strengthens it; and through the dark clouds of affliction which surround us, he shows the bright form of the Saviour. Thus in our afflictions is Christ glorified in us by the Holy Spirit. The word of life, which we had so often disregarded or misunderstood, comes suddenly before our soul with wonderful clearness; and the sorrowing heart finds therein, what the glad heart did not seek, a sacred, inexhaustible fountain of life, and that rich, heavenly consolation which this world can not give. Thus, in proportion as a man's temporal life grows dark, his eternal life brightens; through painful experience and bitter grief the Spirit leads him to Him who cries, "Come to me." And he who in his hour of need has once received grace for grace from the Lord's fullness, can not turn away from Him again: he can not but cleave more and more closely to him, and receive his divine life into himself. For he has lost what was perishable, and has gained what is imperishable. His lot is the highest that can befall a man: Jesus Christ is glorified in him. Hossbach.

Together. There are seven together in Scripture which show the wondrous identification of the Lord Jesus Christ with believers. They indicate the everlasting purpose of God in our redemption, and his plan in effecting that purpose. It is affirmed of us by the Spirit, in the word, that we are crucified together with Christ; quickened together with Christ; raised together with Christ; seated together with Christ in heavenly places; sufferers together with Christ; heirs together with Christ; and that we are to be glorified together with Christ. These seven together are seven links of a chain which binds us indissolubly to Christ. An.

19-23. The expression "in hope" should be taken from the end of the twentieth verse and placed at the commencement of the twenty-first; the conjunction should be translated "that" instead of "because"; and the twenty-first verse, connected with the nineteenth, allowing for the intervening parenthesis, would thus read: "The earnest expectation of the creature looketh for the revelation of the sons of God, in hope that the creature shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption," i. e., death; to which the apostle afterward opposes "the redemption of the body," or the resurrection into the glorious liberty of the children of God. "For we know that the whole creation," or every rational creature, "groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now. And not only they," i. e., the whole heathen world, "but ourselves," the believers in the gospel of Christ, "who have received the first-fruits of the Spirit, groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, namely, the redemption of our body"—the resurrection, and consequent full revelation, of our dignity and immortal glory as the sons of God. Such is the meaning of this passage, in which the apostle, to give importance to the subject of future glory, represents it as the object of longing desire to the whole rational creation, the various tribes of which are exhibited as lifting up their heads from beneath the bondage of misery and death, and directing an exploring eye and eager hope toward IMMORTALITY, as that alone which could relieve their sorrows and satisfy their desires. They knew not with certainty that there was such a state; their notions were obscure and fluctuating; it was rather a wish than a belief: but it was that which they may be truly said to have groaned after, as what alone could compensate for the sorrows and the brevity of human life. This most striking and beautiful passage has no reference to the brute creation, as groaning under the effects of man's sin, and from which they will be delivered by a resurrection; no reference to any physical change to be produced during the millennium in the material world, now by a bold figure represented as burdened and pained by human guilt; for what has this to do with the context, or with the design of the apostle, which is to comfort believers under the sufferings of this mortal state? but it relates to that glory, honor, and eternal life, which God has promised to them that love him. J. A. J.

19. By the "manifestation of the sons of God" is meant their being arrayed in the glory of their Lord and Saviour, in the presence of the universe. It is not merely the inherent glory of their perfected humanity; nor the glory of their final triumph over death and hell; nor the glory of the bright abode and the blessed fellowship into which they will have been introduced; but with, and above all these glories, the yet more effulgent glory reflected upon them from their glorified Head and Prince, himself "the brightness of the Father's glory." This is to be their "manifestation." H. A. B.

21. The glorious liberty. It should be "the liberty of the glory of the children of God": that liberty which belongs to the state of glorification of God's children. A.—This is the liberty wherewith the Son makes free. Liberty indeed, measured and regulated by the royal law of liberty, and which is perfected only in a perfect conformity thereto. There is a most servile liberty, a being free from righteousness, which under that specious name and show enslaves a man to corruption; and there is a free service, by which a man is still the more free by how much the more he serves and is subject to his superior's will, and by how much the less possible it is he should swerve therefrom. The nearest approaches therefore of the soul to God, its most intimate union with him and entire subjection to him in its glorified state, makes its liberty consummate. Now is its deliverance complete; it is under no restraints, oppressed by no weights; it hath the free exercise of all its powers; hath every faculty and affection at command. How unconceivable a pleasure is this! Howe.

23. We wait for the adoption, that is, the redemption of the body. When we shall see Jesus as he is and be like him, when, delivered from the body of sin and death, as the children of the resurrection changed into the likeness of the transfigured Saviour, we shall know as we are known; and in perfect union and communion with the head and all the saints shall evermore serve him. A. S.

24. Saved by hope. Returning is not the act of a despairing but hoping soul. It is God apprehended as reconcilable that attracts and wins it. This presently draws the hovering soul into a closure and league with him. And thus is the union continued. Howe.—Sincere faith is in reality full of hope. The individual who firmly believes that the blood of the new covenant has been shed for him can not deny to himself the faithfulness of God. And if sometimes the ineffaceable conviction of his own unworthiness, the consideration of that law of the flesh in his members which fights against the law of the spirit, may for a moment obscure his hope, these very things make him recur with redoubled fervor to him who, finding nothing in us to make us acceptable in his sight, has been willing to save us through the faith which he has given. A. V.

25. There are several infirmities that can not be mastered, if hope be not in exercise, especially if the soul be in great and sore trials. There is peevishness and impatience, there is fear and doubting and misconstruing of God's present hand; and all these become masters, if hope be not stirring; nor can any grace besides put a stop to their tumultuous raging in the soul. But hope in God makes them all hush, takes away the occasion of their working, and lays the soul at the foot of God. Bun.—With patience wait. Though we may not be responsible for moods, we are for the way in which we act under them. When all our endeavor fails, we are to fall back on hope, and when hope begins to faint, there is still left to us "quiet waiting." So full of resources is the grace of God, that, as each lower deep of trouble opens, a new power in the Christian life can be created to meet it. "Quiet waiting" is that which, in other parts of the Bible, and especially in the New Testament, is termed patience. It is the part of hope to seek the future; it is the duty of patience to rest calmly in the present, and not to fret—to be satisfied to be where God appoints, and to suffer what God sends. It is fitly placed after hope, because it follows it in the natural course of an educated Christian life. Hope belongs to youth; patience is the lesson of maturity. Ker.

26. For "infirmities," read "infirmity," or "weakness." The meaning is not here, that the Spirit helps our infirmities, generally; but that he helps in this particular point our weakness, our inability to wait with patience for that which we hope for. A.—The promise of the Father—the culminating gift of the Lord Jesus glorified—the highest of all divine manifestations, he by whom the Father and the Son take up their abode in us—is the Spirit of grace and supplication. In our most languid condition, when the soul cleaves to the dust, he maketh intercession for us, and God knoweth the mind of the Spirit in our sighs and groaning. Conscious of our ignorance and of our utter weakness, we change our very helplessness into a source of comfort; for the Spirit of all knowledge, power, and love is within us—our Paraclete. A. S.—We scarcely utter hyperbole in saying that prayer is the divine mind communing with itself, through finite wants, through the woes of helplessness, through the clinging instincts of weakness. On this side of the judgment, no other conception of the presence of God is so profound as that which is realized in our souls every time we offer a genuine prayer. God is then not only with us, but within us. A. P.

If we are perplexed in our prayers, not knowing what to say, ill able to read our own heart's desire truly; yet if we are really wishing for God's help, then that vague and indistinct desire for help has one who purifies it, and presents it before God; and if we feel beset with the perplexity of our condition, and find no word of utterance, yet the Spirit of God speaks for us in our very silence, and intercedes for us acceptably. T. A.—Let prayer rest in the intercession of Jesus and in the sighing of the Holy Spirit. The intercession of Jesus rests in the power of his atoning blood. The intercession of the Holy Spirit has its ground in Christ. A. C.—As it is the office of Christ to intercede for us with God, so it is the office of the Holy Ghost to make those intercessions in us which we put up to God. Caryl.

27. The work of the Spirit is in exciting the heart at times of prayer to break forth in ardent desires to God, whatsoever the words be, whether new or old, yea, possibly without words; and then most powerful when it words it least, but vents in sighs and groans that can not be expressed. Our Lord understands the language of these perfectly, and likes it best; he knows and approves the meaning of his own Spirit; he looks not to the outward appearance, the shell of words, as men do. L.

Section 247.

ROMANS viii. 28-39.

28 AND we know that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them 29 who are the called according to his purpose. For whom he did foreknow, he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the firstborn among 30 many brethren. Moreover whom he did predestinate, them he also called: and whom he 31 called, them he also justified: and whom he justified, them he also glorified. What shall 32 we then say to these things? If God be for us, who can be against us? He that spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him also freely give us 33 all things? Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth.
 34 Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea rather, that is risen again, who is 35 even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us. Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or 36 nakedness, or peril, or sword? As it is written, For thy sake we are killed all the day 37 long; we are accounted as sheep for the slaughter. Nay, in all these things we are more

38 than conquerors through him that loved us. For I am persuaded, that neither death, nor 39 life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord.

In the experience of the apostle Paul, every child of God will find a description of his own, and also abundant encouragement, guidance, and consolation. Here is a man in Christ Jesus. There is now no condemnation to him. Sin has been judged, condemned, and put away. The Spirit of Christ dwells in him. He is not in the flesh, but the flesh is still in him. He has to mortify the deeds of the body; it is a painful and daily struggle. Besides, he is in manifold afflictions. He is living in a world of suffering. The very creation even groans by reason of bondage. He also groans within himself, waiting for the redemption of the body.

This justified one, inhabited by the Spirit, is thus saved only in hope. He has still the conflict with sin amid the afflictions of this time, and he has to possess his soul in patience. Thus he draws nigh to God. But there he feels his weakness. His infirmities overwhelm him. He knows not what to pray for as he ought. Full of want, he is silent. But the Spirit of God helps him. He creates within him deep and believing longings after the eternal blessings, too deep for utterance, but not too great for the Father's response. And now he has reached the highest point. He sees God for us. God loved us from all eternity, and called us according to his promise. All things must work together for good. Beholding this God as he gave up his own Son, he triumphantly asks, "Shall he not with him freely give us all things?" Afflictions and sufferings abound; but in overcoming them we are more than conquerors: not exhausted but invigorated after victory, and perfect in our peace. Nothing shall separate us from the love of God in Christ Jesus! Love of God in Christ Jesus! It continues sounding in our hearts as when silver bells have ceased ringing. Love of God in Christ Jesus! A. S.

28-31. Whom God "forechose," them he predestinated to be conformed to Christ, and in order to the accomplishment of that purpose, he "calls" them. We have the full account of "the called according to his purpose," in the twenty-eighth verse. And now the apostle proceeds to show how that image of Christ in them is brought about. "Whom he calls, them he also justifies." These sins that so burden their souls are taken away by the blood of the Lamb having atoned for, and thereby "blotted them out." And the obedience of the "Lord our righteousness" becomes the sinner's obedience, so soon as hearing the call he accepts it, and by faith is in "Christ Jesus," represented both in His act of obedience and of atonement. And meantime the Holy Spirit, who has made the call effectual, and imparted the new life to the dead soul whereby it puts forth this living act of faith, carries on his work of conforming it more and more to the image of Christ, until with death the body of sin drops off and the spirit becomes like Jesus and sees him as he is—thus "Whom he justifies he also glorifies." Now we can see the power and beauty of the apostle's logic—sorrows and affliction can not do other than good to them that are called under such a purpose of grace. For since God hath such an end in view for them, all things that occur, however afflictive now, must work together to that great end—the glory which shall follow. And we are prepared to accept his triumphant conclusion, "If God be for us, who can be against us?" Then spend not your energies in trying to penetrate the dark cloud that hovers around the lofty summit of this theology, and shrouds from mental view the secret purposes of God. Behold the golden link of the pendent chain that gleams here along the level of time—this call of the gospel. Seize hold of that, here and now, that you may be drawn up—justified—to be eternally glorified! S. R.

28: We know. It is not merely a devout wish and hope, but a certain conviction. God comforts with realities. The Spirit reveals things freely given to us of God, and then the soul responds, I believe; or, I know; for faith substantiates the unseen. Faith is the most absolute and certain knowledge. Join, oh sorrowful and doubting believers who love God, the great company of your fellow-sufferers, and say, We know! Hear the apostle Paul. Who ever suffered more? and yet there is no hesitation in his voice. A. S.—Work together. The bosom of Providence is the great moral crucible in which things work, in which they work together. They assimilate, repel, interpenetrate, change each other; and then leave, as moral result, one grand influence in the main for each character, for each man. The innumerable things that mingle in that crucible, if taken separately, would be seen working to separate and diverse results; as, indeed, they still do in a measure, within the sphere of the all-commanding influence. But the one master influence now rules the whole process, and so combines the specific elements as to perpetuate and increase its own way.

"All things work together," not in an aimless and capricious manner, for this end and for that, now in one way and now in another, as though a stream should one day flow seaward, and the next back toward its fountain among the hills, but in one volume, along one channel, in one direction, toward one end. A. R.—Things work together for good, it is said; and work implies time, and a lengthened process, trial and waiting, till, like the harvest from the ground, or the cloth from the loom, the long operation is perfected. To judge hastily of God's dealings, ere his purposes are wrought out, would be like threshing a half-grown wheat-field, and being disappointed at finding no grain. Things now may seem very much against us; disaster may have met all our plans, and they may lie in the dust, though we made them with prayer for divine guidance. But have we seen the end? Wait for God, and satisfying views will break upon our eyes in the better world, when they are opened to see the reason of God's dealings with us, and how he has made all work together for our good. Lewis.

If we love God, this is the position—surely, although we are not accustomed to apply grand epithets to such things, yet, surely, in sober earnestness, a splendid position—that "all things work together for our good." If we love him, not in any strained or passionate manner, but with simple childlike love, trusting in his kindly providence, looking up in his face, keeping his commandments, talking with him in our busy thoughts and in our daily prayers, filling life with his presence as is the habit of love with its objects, then—all will be well. Will be? All is well. Those working "things," the strength and pressure of which we never could resist if we met them simply in our own strength, the mystery of which we never could fathom, the darkness of which is sometimes terrible—let them work together and enter into all possible combinations, and expend their last energies, they can produce nothing but good to us. A. R.—To a believing soul there is something wonderfully sweet in viewing all his trials, troubles, afflictions, temptations, desertions, spiritual conflicts, ups and downs of every kind, as ordered of God for his good; decreed to come upon him just at such a time and place as his heavenly Father's wisdom sees fit and meet! to remain with him just so long, and not a single moment longer than till they shall have answered some salutary purpose for his soul's good; that, however sore and grievous these things may be to flesh and blood, however thwarting to his own will and wishes, yea, however contrary to what he would judge to be for his spiritual welfare, yet he who "ordereth all things after the counsel of his own will" causeth them to work together for his good; and that they are all the effects and emanations of infinite wisdom, infinite love, and infinite power, united to accomplish his salvation in the way that shall be best for him, and most for his heavenly Father's glory. Hill.

The called. No one that knows anything aright of the dreadfully alienated state of our nature can for a moment believe that a condition of the soul in which the love of God should prevail can be produced, created, by any less cause than the sovereign operation of the divine Spirit; in other words, by an effectual "calling." This, then, is the sacred train and process; the ancient, unalterable intention or "purpose," fulfilled at length in "the calling according to that purpose," and this "calling" being an inspiration of "the love of God" into the renewed soul. And this places the soul in a new system of relations with the world and its events, and that the most advantageous one that is possible. J. F.

29, 30. Majestic affirmations of assurance, assurance answering to assurance, rising and gathering power as it rolls on, each clause coming with the certainty of a decree, solemn at once and jubilant. F. D. H.—The great perfected mystery of sanctification in Christ itself steps back into the mystery of regeneration and of justification by faith, and that again into the mystery of redemption, and that into the unfathomable depths of the mystery of God's love. These steps are traced in the forward direct order by Paul's logic thus: foreknowledge, predestination unto conformity to the image of God's dear Son, calling, justification, glorification. John in the Apocalypse sets us down at the last step, glorification, without fault before the throne of God. G. B. C.

He did foreknow. God's foreknowledge is not for me, but for himself. While I feel that grace which bringeth salvation and the sanctification of the Spirit in me, I am sealed for heaven; and where is the man who is forbidden to apply for the same blessing? They are quite mistaken who imagine themselves excluded by the divine prescience. I can only know whether I am the choice of God by God's being my choice, and by having the mark of my election in my regeneration, and the proof of my regeneration in the uprightness of my conduct. I do not desire to search into the divine decrees, but I want to see that the Saviour's image is engraven on the tablet of my renewed mind in characters indelible as eternity. R. Hill.—Effectual calling is inseparably tied to this eternal foreknowledge or election on the one side, and salvation on the other. These two links of the chain are up in heaven in God's own hand; but this middle one is let down to earth into the hearts of his children, and they, laying hold on it, have sure hold on the other two, for no power can sever them; if, therefore, they can read the characters of God's image in their own souls, those are the counterpart of the golden characters of his love, in which their names are written in the book of life. Their believing writes their names under the promises of the revealed book of life, the Scriptures, and so ascertains them that the same names are in the secret book of life that God hath by himself from eternity. So, finding the stream of grace in their hearts, though they see not the fountain whence it flows, nor the ocean into which it returns, yet they know that it hath its source, and shall return to that ocean which ariseth from their eternal election, and shall empty itself into that eternity of happiness and salvation. Hence much joy ariseth to the believer; this tie is indissoluble, as the agents are, the Father, the Son, and the Spirit. So are election, and vocation, and sanctification, and justification, and glory. Therefore in all conditions believers may, from the sense of the working of the Spirit in them, look back to that election and forward to that salvation. L.

31. The first eight chapters of Romans embrace Paul's great argument of the epic of redemption. It traces human ruin and human salvation until, at 8 : 30, the whole scheme, crowned with glorification, stands like a grand structure, and the apostle commences a pæan with, What shall we say to these things? Wheedon.—If God be for us. Our divine ally, the King of kings, is our intercessor; the omniscient Spirit is our teacher; and we are invited to counsel with Divine wisdom, and to stay ourselves on the arm of Creative power. Yet how do we narrow down the magnificence of the divine promises, and compress the hopes, large and grand, offered by the gospel, into some petty and pitiful request, that as we imagine bespeaks Christian humility, but in truth displays unbelief. What! when God is for us, is it not most guilty to hesitate and linger in minor and facile enterprises? The greatness of the God we serve demands on our part a large and manly, a far-sighted and far-reaching faith. W. R. W.

32. The boundless extent of his understanding, which comprehended the full dimensions of sin and of wrath, was the sole cause of Christ's deep and unparalleled distress. It was not the shame nor the torment of the Cross that afflicted him; but his soul, if I may be allowed the expression, was crucified more than his body; his heart had sharper nails to pierce it than his hands or his feet; in his body he felt the rage and cruelty of his murderers, but in his soul he felt sufferings of a more exquisite nature. Then he bore the griefs and carried the sorrows of all his people; then he felt not the sins only, but the wounds also, of every broken heart; the torments of his martyrs, the reproaches of his saints, the poverty, distresses, and persecutions, which any, which all of them, have felt, or shall feel, till the last trumpet shall sound, and he shall come again in his glory. Thus God spared not his own Son; to these inconceivable sufferings was the Lord of life delivered. R. W.—As we are the objects of that love which God hath commended to us in his Son, it follows that no bounds can be set to our happiness—that there is no treasure too rich in the mines of the blessed God, no duration too long in eternity, no communion with the Creator too close, too intimate, too tender, which we have not a right to expect; according to that comfortable, that ecstatic maxim of the apostle: "He who spared not his own Son, but freely delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him also freely give us all things?" Saurin.

33. When "the everlasting covenant" was planned between the three persons in the glorious and coequal Trinity, it was "ordered in all things, and sure"; all the spiritual seed were then chosen in Christ, their head; and grace was given them in him as members of his mystical body. All the sins that ever they should commit, with every aggravation with which they should be swelled, were taken into the account: payment was then virtually made; and it was actually made when Jesus hung on the accursed tree; and all the powers of earth and hell combined can never charge one sin upon the soul for whom it was so paid and accepted. For "who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect?" Hill.—It is Paul's challenge to the universe. Nay, rather, it is the Holy Spirit's challenge. It is unanswerable even now; for from the first moment that we believed, we were entitled to take it up. It is a challenge which God himself puts into our lips, and he will acknowledge it. In our believing we set our amen to his testimony; and in his giving us this challenge, he is setting his amen to our faith. Nay, not only will he own it, but he will take it up out of our lips, and himself proclaim it through the universe, "Who shall lay anything to the charge of my elect?" Bonar.

34. It is Christ that died for us, to take away our sins, and is risen again for us, to clothe us in his righteousness, and sitteth at the right hand of God ever making intercession for us, that we may be supported under every trial and danger, strengthened against every temptation, delivered from the sin of unbelief and all other sins, girt with the righteousness of faith and crowned with all the graces which spring from faith, and at length may be received into the presence of the Father, into which our elder brother has entered before us. Hare.—It is a point which should move us to great joy and holy pride, that we are so honored above all creatures, yea, above the angels, that we can now truthfully say with exultation: My flesh and blood sitteth at the right hand of God, reigning with power over all, and having all in his hand. This honor hath no creature, nor any angel, but my flesh and blood. Luther.—Thou shalt find life in his death, and that life further ascertained to thee in his rising again. There is so full and clear a title to life in these two, that thou canst challenge all adversaries upon this very ground, as unconquerable while thou standest on it. In point of justifying before God, there can be no answer but this: What have any to say to thee? thy debt is paid by Him that undertook it. Answer all accusations with this, Christ is risen.

35. Is this he that so lately cried out, Oh, wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me? that now triumphs, Oh, happy man! who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Yes, it is the same. Pained then with the thoughts of that miserable conjunction with a body of death, and so crying out, Who will deliver? Now he hath found a deliverer to do that for him, to whom he is for ever united. So vast a difference is there betwixt a Christian taken in himself and in Christ. L.—The question may be termed the strongest possible form of denial, and by it must be understood, not our love to Christ, but his to us. The foundation of such conviction can not rest on the attachment and fidelity of his followers. But a firm basis of tranquillity is offered in the love of Christ himself, which in its nature is a free, unconstrained, eternal affection. From this love nothing can separate us, because it is all-powerful, all-embracing, finally all-conquering. That which would separate from him, namely, the power of the world and of sin, can not permanently keep its ground in the heart and life of the Christian, in whom, indeed, the old man yet lives, but as a dying creature. Can words be found to express adequately the consolation which such thoughts impart? Van O.

36. That which makes a man die with true courage and step with holy boldness into the grave is believingly to remember that Jesus Christ died and lay in the grave, not only before us, but for us, and that he hath worsted and conquered that king of terrors upon his own ground, the grave. Caryl.

37. Be humble and depend on the strength of Christ; seek to be furnished with much distrust of thyself and much trust in him, with much denial of thyself and much love to him; and this preparing and training of the heart will prove useful when brought to a real conflict. In all, both beforehand and in time of the trial, make thy Lord Jesus all thy strength; that is our only way in all to be conquerors, to be more than conquerors, through him that loved us.

38, 39. Remember this for your comfort, that as you are brought unto God by Jesus Christ, so you are kept in that union by him. It is a firmer knot than the first was; there is no power of hell can dissolve it. He suffered once to bring us once unto God, never to depart again; as he suffered once for all, so we are brought once for all. We may be sensibly nearer at one time than another, yet we can never be separate nor cut off, being once knit by Christ as the bond of our union. Neither principalities nor powers, etc., shall be able to separate us from the love of God, because it holds in Christ Jesus our Lord. L.—It is plainly the design of the whole section to show that the afflictions of the present time are not inconsistent with the justified state of Christians, or with their being the objects of the peculiar affection of God and of Christ. And there is no trace of the supposed transition from God's love to us to our love to God. The love of God in Christ Jesus admits fairly no other meaning than the love of God manifested to us through the mediation of Christ. J. B.

AND thus the mighty argument is brought to an end. The remainder of the Epistle is spent in the determination of various points of interest as related to the position of Jew and Gentile, in God's dealings, and in the Church of the time. Meanwhile, however, the great argument is supplemented by the views of God's wisdom and love, and does not reach its final conclusion till chapter 12, where the apostle gathers up all in general exhortations, grounded on this review of God's mercies to Jew and Gentile. A.

Paul has shown (chs. 6, 7) that believers are bound up with Christ in his death, burial, and resurrection; and that this union, delivering them alike from legal terror and from legal hope, induces new and loving obedience. They become dead to the law by the body of Christ, that in union or marriage to him as their risen Lord and life they may live and bear fruit unto God. So the apostle establishes that sanctification as well as justification is by the grace of God only, not through bondage to the law, but through union to Christ in liberty. Then, in the sublime and animated strain of the eighth chapter, he expatiates on the safety of those who are in Christ, the indwelling and witness of the Spirit of adoption, the hope of glorious resurrection, the security of salvation in the purpose and calling of God, the reality of his act of justification, and the immutability of his love in Jesus Christ our Lord. So ends the first part of the Epistle. Its key-words are those formed from diki—right, righteousness, righteous judgment, just, justify, justification. Apprehending these terms, we grasp the cardinal truth of salvation which the apostle inculcates, viz., that while the law of God condemns, God freely justifies us through faith in Christ the propitiator for our sins, and in union with him as our crucified and buried but now risen Saviour. D. F.

Section 248.

ROMANS ix. 1-29.

1 I SAY the truth in Christ, I lie not, my conscience also bearing me witness in the Holy
 2 Ghost, that I have great heaviness and continual sorrow in my heart. For I could wish 3 that myself were accursed from Christ for my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh :
 4 who are Israelites ; to whom pertaineth the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and 5 the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises ; whose are the fathers, and 6 of whom as concerning the flesh Christ came, who is over all, God blessed for ever. Amen.
 7 Not as though the word of God hath taken none effect. For they are not all Israel,
 8 which are of Israel : neither, because they are the seed of Abraham, are they all children :
 9 but, In Isaac shall thy seed be called. That is, They which are the children of the flesh, 10 these are not the children of God : but the children of the promise are counted for the 11 seed. For this is the word of promise, At this time will I come, and Sarah shall have a son.
 12 And not only this ; but when Rebecca also had conceived by one, even by our father Isaac ;
 13 (for the children being not yet born, neither having done any good or evil, that the purpose 14 of God according to election might stand, not of works, but of him that calleth ;) it was 15 said unto her, The elder shall serve the younger. As it is written, Jacob have I loved, but 16 Esau have I hated. What shall we say then ? Is there unrighteousness with God ? God 17 forbid. For he saith to Moses, I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy, and I will 18 have compassion on whom I will have compassion. So then it is not of him that willeth, 19 nor of him that runneth, but of God that sheweth mercy. For the Scripture saith unto 20 Pharaoh, Even for this same purpose have I raised thee up, that I might shew my power in 21 thee, and that my name might be declared throughout all the earth. Therefore hath he 22 mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth. Thou wilt say then 23 unto me, Why doth he yet find fault ? For who hath resisted his will ? Nay but, O man, 24 who art thou that repliest against God ? Shall the thing formed say to him that formed it, 25 Why hast thou made me thus ? Hath not the potter power over the clay, of the same lump 26 to make one vessel unto honour, and another unto dishonour ?
 27 What if God, willing to shew his wrath, and to make his power known, endured with much 28 longsuffering the vessels of wrath fitted to destruction : and that he might make known the 29 riches of his glory on the vessels of mercy, which he had afore prepared unto glory, even 30 us, whom he hath called, not of the Jews only, but also of the Gentiles ? As he saith also 31 in Osee, I will call them my people, which were not my people ; and her beloved, which was 32 not beloved. And it shall come to pass, that in the place where it was said unto them, Ye are 33 not my people ; there shall they be called the children of the living God. Esaias also crieth
 34 concerning Israel, Though the number of the children of Israel be as the sand of the sea, a 35 remnant shall be saved : for he will finish the work, and cut it short in righteousness :
 36 because a short work will the Lord make upon the earth. And as Esaias said before, Ex-37 cept the Lord of Sabaoth had left us a seed, we had been as Sodoma, and been made like 38 unto Gomorrhah.

WHEN once we understand that the Jews are the types of mankind ; when each one of us shall consider what has been done to the Jewish people as if it had been done to himself ; when we shall be able to see ourselves in the person of Israel, delivered from Egypt with a strong hand, crossing the Red Sea, miraculously fed in the desert, introduced by force of arm into Canaan, alternately rebellious and penitent, humbled and elevated, at war with the inflexibility of a perfect law and at the same time the object of ineffable solicitude, it will no longer be possible for us to believe that this people has existed in vain, or that we owe nothing to this people, or that we could have dispensed with it. And then collecting in our mind all these truths at once, each saying to himself : The history of this people is my history, the history of this people is the history of God ; this people carried in its bosom, as a mother does, that other chosen and blessed people whom Jesus Christ on coming into the world found ready to receive him ; the Jewish people foretold the great truths which prepare for receiving gospel truth ; the Jewish people was the first and necessary propagation of the gospel ; the Jewish people at the commencement of Christianity could alone bear witness to Jesus Christ ; the Jewish people choosing or rejecting him, is the immortal witness of the Saviour ; a Christian after having considered all these things will have no repugnance to repeat, Salvation, my own salvation, is of the Jews ! A. V.

1-3. In the close of the eighth chapter of Romans theology reaches its culmination. That is a height where all that the mind can know of God and his ways is seen in the longest perspective and most celestial clearness. But there is flowing in the heart of the apostle a current of sympathy with men, which overbears in another moment all the tide of rapturous anticipation which the view of God's purposes had kindled. "I have great heaviness and continual sorrow in my heart—for my brethren." Certainly that is the spirit which all who have the responsibilities of public service for Christ should seek. It is said that Augustine had for his symbol a burning heart. If to a burning there could be appropriately added a suggestion of a bleeding heart, we should have the comprehensive Christian symbol. A measure of the seraphic glow of the eighth chapter of Romans is permitted to us, if our minds are lifted to that; but should not our cry be, that we may never be without the concern, without something of the pang of love for our brother-men, which we see in the ninth chapter? Karr.

3. "I could have wished." J. B. L.—I could wish, if such a thing were possible, to be separated from Christ and bear the curse, in order thereby to rescue my nation. That was out of the question, for only Christ could undertake to bear penal sufferings in the room of others. It displays, however, the magnitude of his love. (Ex. 32 : 32, Moses felt the same.) He would willingly have endured anything, however terrible, in order to save them. Barth.—Paul saw a cloud filled with wrath—a black cloud of vindictory justice affecting the eternal interests of his countrymen—ready to burst upon their heads; he saw many of them sealed up under the terrible judgment of judicial blindness, and this it was which racked his heart with agony, and drew forth his thrilling expressions of sympathy and grief. He envied not the Gentiles; on the contrary, he makes their calling and conversion matters of solemn doxology and thanksgiving to God; but he did lament, deeply and sorely lament, that so many of his countrymen were cut off from the hopes of eternal life. J. H. T.

4, 5. Judaism is the parent of Christianity. The new system sprang up on the soil of the old, and could spring up nowhere else. There were "the oracles of God"; there were the Messianic promises, and the aspirations kindled by them, in a form that made it possible for the Messiah to arise, with a full consciousness of his calling, and to be recognized by others. The peculiarity lies in the organic relation of the parts of the earlier Revelation to each other, and the collective relation of the whole of them to the gospel. Hence, the earliest adherents of the Christian faith by whom it was first propagated in the world, its authoritative expounders for all time, were of Jewish extraction. The privilege conferred on the Jews, in the special training to which they were subjected, might, if abused, place them at a disadvantage as to receiving the good news, even in comparison with the nations which had been suffered "to walk in their own ways." "It might be," says Dr. Arnold, "that they were tempted by their very distinctness to despise other nations; still they did God's work—still they preserved unharmed the seed of eternal life, and were the ministers of blessing to all other nations, even though themselves failed to enjoy it." G. P. F. —This people, to whom were intrusted the oracles of God, carries in its mind, solemnizes in its rites, reflects in its manners, the elementary ideas on which the gospel is founded; alone among the nations it believes, seriously and effectually believes, that God is, and that he is the rewarder of them that seek him. These truths, which are the patrimony of this people, it has in its different dispersions carried with it over the world. It has sown them in the land of the heathen. Despised as it was, it has succeeded in accustoming the nations to the idea, the unheard-of idea, of one living and holy God. This was essentially to prepare them for Jesus Christ. And when Christianity, after having collected in Judea all that belonged to it, makes ready to conquer Europe, beginning with the ancient kingdom of that Alexander who conquered Asia, it finds over the whole Roman world advanced posts, citadels, intrenched camps in those portions of Israel, in those Jewish colonies which Divine Providence had scattered up and down upon the earth, and which uniformly became the first Christian Churches. A. V.

5. Who is over all, God blessed for ever. What is that subtle approach of doctrine injurious to Christ which these words of Paul do not bar out? He called him Christ, to show that he had really become man; he called him "of the Jews after the flesh," to show that his existence does not merely date from his incarnation; he called him "who is" that he might proclaim as in thunder his existence without a beginning; he called him "over all," to proclaim him the Master of creation; he called him God, that we might not be deceived by looking to his sufferings and his outward form, and deny his imperishable nature; he called him "blessed," that we might adore him as the Almighty, and not injuriously regard him as a fellow-servant; he called him "unto the ages," that he might show that he who formed them by a word is in them endlessly proclaimed as God. Proclus.

7, 8. The Old Testament is the first chapter of the history of man and the history of God. The experience of the Jews is our experience. It is for us that we see this people alternately gathered together and forsaken, scourged and blest. Not that they are not loved for themselves, and for the fathers' sakes, as Paul says; but in the marvelous guidance of this people God was preparing an immortal lesson for the whole human race. Not only the doctrine preached to the Jewish people, but more especially their history constitutes the treasure of all ages and nations; because as history, it not only teaches, it establishes what God is and what man is, to what extent God's authority is absolute and his law sacred; and, in fine, it establishes the active, determinate, and paternal manner in which God constantly interposes in human affairs. A. V.

13-17. As all that we are comes from Him, so we belong to him without exception or reserve. The senses of our bodies, the powers of our souls, the successive ages of life, thought, feeling, resolve, all are His. He is absolute master of our health, of our fortune, of our very life, and against him we have neither plea nor remedy. Nay, we are bound by the terms of existence to accept with submission all of his appointments. Paul's illustration of the cases of Pharaoh and Esau, as viewed apart from their responsibility, is strictly in point. God's claims, which begin in time, continue in eternity; the grave does not touch them. Escape him we can not. We must live under a dispensation of his love or a dispensation of his justice. We can nowhere be independent of him. We may now and here choose between a free and joyous service and a punishment which is as certain and as enduring as the being which he has given us. H. P. L.

15. The Israelites, immediately after the giving of the law, had committed idolatry or exposed themselves to punishment. Moses besought their forgiveness. In answer to his prayer, the words quoted here were used. The whole nation deserved punishment. God was determined to inflict it on some and to show mercy to others; and his declaration is, that the reason why any are pardoned, and why these are pardoned, was to be found in his sovereign grace. There was no unrighteousness here. God gave to some what none deserved, and he inflicted on none anything but what all had deserved, and he did this according to the counsel of his own will. J. B.—If God is a sovereign, he is not an arbitrary despot; if he has his purposes in respect to all things—and unquestionably he has—they are formed in view of all-sufficient reasons every way worthy of himself, as a God infinite in his wisdom and his love. He may bless a man who does not deserve his blessing, but he can not punish a man who does not deserve punishment. The sovereign grace of God! What being in the universe does it injure, or what obstacles can it interpose between any man and eternal life? E. M.

16. Many ask questions about election and other doctrines, which do not yet come within their horizon, and therefore can not be explained to them (to a certain extent, true of us all). The ninth chapter of Paul's Epistle to the Romans, as Luther said, is the ninth. Learn first the eight chapters which precede it. A. S.—The Bible teaches that man is a free agent, under personal responsibility; that salvation is provided for all, and freely offered to all; that God desires that all men should repent and be saved; that he uses his word, his providence, and his Spirit to bring them to repentance; that he continues his calls to men who resist his grace, though, as in the case of Pharaoh, his very long-suffering may but harden the sinner's impenitence. It is no positive act of God that hardens him, no divine decree that hinders his salvation, but the sinner's own refusal to submit his will in faith to the righteousness of God. In this respect, the stubborn impenitence of Pharaoh, alike unto divine mercies and judgments, is but the type of the heart of man. Again and again we are told that Pharaoh hardened his own heart. J. P. T.—Conversion and salvation must, in the very nature of the things, be wrought and effected either by ourselves alone, or by ourselves and God together, or solely by God himself. The last hypothesis is built on the strongest evidence of reason, Scripture, and experience. It most effectually hides pride from man, and sets the crown of undivided praise upon the head—or, rather, casts it at the feet—of that glorious Triune God "who worketh all in all." But this is a crown which no sinners ever yet cast before the throne of God who were not first led into the transporting views of his gracious decree to save freely, and of his own will, the people of his eternal love. Zanchius.

The great question for me, as one for whom Christ died and to whom the offer of eternal life is made, a being responsible to God and to my own soul for every decision I form and every choice I make in reference to my everlasting interests, is, Am I willing to embrace the offer of eternal life which is placed before me? If I am not, it is not God's purpose, but my own election in opposition to the will and commandment of God, which destroys me body and soul for ever. This is the thought to be distinctly apprehended, and which should be thrown with all its fearful and crushing weight upon the conscience of every man who has not accepted of Jesus Christ. E. M.—In the 16th verse, the showing of his mercy signifies the preventing grace of God in conversion; for in the 18th verse it is said, God shows mercy "to whom he will, and whom he will he hardens." Where it is evident that showing mercy is opposed not to condemning but to hardening; and consequently the intent of the words is this, that divine grace overcomes the rebellious will, softens the stiff and stubborn heart, and makes it pliant to obedience. This flows from his pure good will and pleasure, without the least motive from the inclinations or endeavors of sinful men. But the other effects of God's mercy require conditions in the subjects that receive them; for he pardons only penitent believers, and glorifies none but persevering saints. Bates.

19-24. The force of the objection (v. 19) seems to be: "Since God can refuse mercy and inflict punishment on whom he chooses to do so, why does he not will to have mercy on all, so as to make them obedient, and thus put finding of fault out of the case? None can resist his will." The objection is answered in two ways: first, by showing the absurdity and wickedness of man's finding fault with what God does or says (vs. 20, 21), and then by showing that the dispensations objected to were perfectly consistent with divine justice and benignity (vs. 22-24). J. B.—The objection is founded on ignorance or misapprehension of the relation between God and his sinful creatures: supposing that he is under obligation to extend his grace to all, whereas he is under obligation to none. It is to be borne in mind that Paul does not here speak of God's right over his creatures as creatures, but as sinful creatures; as he himself clearly intimates in the next verses. It is the cavil of a sinful creature against his Creator that he is answering, and he does so by showing that God is under no obligation to give his grace to any, but is as sovereign as in fashioning the clay.

22. His wrath and his power. The two objects which Paul here specifies as designed to be answered by the punishment of the wicked are the manifestation of the wrath of God and the exhibition of his power. The word wrath is used here, as in chapter 1 : 18, for the divine displeasure against sin, the calm and holy disapprobation of evil, joined with the determination to punish those who commit it. Though the inherent ill desert of sin must ever be regarded as the primary ground of the infliction of punishment—a ground which would remain in full force were no beneficial results anticipated from the misery of the wicked—yet God has so ordered his government that the evils which sinners incur shall result in the manifestation of his character, and the consequent promotion of the holiness and happiness of his intelligent creatures throughout eternity. C. H.

All the godly have this to consider: that they were strangers and enemies to God; and let each of them think, Whence was it that I, a lump of the same polluted clay with those that perish, should be taken and purified and molded by the Lord's own hand for a vessel of glory? Nothing but free grace makes the difference; and where can there be love and praises and service found to answer this? All is to be ascribed to the mercy, gifts, and calling of Christ. L.

25-29. The marked difference between the language used in reference to those whom God treats kindly and those whom he treats severely deserves notice. With regard to the fitting of the vessels of wrath for destruction: they are fitted—how and by whom it is not said, but God did not fit them for the destruction to which he doomed them as fitted for it. In the other case it is divine agency altogether, in fitting them for glory, and bestowing it on them. God dealt with unbelieving Jews as he did with Pharaoh, whom they resembled in their obstinacy. He bore with them long; he offered them mercy, which they contemptuously rejected. When they had fitted themselves for destruction, they were destroyed. On the other hand, God bestows salvation on a portion of men called from the great body of Jews and Gentiles, and fitted by his grace for the enjoyment of it, by being made in faith thankfully to accept it. In withholding saving blessings from certain of the Jews, he does them no wrong; and in inflicting on them severe judgments, he only at last inflicts punishment which had long been incurred. J. B.

ROMANS ix. 30-33 ; x. 1-13.

30 WHAT shall we say then? That the Gentiles, which followed not after righteousness, 31 have attained to righteousness, even the righteousness which is of faith. But Israel, which followed after the law of righteousness, hath not attained to the law of righteousness.
32 Wherefore? Because they sought it not by faith, but as it were by the works of the 33 law. For they stumbled at that stumblingstone; as it is written, Behold, I lay in Sion a stumblingstone and rock of offence: and whosoever believeth on him shall not be ashamed.

1 Brethren, my heart's desire and prayer to God for Israel is, that they might be saved.
 2 For I bear them record that they have a zeal of God, but not according to knowledge.
 3 For they being ignorant of God's righteousness, and going about to establish their own
 4 righteousness, have not submitted themselves unto the righteousness of God. For Christ
 5 is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth. For Moses describeth the righteousness which is of the law, That the man which doeth those things shall live by 6 them. But the righteousness which is of faith speaketh on this wise, Say not in thine heart, Who shall ascend into heaven? (that is, to bring Christ down from above :)
 7 or, Who shall descend into the deep? (that is, to bring up Christ again from the dead.)
 8 But what saith it? The word is nigh thee, even in thy mouth, and in thy heart: that is,
 9 the word of faith, which we preach; that if thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be 10 saved. For with the heart man believeth unto righteousness; and with the mouth confes-11 sion is made unto salvation. For the scripture saith, Whosoever believeth on him shall 12 not be ashamed. For there is no difference between the Jew and the Greek: for the same 13 Lord over all is rich unto all that call upon him. For whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved.

CHRIST is something and does something to every one of us. He is either the rock on which I build, poor, weak, sinful creature as I am, getting security and sanctity and strength from him, I being a living stone, built upon "the living stone," and partaking of the vitality of the foundation; or else he is the other thing, "a stone of stumbling and a rock of offense to them which stumble at the word." So the gospel of Christ exercises a permanent effect upon us. It is presented to each of us here individually, in the definite form of an actual offer of salvation for each, and of an actual demand of trust from each. The words pass into our souls, and thenceforward it can never be the same as if they had not been there. The gospel once heard is henceforward a perpetual element in the whole condition, character, and destiny of the hearer. A. M.

Christ is present to his followers as he is not and can not be to the world; present as an all-permeating Spirit; present as the all-quickening Life; consciously, socially present; so that no explorations of science or debates of reason are wanted to find him, no going over the sea to bring him back, or up into heaven to bring him down; because he is already present, always present, in the mouth and in the heart. In this manner he will be revealed in all men, waits to be revealed in all, if only they will suffer it. The word for every loving, trusting heart is, "I will be manifest in you. Lo, I will be with you always." H. B.—This is the way to lessen our distance from God and heaven, by bringing Christ continually to us on earth: the sky is closed, and shows no sign; all things continue as they were from the beginning of the world; evil abounds, and, therefore, the faith of many waxes cold; but Christ was and is among us—Christ crucified and Christ risen—to make us feel that we may live with God daily upon earth, and, doing so, shall live with him for an eternal life in a country that can not pass away. T. A.

33. Christ comes offered to us all in good faith on the part of God as a foundation upon which we may build. And then comes in that strange mystery, that a man, consciously free, turns away from the offered mercy, and makes him that was intended to be the basis of his life, the foundation of his hope, the rock on which, steadfast and serene, he should build up a temple-home for his soul to dwell in—makes him a stumbling-stone against which, by rejection and unbelief, he breaks himself! A. M.

2. Zeal is an element that will combine with any active principle in man; will give its strength and inspiration in any pursuit or interest under the sun; will profane itself to the lowest, will be the glory of the highest, like fire that will smolder in garbage and will lighten in the heavens. A fatal ignorance in zeal the apostle here speaks of, namely, men's zealously maintaining the sufficiency of a righteousness of their own which God will not accept. A true and divinely enforced knowledge would reveal to them the awful holiness, justice, and law of God—would reveal themselves to them—and then their zeal would go another way. J. F.—The zeal which is acceptable is that which aims at the glory of God and which is founded on true benevolence to men, and which does not aim to establish a system of self-righteousness, as did the Jew, or to build up our own sect, as many others do. A. B.

3-5. The cause of this rejection of the Jews was that they persisted in a false idea of righteousness, as consisting in outward works and rites, and refused the true righteousness manifested to them in Christ, who was the end of the law. The Jew considers righteousness as the outward obedience to certain enactments ; the Christian considers righteousness as proceeding from the inward faith of the heart. Whoever has this faith, whether Jew or Gentile, shall be admitted into God's favor. C.—Establish their own righteousness. Thou art industrious from motives of ambition ; thou art faithful in thy calling from motives of pride ; thou art patient and lowly from the desire of fame ; thou avoidest great sins because thou fearest shame and disgrace, and in order that thou mayest yield thyself unhindered to hidden sin ; thou concealest from the world thy anger and bad temper, in order to be praised by the world as gentle. Thou givest to the poor that they may praise thee. All thy patience and humility, all thy gentleness and benevolence, all thy faithfulness and industry, give cords and bonds to thy ambition and pride, that they may bind thee more tightly than they could do otherwise. Thou layest aside sins and boastest of the strength of thy virtue. Seest thou not that all thy self-made piety condemns thee ? Seest thou not that it is only with sins that thou, a sinner, releasest thyself from sins ? A. C.—Is it no unrighteousness that thy whole life should be nothing else but a contradiction to the very design of Christ's dying, a perpetual hostility, a very tilting at his Cross ? Is there no unrighteousness in thy obstinate infidelity that denies belief to his glorious truths, acceptance of his gracious offers, subjection to his holy laws ? Is it righteous to live as no way under law to Christ ? to persist in actual rebellion against his just government, which he died and revived and rose again to establish over the living and the dead ? In a word, is it righteous to tread under foot the Son of God, to vilify his blood, and despise his Spirit ? Is this the righteousness that thou talkest of ? Are these thy qualifications for the everlasting blessedness ? Howe.

If thou go to Christ with thy own righteousness he will not have thee ; for he will have none but lost things, for he came to seek and save that which was lost. As long as thou lookest but to the righteousness of the law, the spirit of Jesus leaves thee, till thou acknowledge Christ for the Saviour of the lost, the justifier of the ungodly, the gracer of the unworthy, and the healer of the sick. Hence it is that Christ leaves sin in his own to humble them ; for if they had righteousness of their own they would misken him and his righteousness. And because they will not quit their own righteousness, he gives them an assay of themselves ; and when after a proof of their own naughtiness they will not yet submit to him, then he sends crosses, sicknesses, troubles of all sorts, that they may be forced to despair in themselves and come in to Christ's hospital, there to lie till they be cured of all their sinful maladies.

4. Christ the end of the law. First take us to Christ, renouncing our own righteousness ; then draw strength from him, and in his strength bring forth good fruits, and so be renewed ; come and get righteousness from Christ ; then crave new strength from him (for thou hast none of thy own) to be holy. Upon this order stands the matter betwixt God and his children : that, not finding their own righteousness, they take Christ's, and take new strength from his resurrection, sufferings, and death, and so get power to slay sin. From once they come to Christ, then holiness begins at the heart's roots, by the new power given by Christ. That self-righteousness they would be at holds aye a man proud, but this righteousness God would have them to embrace holds them humble. D. D.—That believeth. A believer is to do nothing for justification, only believe and be saved ; though the law be a rule for every one that believes to walk by, it is not for justification. Always put a difference between justification wrought by the man Christ without, and sanctification wrought by the Spirit of Christ within. Bun.

6, 7. The Christian religion does not require us to perform an impossible work, like going up to the throne of God and bringing the Mediator down. It does not require us to go into the abyss, the grave, the regions of departed souls, and perform a work like raising a man from the dead. It demands a task that lies within the proper exercise of human power : an act of simple confidence in Jesus Christ, and a suitable acknowledgment of him before the world at large. A. B.

9. Believe in thine heart. It is the grand distinction of Christianity that it makes its appeal to faith, and upon that, as a fundamental condition, rests the promise of salvation. It is called (here and elsewhere) the word of faith, the disciples are distinguished as believers, and Christ is published as the Saviour of them that believe. What is wanted is a faith that goes beyond the mere evidence of propositions about Christ, viz., the faith of a transaction ; and this faith is Christian faith. It is the act of trust by which one being, a sinner, commits himself to another being, a Saviour. It is not mind dealing with notions or notional truths. But it is being trusting itself to being, and so becoming other and different, by a relation wholly transactional. We commit ourselves to the Lord Jesus by an act of total and eternal trust, which is our faith. The matters included in this act are the surrender of our mere self-care, the ceasing to live from our own point of separated will, a complete admission of the mind of Christ, a consenting, practically, to be modulated by his motives and aims, and to live, as it were, infolded in his spirit. It is committing one's character wholly to the living character of Jesus, so that every willing and working and sentiment shall be pliant to his superior mind and spirit. H. B.

10. With the heart man believeth. Not with the brain but with the heart—with that kind of faith in which love is a larger element than intellect, and trust is more than assent. This is the faith that completes the whole work of regeneration. It carries penitence deeper down among the springs of feeling. It heightens the blush of shame at living a selfish and worldly life, because it is so alien to the disinterested and devout temper of the Master. It makes the new life a reality, because it finds it in the deepest motives. It changes the whole inner man. It works by love. It enters the invisible, and dwells in the secret tabernacle of a most holy joy. F. D. H.—It is the heart which fixes itself entirely on the love that shines forth in the work of redemption; cleaves without distraction to the sacrifice of the adorable victim; lets the natural impression of that unparalleled love penetrate freely, and develop itself gradually, in its interior. Quickly then are the veils torn away, and the shadows dissipated for ever! How little difficulty does he that loves find in comprehending love! How natural to him does it appear that God, infinite in all things, should be infinite also in his compassion! How inconceivable to him, on the other hand, that human hearts should not be capable of feeling the beauty of a work, without which God could not manifest himself entire! How astonished is he at the blindness of those who read and reread the Scriptures without comprehending the central truth; who pass and re-pass before a love all divine without recognizing or even perceiving a work all divine! A. V.—Whatever else it has or lacks, the soul, to be saved, must obey an honest purpose. Pretense and falsehood must be stripped off it. It must believe with the affections, heartily. With the heart man believeth unto salvation, before confession is made with the mouth. Get the conviction, which is the fountain, and it will furrow out a channel, and fill it with a stream. Get the new life, the love of God, and it will shape a body as the juices in the germ shape the tree. F. D. H.

With the mouth confession is made. The terms of Christian communion are the terms of salvation, and no church has a right to require more for its communion than Christ does for entrance into heaven. C. H.—The things necessary to be believed are reduced in Christ's Church to the smallest possible number and the simplest possible terms. It can not be God's intention, after planting his kingdom on earth by the costly sacrifices of redemption, to keep men out of it by intellectual difficulties. He asks you to believe in him, a living, divine Saviour, and in the personal and historical facts of his mediation, with a very few of the more comprehensive truths closely related to his person, his ministry, and its consequences. Whatever is beyond these is doctrine not essential to membership, or to beginning, but may be learned in the discipline, and by doing the will, afterward. Religion belongs in the heart-beat of a man's affections and the breath of his daily desire. But when the heart has taken it in it will not lock it there and make it a prisoner. It must go abroad again, for the blessing of man and the praise of God. It will put its owner into the Church, not to show himself, but that he may the better become one with his brethren, and with their common head. F. D. H.

12. For the same Lord who is over all mankind, the Lord Messiah, is rich, full of benefits, and ready to communicate them to all, whether Jews or Gentiles, who, believing on him, call upon him, give him divine homage, acknowledge his Lordship by praying to him. And this is confirmed by another Messianic prophecy (Joel 2 : 32). J. B.—There is a beautiful conception of the character of God involved in the use of the word "rich" in this connection. For he is said to be rich, not in respect of what he has, but of what he bestows. Used of men, the word indicates one to whom much has accrued; but it is used here of God to designate one from whom infinite wealth of blessing accrues to the sons of men. It is for us he is rich; his wealth is ours; we have a marvelous and inexhaustible treasury in him. He is rich unto all that call upon him. They call, and he answers by communications of his wealth. Let us entertain no contracted view of the fullness of blessing that dwelleth in our reconciled God! Let us neither exclude ourselves nor others. G. B.

Section 250.

ROMANS x. 14-21; xi. 1-12.

14 How then shall they call on him in whom they have not believed? and how shall they believe in him of whom they have not heard? and how shall they hear without a preacher?
15 and how shall they preach, except they be sent? as it is written, How beautiful are the feet

16 of them that preach the gospel of peace, and bring glad tidings of good things! But they 17 have not all obeyed the gospel. For Esaias saith, Lord, who hath believed our report? So then faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God.

18 But I say, Have they not heard? Yes, verily, their sound went into all the earth, and 19 their words unto the ends of the world. But I say, Did not Israel know? First Moses saith, I will provoke you to jealousy by them that are no people, and by a foolish nation I 20 will anger you. But Esaias is very bold, and saith, I was found of them that sought me 21 not; I was made manifest unto them that asked not after me. But to Israel he saith, All 1 day long I have stretched forth my hands unto a disobedient and gainsaying people. I say then, Hath God cast away his people? God forbid. For I also am an Israelite, of the seed of Abraham, of the tribe of Benjamin.

2 God hath not cast away his people which he foreknew. Wot ye not what the scripture
3 saith of Elias? how he maketh intercession to God against Israel, saying, Lord, they have killed thy prophets, and digged down thine altars; and I am left alone, and they seek my 4 life. But what saith the answer of God unto him? I have reserved to myself seven thou-
5 sand men, who have not bowed the knee to the image of Baal. Even so then at this present
6 time also there is a remnant according to the election of grace. And if by grace, then is it no more of works: otherwise grace is no more grace. But if it be of works, then is it no 7 more grace: otherwise work is no more work. What then? Israel hath not obtained that 8 which he seeketh for; but the election hath obtained it, and the rest were blinded (ac-9 cording as it is written, God hath given them the spirit of slumber, eyes that they should not see, and ears that they should not hear;) unto this day. And David saith, Let their table be made a snare, and a trap, and a stumblingblock, and a recompense unto them:
10 let their eyes be darkened, that they may not see, and bow down their back alway.

11 I say then, Have they stumbled that they should fall? God forbid: but rather through 12 their fall salvation is come unto the Gentiles, for to provoke them to jealousy. Now if the fall of them be the riches of the world, and the diminishing of them the riches of the Gentiles; how much more their fulness?

CHRISTIAN people are Christ's instruments for effecting the realization of the purposes of his death. Not without them shall the preaching be fully known. Not without the people willing in the day of his power, and clothed in priestly beauty, shall the Priest King set his feet upon his enemies. Neither the divine decree, nor the expansive power of the truth, nor the crowned expectancy of the waiting Lord, nor the mighty working of the Comforter, are the complete means for the accomplishment of the divine promise, that all nations shall be blessed in him. He has willed that we should make known the unsearchable riches of Christ. God reveals his truth, that men who believe it may impart it. God gives the word, that, caught up by those who receive it into an honest and good heart, it may be poured forth in mighty chorus from the lips of the "great company of them that publish it." Christian men! learn your high vocation and your solemn responsibilities. For what did you receive the word of God? For the same reason for which you have received everything else which you possess—that you might share it with your brethren. How did you receive it? A gift, unmerited, that you might feel bound to spread the free divine gift by cheerful human work of distribution. From whom did you receive it? From Christ, who in the very act of giving binds you to live for him and not for yourselves, and to mold your lives after the pattern of his. A. M.

14, 15. Seriously reflect how bound up with the very vitals of the true faith is the notion of its diffusion—how therefore they have totally misread Christianity, have misapprehended its rudimentary principles, have probably never received it at all except in speculation, who can acquiesce in an easy, self-indulgent life, without effort in any single shape for its propagation. Let them remember that the one great business of the era is the dissemination of God's truth—that, in one form or other, whether by alms and prayers only or by personal exertions, this business must be carried on by all professing the name of Christ—and that all other works in which man is engaged are only valuable as subordinate agencies, helping more or less remotely toward the end, carrying on that system of things which will result in the establishment of God's kingdom. E. M. G.

What we need for the renovation of the human family is the spread of that life-giving doctrine which we find in the Scriptures, and which challenges the abject and the wretched, universally and unexpectively, as the heirs of immortality, and as individually embraced in the intention of the gospel.

It follows from this doctrine that men, even the vilest, are no more to be contemned, for the Almighty does not contemn them; they are no longer to be forgotten, or despotically abused, or selfishly despaired of, for the Son of God has redeemed them. On the contrary, they must now singly, and at whatever cost, be sought out, instructed, cared for, and succored. I. T.

Man is lost, and the Son of God is seeking him; man is lost, and the Son of God is come to save him; man is lost, and the Church is commissioned to go forth in the might of faith and prayer to his salvation. To save the lost! We talk of it, as children talk of the affairs of empires; we see through a glass darkly; our conceptions are low and limited. To save the lost! Tell us, ye damned spirits, what it means. Tell us, Son of God, what it means; what stirred thy soul in godlike compassion to seek the lost? Tell us, ye ransomed and ye faithful spirits who never sinned—tell us, eternity—what is this mighty work of gospel missions? Tell us, O Father, tell thy churches; tell thy ministers; until every slumberer awake, every energy be aroused, and the way of life be pointed out to a perishing race! Kirk.

19. The passage referred to (Deut. 32 : 21) stands in a wonderful chapter, containing an epitome of the anticipated history of the Israelites, from the times of Moses down to "the latter days"—predicting that God would, for the punishment of their sins, withdraw from them the special favors he had bestowed and confer them upon those who had been destitute of them—"the foolish," the idolatrous—thus making those the objects of their jealousy and envy who had previously been contemned and hated. This threatening was fulfilled when the great body of the Jews, having rejected the promised Messiah, were disowned by God, and when he "visited the Gentiles to take out of them a people for his name." Such was the state of things when the apostle wrote. J. B.

1. Paul, though the apostle of the Gentiles, never cast off his care for his brethren, and always expressed himself on that subject with the warmest affection; and he alone, of all the writers in the New Testament, hath spoken clearly of the restoration of the Jews: he earnestly wishes for that happy day, and saw it afar off, and was glad. G. T.

2-12. This illustrious race, to which pertained the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, the ordinance of the law, divine service, and the promises; this race, from which Christ is descended, is not destined to be for ever among the nations a deplorable monument of the divine anger. After having seen its diminution, the world will see its fullness. If their diminishing, says the apostle, is our riches, what will their fullness be? When the fullness of Israel shall have returned to the fold, will not Israel again be a prophetic people? Will not the accomplishment of this promise be to itself as a testimony of the divine faithfulness, an admonitor to all nations, and a powerful call upon all to faith and obedience; and will not this people, as marvelous in its restoration as in its fall, be again, and more than ever, a powerful leaven to leaven the mass of humanity? In every case, its fullness will be our joy and consolation. A. V.—The fullness of the Jews is the fullness of blessing which shall belong to them when they return to God and embrace his Messiah. The conversion of the Jews will, directly or indirectly, do more for the advantage of the Gentiles than their unbelief has done. J. B.

It was to the Jew the Redeemer came as the Saviour; it was to him those words of life and love had been originally spoken; it was in his villages and cities he had wrought such unparalleled exhibitions of superangelic power in healing thousands of his diseased and dying; it was for him, at first, that incarnate Son had been revealed in his all-perfect life; in his hands were those Holy Scriptures: they described the suffering and the all-glorious Messiah; and it was his rejection of this Christ that culminated in the cry, "Crucify him." From that hour he reaped as he had sown; murder, assassination, intestine war, open revolt, marched through the land, and flooded his cities with blood. Peace, quiet, he knew no more. He ripened in every attribute of evil, until the legions of Rome trod him down beneath their iron heel; the temple lay in ruins, and the remnant of the people, escaped from the edge of the sword, were sent forth as the monuments of divine wrath to fulfill his prophetic words in their dispersion over the earth. To-day men point to the Jew as prophecy fulfilled; to-day this fated and trodden people exist—exist, after eighteen centuries of plague and war, and racks and fire, and disabilities—exist still, distinct from all nations. They have drunk the cup even to its dregs, but there is to dawn—is dawning—a brighter day, the day of the fuller gathering in of the Gentiles, when this long-cursed people shall come forth, no more to shout, "Crucify him," but with a penitent heart and streaming eyes, to cry, "My Lord and my God." The past is seen is known; the Messiah they have longed and hoped for is he, the crucified one; and when this fact dawns upon them, then to him shall the gathering of the people be. Hasten, O Lord, that hour of gladness; that hour when Jew and Gentile, no longer Jew and Gentile, shall with one voice crown Jesus as their king. S. W. F.

ROMANS xi. 13-36.

18 For I speak to you Gentiles, inasmuch as I am the apostle of the Gentiles, I magnify mine
 14 office: if by any means I may provoke to emulation them which are my flesh, and might 15 save some of them. For if the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what 16 shall the receiving of them be, but life from the dead? For if the firstfruit be holy, the 17 lump is also holy: and if the root be holy, so are the branches. And if some of the branches be broken off, and thou, being a wild olive tree, wert grafted in among them, and 18 with them partakest of the root and fatness of the olive tree; boast not against the 19 branches. But if thou boast, thou bearest not the root, but the root thee. Thou wilt say 20 then, The branches were broken off, that I might be grafted in. Well; because of unbelief 21 they were broken off, and thou standest by faith. Be not highminded, but fear: for if God spared not the natural branches, take heed lest he also spare not thee.

22 Behold therefore the goodness and severity of God: on them which fell, severity; but toward thee, goodness, if thou continue in his goodness: otherwise thou also shalt be cut 23 off. And they also, if they abide not still in unbelief, shall be grafted in: for God is able 24 to graff them in again. For if thou wert cut out of the olive tree which is wild by nature, and wert grafted contrary to nature into a good olive tree: how much more shall these, 25 which be the natural branches, be grafted into their own olive tree? For I would not, brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this mystery, lest ye should be wise in your own conceits; that blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be 26 come in. And so all Israel shall be saved: as it is written, There shall come out of Sion 27 the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob: for this is my covenant unto 28 them, when I shall take away their sins. As concerning the gospel, they are enemies for 29 your sakes: but as touching the election, they are beloved for the fathers' sakes. For the 30 gifts and calling of God are without repentance. For as ye in times past have not believed 31 God, yet have now obtained mercy through their unbelief: even so have these also now 32 not believed, that through your mercy they also may obtain mercy. For God hath concluded them all in unbelief, that he might have mercy upon all.

33 O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable 34 are his judgments, and his ways past finding out! For who hath known the mind of the 35 Lord? or who hath been his counsellor? Or who hath first given to him, and it shall be 36 recompensed unto him again? For of him, and through him, and to him, are all things:
 to whom be glory for ever. Amen.

THE burst of exultation uttered by the apostle in the closing verses is the conclusion of a chain of reasoning which is carried on uninterruptedly from the 9th to the 11th chapter. The exclusion of the Jews from the blessings of God's kingdom, in contrast with the reception of the Gentiles, presents an apparent problem in God's government. By the light of Scripture and experience he gradually comes to the conviction that this mode of action is in no degree at variance with God's faithfulness, since his ancient promises were only to the true, the believing Israel: even less with his holiness, since the rejection of Israel is merely the righteous punishment of their unbelief; and least of all with his truth, mercy, and grace, since the fall of Israel was the receiving of the Gentiles, and should afterward be followed by their rising again. Thus the whole divine scheme passes in broad outline before his eyes. He discovers what men regard as evil brought through a higher hand to good. God has—behold the result of his hallowed meditation!—concluded the whole world, both Jew and Gentile, under sin, in order that he in his own good time may have mercy on all. But now, when the apostle's eye has beheld this light, he can no longer restrain his exultation. From the dazzling summit of faith he gazes into a depth which causes him to sink down in adoration. It is a depth, first of riches, that is to say, of grace, which thus has mercy on sinners without distinction; then of wisdom, which chooses the best means for this highest aim; lastly, of knowledge, which is here determinate prescience, which in the repose of eternity has foreseen and foreordained all, in order that in the fullness of time it may come to pass. The conclusion from this can only be, the origin, the progress, the end of all salvation was foreordained by God in Christ: "For of him, and through him, and to him, are all things, to whom be glory for ever. Amen." Men in all ages praised this exultant expression of Paul's, as one of the most beautiful and sublime in all his epistles. It is the epitome of faith, as often as it glances on God's guidance both of individuals and of all within the sphere of redemption. Van O.

AGE has followed age, and the Jews remain to this hour spread over the face of the earth, a fearful and affecting testimony to the truth of God's word. They are without their sanctuary, without their Messiah, without the hope of their believing ancestors. But it shall not be always thus. They are still "beloved for the fathers' sake." When the "fullness of the Gentiles shall come in," they too shall be gathered. They shall discover in our Jesus the marks of the promised Messiah, and with tenderness proportioned to their former insensibility shall cling to his Cross. Grafted again into their own olive-tree, all Israel shall be saved. It was through their fall that salvation came unto us Gentiles. And "if the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be but life from the dead?" What ecstasy! the Gentile and the Jew taking sweet counsel together, and going to the house of God in company; the path of the swift messenger of grace marked in every direction by the fullness of the blessing of the gospel of Christ. J. M. M.

17, 18. The Church of God is here spoken of under the figure of an olive-tree, a tree remarkable for its beauty, fruitfulness, and usefulness. This mystical olive is represented as growing out of the root of the patriarchs of the Israelitish people, with whom, as believers, the covenant was made that God would be their God and the God of their seed. The Jews are considered as the natural branches, being descendants of these patriarchs; and, till Christ came, the true members of the Church of God were to be found almost exclusively among them. The rejection of the greater part of that people in consequence of unbelief is represented as the breaking off of a portion of the natural branches, and the conversion of some of the Gentiles as the grafting into the mystical olive of a number of branches of a wild olive so that they become partakers of its root and fatness—so that they are so connected with Abraham as to be blessed with him. The conclusion drawn is (v. 18) that the converted Gentiles should not think contemptuously of the Jews, whether converted or unconverted, for the Gentiles were much indebted to the Jews, and owed everything to that society which had the Jewish patriarch for its root. J. B.—The Christian Church was no new thing in the earth; it was the continuation of the one body which began to be formed when first the seed of the woman was announced, and was afterward more fully developed under the Abrahamic promise; and yet more fully developed when the ascended Christ shed down his Spirit, first on Abraham's sons, and then on the far-off Gentiles. When Gentiles come into the Church they are accounted as Abraham's seed, for "they that be of faith are blessed with faithful Abraham"; they are the wild branches grafted into the good old olive-tree, which has never been uprooted nor cast away. The New Testament Church gets its sap, its vitality, from this connection; and New Testament saints are what they are by reason of their being made "partakers of the root and fatness of the olive-tree." Bonar.

21. Lest he also spare not thee. They were broken off because of unbelief, and thou standest through faith, but yet only because and in so far as thou believest. The loving care of God calls loud and long, but not for ever; a time may come when he must give up nations and individuals to their own blindness, because, however powerfully he urges, he constrains no one to be saved who stubbornly refuses to profit by the work of his redeeming love. Van O.

22. Behold therefore the goodness and severity of God. The Jews who had so long been a barren branch on the olive-tree of his Church—putting forth, indeed, the leaves of religious profession, but no fruit of true holiness—God had cut off and cast away. The Gentiles—originally "aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise"—he had inserted, as a new wild graft, into the cultivated olive-tree. These two contrary dealings are traced up to their source in different attributes of the Most High; the one testifies to his severity, the other to his goodness. It is this essential character of the divine being which forms the basis of the great doctrine of the atonement. God presents us in the atonement with the highest illustration of both his attributes. He may be conceived as standing by the Cross of the Lord Jesus and pointing to it in exemplification of his character, as set forth in the text, "Behold therefore the goodness and severity of God." E. M. G.—In most cases the goodness is illustrated by one kind of events, and the severity by another, but in Christ's work the same event of his death displayed the two sides of God's character alike and at once, and thus pardon was never offered to the guilty without a loud protest against sin. T. D. W.

Christ's gospel gives out the forgiveness of sins; and the tone of encouragement, of mercy, of loving-kindness to sinners is ever predominant. But yet there is another language, which is to be found alike in the Old Testament and in the New; a language not indeed so common as the language of mercy, but yet repeated many times; a language which we also need as fully as it was ever needed, and of whose severity we can no more spare one tittle than we can spare anything of the comfort of the other. T. A.

25-32. God's object has been not to reject any, but to show mercy upon all mankind. His purpose has been to make use of the Jewish unbelief to call the Gentiles into his Church, and by the admission of the Gentiles to rouse the Jews to accept his message, that all might at length receive his mercy. C.

25. Gentiles come in. Let us celebrate the beginnings of our blessed hope with exulting hearts; for from this time forward we begin to enter into an eternal inheritance, and the secrets of Scripture, speaking of Christ, have been laid open to us, and the truth, which Jewish blindness does not receive, has carried its light into all nations. Leo.

26-28. The meaning of the prophecy still remains veiled to the unhappy posterity of Jacob; but the time will at length come when, the veil being taken away, they as well as we will clearly comprehend the words. A. V.—Take up a volume of the history of any country, at any age since the fall of Jerusalem, and you find the Jews just as we now find them—dwelling in the seclusion of their own communities. "The restless feet" of this ancient people of God are pressing every inhabitable region of the world. They are met in every city, in every mart of business, in every climate, among people of every language. Amid all their sufferings and wanderings, in harmony with prophecy, they have remained a distinct and peculiar people. With neither a country nor a nation that could be called their own, they have uniformly preserved a distinct nationality. Though they have looked upon the mightiest revolutions among the Gentiles; though they have been moving among extensive migrations, from east to west, and from north to south; though they have been dwellers in different empires while in their ascendant, supremacy, and decline; though we have seen them passing through all those political and civil convulsions which have destroyed every nation around Judea, except the Persians alone, who restored them from their Babylonish captivity—yet for eighteen centuries they have remained, in all essential features, the same. They maintain the same laws, and have continued to preserve their own and their old identity. L. T. T.—The Jews exist not only as a monument and a miracle; Jewish mind has exerted a powerful influence on the world. In money power, the Jews hold in their hands the destiny of kingdoms and empires, whose governments become bankrupt and their sovereigns turn beggars at a Hebrew's nod. Among the most distinguished scholars and men of science, we find the Jews prominent. The most renowned in astronomy have been Jews, as the Herschels in England and Arago in France. Of Christianized Jews are Hengstenberg, Tholuck, Schleiermacher, Gesenius, Neander, Niebuhr, and others, whose learned treatises, Biblical criticisms, didactic theology, and general sacred literature, are found in the library of every theological student. Aa.

29. Are without repentance. Read "can not be repented of." A.

32. The man who thoroughly understands this single verse has the key to the whole Bible. The doctrine of the Bible has these two fundamental articles: The Misery of Man—The Mercy of God. The text mentions them both, and sets them over against each other. "God hath concluded them all in unbelief"—here is man's misery; "that he might have compassion upon all"—here is God's mercy. Monod.—To sinners of every kind, to us all, to the whole world, the man of God cries in the Scriptures, "God hath concluded all in rebellion, that he may have mercy upon all." With him there is no respect of persons, no respect of sins; he stops not at some shades of difference; he does not apply to us our own vain measures; for the original crime is equal in all; and since he has included all in rebellion, he includes all in mercy. The amnesty is for all equally; but it must be accepted just as it is offered; not as a right, but as a gift; not as an abandonment of the principles of the divine government, but as the price of the sacrifice of Jesus Christ, as a return for the ransom he has paid and the pledge he has offered. A. V.

33. It was the destiny of Israel, after a brief period of prosperity, to separate into rival dynasties, to run through a course of much iniquity, to despise constant, reiterated warnings, and at length to merge in utter ruin, undestroyed indeed, but preserved only as a monument of God's abiding vengeance. But mark the unsearchable depths of the purposes of Providence! These national misfortunes brought in universal blessedness. Israel fell to prepare the salvation of mankind; and the "rest," which the Lord God denied his people, was denied only that an everlasting rest might be secured to his spiritual people for ever! Well might the apostle, who was chosen as the chief laborer in this extension of the kingdom of God, exclaim when he contemplated that great revolution, "Oh! the depth of the riches, and the wisdom, and the knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!" W. A. B.

34. If none hath been his counselor, it is plain that none can know his mind till he shall be pleased to reveal it; nor even then can it be known any further than it is revealed. To supply what is concealed, with conclusions drawn from the reasonings of our own minds, would be the height of presumption: We must take his counsel as it lies before us in the record he hath given us, without adding to it or subtracting from it. R. W.

36. The Cross is the center of the world's history; the incarnation of Christ and the crucifixion of our Lord are the pivot round which all the events of the ages revolve. The testimony of Jesus was the spirit of prophecy, and the growing power of Jesus is the spirit of history. All the generations that went before him, though they knew it not, were preparing the way of the Lord, and heralding the advent of him who was the desire of all nations and the light of men; and all the generations that come after, though they know it not, are swelling the pomp of his triumph and hastening the time of his crowning and dominion. The tangled web of human history is only then intelligible when that is taken as its clew, "From him are all things, and to him are all things." A. M.

Section 252.

ROMANS xii. 1-10.

1 I BESEECH you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies
2 a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service. And be not conformed to this world: but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye 3 may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect, will of God. For I say, through the grace given unto me, to every man that is among you, not to think of himself more highly than he ought to think; but to think soberly, according as God hath dealt to every 4 man the measure of faith. For as we have many members in one body, and all members
5 have not the same office: so we, being many, are one body in Christ, and every one members one of another. Having then gifts differing according to the grace that is given to us, 6 whether prophecy, let us prophecy according to the proportion of faith; or ministry, let us
7 wait on our ministering: or he that teacheth, on teaching; or he that exhorteth, on exhortation: he that giveth, let him do it with simplicity; he that ruleth, with diligence; he 8 that sheweth mercy, with cheerfulness. Let love be without dissimulation. Abhor that 9 which is evil; cleave to that which is good. Be kindly affectioned one to another with 10 brotherly love; in honour preferring one another.

"We offer and present unto thee, O Lord, ourselves, our souls and bodies"—this is our sacrifice, daily and continually to be offered; our spiritual sacrifice, not of brute creatures which know not God, but a reasonable sacrifice of our reasonable minds, of our fancy, our imagination, our judgment, of all the faculties which God has given us to know truth and to know him; and a holy sacrifice of a penitent heart washed in Christ's blood, of a believing heart, a self-denying, an obedient, and a loving heart; and yet again a lively sacrifice, a sacrifice of living powers and feelings and hopes. And our bodies, too, with all their various senses and powers, we sacrifice to God; a living sacrifice, not to be destroyed or dishonored, but to do God active service. Our bodies so fearfully and wonderfully made; our eyes, our ears, our busy tongues, our active feet, that vigor which youth feels in all its frame, and which makes the very sense of life a pleasure—these we offer and present to God. T. A.

The true, divine idea of religion is a life begotten of grace in the depths of the human soul, subduing to Christ all the powers of the soul, and incarnating itself in a patient, steady, sturdy service. It is the doing of the will of the Father which entitles us to a solid assurance of our redemption by the Son. Doing this will, not preaching it, as something which ought to be done; not indolently sighing to do it, and then lamenting that we do it not; but the thing itself, in actual achievement, from day to day, from month to month, from year to year. Thus religion rises on us in its own imperial majesty. It is no mere delight of the understanding in the doctrines of our faith; no mere excitement of the sensibilities, now harrowed by fear and now jubilant in hope; but a warfare and a work: a warfare against sin and a work for God. And so our thoughts, our cares, our aims get shifted away from ourselves to a worthier center. We look not within ourselves, but above us, for the guiding word; while the roots of our Christian hope are nourished more by our duties than our joys. It is character that is required of us; laid, indeed, in grace, and imperfect at the best, needing to shelter itself behind the perfect righteousness of Christ, and yet a piece of solid moral masonry, to be carried on and carried up by a life-long toil. And this, too, not for our own sake, but for Christ's sake, and because God so wills it. Our own spiritual comfort, the sure fruit of a careful walk with God, though an incident, is not to be the end of our endeavors; but all we do is to be out of simple loyalty to redeeming love. Mere obedience to conscience is but a pagan virtue, which, in the highest sphere, is not a virtue at all. Virtue, for us, is obedience to God in Christ. Painstaking it will be, that there may be no blot upon the life; self-denying, as against our indolence, our appetites, and our passions; asking only for duty, though we knew it were asking for martyrdom—and all for Christ. Such is the will of God concerning us; and only he who does it should reckon himself a child of God. R. D. H.

THE twelfth of Romans, placed at the beginning of the Epistle, would have been as cold and uninspiring as the ten commandments on the tables of stone; standing where it does, every precept is moistened with tears of divine pity and the blood of redemption; and to the soul that has learned with Paul "the depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God," every word that expresses the will of the Lord Jesus is richer than gold and sweeter than honey. A.—He that gives rules of life without first fixing principles of faith offers preposterously at building a house without laying a foundation, and he that instructs what to believe and directs not a believer how to live doth in vain lay a foundation without following out the building. But in this Epistle we find our apostle excellently acquitting himself in both these. He first largely and firmly lays the groundwork in the foregoing part of the Epistle; now he adds exhortations and directions touching the particular duties of Christians.

1. The first thing to be done with a soul is to convince it of sin and death, then to address and lead it in to Christ, our righteousness and life; this done it should be taught to follow him. This is Christianity, to live in Christ, and to live to Christ; to live in him by faith, and to live to him in holiness. The exhortation that begins this chapter hath in it the whole sum of Christian obedience fitly expressed and strongly urged; and in that are all particular rules comprised. One said well, "The best way to understand the mysterious and high discourse in the beginning of Paul's Epistles is to begin at the practice of these rules and precepts that are in the latter end of them." The way to attain to know more is to receive the truth in the love of it, and to obey that you know. L.—One must first be cleansed, and then cleanse others; first be instructed, then instruct; become light, then enlighten; draw nigh to God, then lead others up to him; be sanctified, then sanctify; have hands, then lead by the hand; have prudence, then give counsel. No one is worthy of our great God, both sacrifice and high priest, who has not first presented himself to God as a holy, living sacrifice, nor exhibited that reasonable service which is well-pleasing to him. Greg. Naz.

The whole tone of our New Testament religion is searching and high. It allows no laxities and no apologies. It is satisfied with nothing less than entire consecration. The piety it asks is both active and ardent, warm and constant, ever burning and ever advancing. It summons into the master's service every power, every energy, every affection, every hour of life. F. D. H.—The absolute unselfish oblation of the whole man—mind, heart, and will—as a sacrifice to Christ, out of thankful regard to his dying love, is the living sacrifice, the reasonable service, with which God is well pleased. To keep back anything is to deny our Lord. He asks only the heart, but he asks it all. And in gracious souls he has it. It is his. He has bought it with his Cross and passion, and carries it away in triumph; embracing in almighty arms the ransomed one, who desires no other master, and is happy to be borne away captive by him, whose commandments are not grievous, whose yoke is light, and whose service is freedom. J. W. A.

2. Conformity to the world does not consist in joining in the pleasures with which God who made the world has filled it. It does not consist in pursuing the occupations by which the work of the world is done. It does not consist in allowing proper play to the natural impulses. All these things, though they can be made worldly, yet are not worldly in themselves. By being conformed to this world, the apostle plainly means the molding of the life and character by the system which prevails around you, and not by the higher teaching which reaches your heart and conscience. The world has another voice which does not come from God at all, and which speaks to our weakness, to our folly, to our vanity, to our love of popularity, to our fear of offending. And this is the voice which we are tempted to make our guide, and even to enthrone above our own consciences. Those who begin with the world almost always end with the flesh, or sometimes with what is worse still. They begin by talking lightly of serious faults because they are common, because they are not thought much of, because the temptations to them are great. And such invariably, if they do not repent, go straight on from mere laxity of judgment to downright indulgence in fleshly sins. And hence conformity to the world does the same kind of mischief now that idolatry did long ago. It leads by a direct and rapid course to a low moral standard, to stifling the higher nature, to a weak and perhaps a positively corrupt form of religion, and to a degradation of the life and character. F. T.

We must avoid as much as in us lies all such society, all such amusements, all such tempers which it is the daily business of a Christian to subdue, and all those feelings which it is his constant duty to suppress. Some things, which are apparently innocent and do not assume an alarming aspect or bear a dangerous character—things which the generality of decorous people affirm (how truly we know not) to be safe for them; yet if we find that these things stir up in us improper propensities—if they awaken thoughts which ought not to be excited—if they abate our love for religious exercises, or infringe on our time for performing them—if they make spiritual concerns appear insipid—if they wind our heart a little more about the world—in short, if we have formerly found them injurious to our own souls, then let no example or persuasion, no belief of their alleged innocence, no plea of their perfect safety tempt us to indulge in them. It matters little to our security what they are to others. Our business is with ourselves. Our responsibility is on our own heads. Others can not know the side on which we are assailable. Let our own unbiased judgment determine our opinion; let our own experience decide for our own conduct. H. More.—I have found nothing yet which requires more courage and independence than to rise even a little, but decidedly, above the par of the religious world around us. Surely, the way in which we commonly go on is not that way of self-denial and sacrifice and cross-bearing which the New Testament talks of. Then is the offense of the Cross ceased. Our slender influence on the circle of our friends is often to be traced to our leaving so little difference between us. J. W. A.

3. To every man. This is more pressing than if he had said simply, to you, or generally, to you all. Thus we ought to speak, and thus ye ought to hear. We to speak, not as telling some unconcerning stories, but as having business with you; and you to hear, not each for another, as you often do, "Oh! such a passage touched such a one," but each for ourselves. Not to think more highly. The first particular the apostle recommends is that gracing grace of humility, the ornament and the safety of all other graces, and which is so peculiarly Christian. Somewhat philosophers speak of temperance, justice, and other like virtues, but these rather to swell the mind with conceit and confidence of itself than to dwell together with self-abasement and humility. But in the school of Christ the first lesson of all is self-denial and humility. It is written above the door as the rule of entry or admission, Learn of me, for I am meek and lowly of heart. And, out of all question, that is truly the humblest heart that hath most of Christ in it. L.

—A false, imaginary perfection makes way for too many real imperfections. Christ has been disparaged in all manners by this infidel fervor; disparaged in his nature, his dignity, and holiness. There is not one of those schools which, by stretching certain cords to excess, have not in an equal degree slackened others which ought to have been kept stretched. There is not one of those schools whose progress has not been marked by the destruction or weakening of some one of the fundamental truths of religion or morality. A. V.

To think soberly. A low self-esteem doth not wholly take away the simple knowledge of what gifts and graces God hath bestowed on a man, for that were to make him both unthankful and unuseful. He that doth not know what God hath freely given him can not return praise to God nor make use of himself for God in his station. The apostle's caution intimates a sober, humble reflection on the measure God hath given a man, which he not only allows but requires; and himself gives example of it in his own present expression, declaring that he speaks these things through the grace that is given to him. In this dependent notion of freely given, a man shall never be puffed up by any endowments, though he see and know them; yea, the more he knows them thus, will be the more humble still, as being the more obliged. L.

4-8. The second constituent of Christian duty is reciprocal justice and kindness between man and man, like the harmony and helpfulness which the Creator has established between the several members of a living body. Mark how the hand comes to the defense of the eye in its weakness; and how the eye with its sight, and from its elevated position, keeps watch for the welfare of the lowly, blind, but laborious and useful foot. The mutual helpfulness of these members is absolutely perfect. Such should be the charity between brother and brother of God's family on earth; such it shall be when all the sons and daughters are assembled in the many mansions of the heavenly home. In the remaining portion of the Epistle, Paul labors with all his might to stimulate practical charity, in one place reducing the whole law to one precept, to one word—Love. After devoting so much attention to the roots, he will not neglect to gather the fruit. Arnot.

6. The gospel, as taught by our Lord and his apostles, is pure, transparently clear, radiant alike with the glory of God and the happiness of man—of that there is no doubt; yet what twists has the mind of man contrived to give it, so that in some forms of Christianity you can hardly at all recognize the original draught, as it came from the divine mind! What follies, fancies, superstitions, licentious doctrines, have founded themselves—not justly of course, but with a most perverse ingenuity—upon the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament! It would be interesting to consider every heresy which has hitherto arisen, and see how in each case it has been a caricature of some one point of Christian truth—an exaggeration by which the fair proportion of the faith, of which Paul here speaks, has been distorted, and a single passage of Scripture or a single class of passages brought into undue prominence. E. M. G.

8. In the scheme of evangelical charity the principle which actuates the giver is of paramount importance. "He that giveth, let him do it with simplicity." The gospel rejects alike the tax which is reluctantly paid by fear, the bribe which is given to silence importunity, the sacrifice which is offered to a vain ostentation, and the price which is intended to purchase a place in the divine favor, or as a ground of justification before God. The only offering which it accepts is that which originates in a principle of love and obedience to Christ, and which hopes and asks for divine acceptance through him alone. And having made its appeal at the Cross, having provided and plied him with the grand motive of redeeming love, it will accept nothing which overlooks the constraining influence of that principle. J. H.

9. The duty here meant and commanded is, that we love one another, and our love must be unhypocritical and sincere; such as, though it may consist with, yet doth not wholly consist in civilities of expression and behavior, but a real benevolence of soul and good will to all—a love disposing readily to forgive evil and do good upon all occasions. Cleave to that which is good. This expresses a vehement and inseparable affection; loving and rejoicing in all the good thou seest in others; desiring and seeking after all the good thou canst attain unto thyself; such as will put thee and keep thee most in mind of thy home, and the way thither, and admonish and reduce thee from any declining steps.

10. In honor preferring one another. Putting all possible respect on one another; for though a man may see the weakness of those he converses with, yet he ought to take notice of what is good. All have something commendable, and none hath all; so the meanest may in something be preferable to the highest; and Christian humility and charity will seek out for that. L.

Section 253.

ROMANS xii. 11-21.

11 Not slothful in business; fervent in spirit; serving the Lord; rejoicing in hope; patient in tribulation; continuing instant in prayer; distributing to the necessity of saints; given 14 to hospitality. Bless them which persecute you: bless, and curse not. Rejoice with them 15 that do rejoice, and weep with them that weep. Be of the same mind one toward another. 16 Mind not high things, but condescend to men of low estate. Be not wise in your own con- 17 ceits. Recompense to no man evil for evil. Provide things honest in the sight of all men. 18 If it be possible, as much as lieth in you, live peaceably with all men. Dearly beloved, 19 avenge not yourselves, but rather give place unto wrath: for it is written, Vengeance is 20 mine; I will repay, saith the Lord. Therefore if thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, 21 give him drink: for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head. Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good.

CARRY holy principles with you into the world, and the world will become hallowed by their presence. A Christlike spirit will Christianize everything it touches. A meek heart, in which the altar-fire of love to God is burning, will lay hold of the commonest, rudest things in life and transmute them, like coarse fuel at the touch of fire, into a pure and holy flame. Religion in the soul will make all the work and toil of life, its gains and losses, friendships, rivalries, competitions, its manifold incidents and events, the means of religious advancement. Lofty or lowly, rude or refined, as our earthly work may be, it will become, to a holy mind, only the material for an infinitely nobler than all the creations of genius—a pure and godlike life. To spiritualize what is material, to Christianize what is secular—this is the noble achievement of Christian principle. If you are a sincere Christian, it will be your great desire, by God's grace, to bring every gift, talent, occupation of life, every word you speak, every action you do, under the control of Christian motive. Caird.

Where true piety exists, fidelity to man is transmuted into worship before God. This is the great truth which sanctifies all human life. Broken up as life is into myriads of little, insignificant acts, it is hard sometimes to redeem it from contempt. It becomes a holy thing, when we realize that, with the heart unreservedly given to God, even the most trivial duty becomes an act of worship. Glowing with the warm affection by which it is inspired, it glides into the frame of devotion itself; which, as grateful incense, goes up to heaven from the altar of God within the heart. Our worship consists not only in formal acts of praise and prayer, when we bow before God in the sanctuary, or kneel at his feet in the closet; but in the workshop, in the counting-room, in the office, everywhere, and in the hourly transactions of common business, the whole life becomes a sacred chant. The ten thousand little obediences are the sweet notes which compose it, rising above the din of this poor world, and mingling in the universal psalm of praise that is heard before the throne. Duty is felt in all its sacredness, and a soft radiance beams upon the path of the most obscure and patient of the Lord's saints upon the earth. B. M. P.

11. The words seem to imply that religion is not so much a duty as a something that has to do with all duties; not a tax to be paid periodically, but a ceaseless, all-pervading, inexhaustible tribute to him who is not only the object of religious worship but the end of our very life and being. It suggests to us the idea that piety is not for Sundays only, but for all days; that spirituality of mind is like the act of breathing, like the circulation of the blood, like the silent growth of the stature, a process that may be going on simultaneously with all our actions—when we are busiest, as when we are idlest; in the church, in the world; in solitude, in society; in our grief, and in our gladness; in our toil, and in our rest; sleeping, waking; by day, by night—amid all the engagements and exigencies of life. For you perceive that in one breath, as duties not only not incompatible but necessarily and inseparably blended with each other, the text exhorts us to be at once “not slothful in business,” and “fervent in spirit, serving the Lord.” Caird.

Suffer the mind to revert to the thought that what we are about to do is the task assigned to us in the order of God's providence, that it is a task which he will inspect, and that it must be executed as well as we are able in order that it may meet his approval. Do the work under the eye of your heavenly master, and look up in his face from time to time for his help and blessing: an internal colloquy with him ever and anon, so far from being a distraction, will be a furtherance. For no work can in any high sense prosper which is not done with a bright, elastic spirit; and there is no means of keeping the spirit bright and elastic but by keeping it near to God. And never think of your work as a distraction or a hindrance to piety. Think of it as contributing to healthfulness and cheerfulness of mind, as a steadying and sobering influence, preventing those extravagances into which without it the mind might run. E. M. G.—There is many a secret sin that is best contended against, not by first thinking about it and then resisting it—for, while you think about it, it takes the form of a temptation—but by crowding our days so full of duty that the tempter will find no treacherous door open. Work is chaste. Work hallowed by prayer is chaster still. Have no fears that God will not help. F. D. H.

Fervent in spirit. The fervor whereof the apostle speaks hath religion, or the service of God, for its object. Love to God is the principle, the law of God is the rule, and his glory the end, of all its operations. The fervent Christian is habitually on the stretch to answer the great purposes for which he was made and redeemed; his understanding is employed in searching out the mind of God so far as it regards the conduct of his creatures; his will is firmly and resolutely determined to perform whatever shall appear to be his duty; his affections are inspired with holy life and vigor; in consequence of which his executive powers are all ready to perform their several parts: the tongue to speak, the hands to give or to do what is required, and the feet to run in the way of God's commandments. In short, the whole man is engaged in the service of God, so that religion becomes his constant and most delightful occupation; he counts nothing too much to be done or too hard to be endured for the enjoyment of that God whom he most ardently loves and to whom he is entirely devoted. This is to be fervent in spirit. R. W.

True manly strength in religion is nurtured at the mercy-seat and at the foot of the Cross. The world has already half destroyed us when we are too busy to pray. Better forego food or rest, especially better forego any amount of profit, than learn to live without communion with God. The man of business, who from morning till night scarcely redeems a moment for stated reflection, must, by stern resolution and self-denial, gain some hour to hear God speak and to speak to God, or he will inevitably shrink and wither down into the every-day worldly professor, who is bold at a bargain and cowardly in faith, earnest on week-days and half asleep on the Sabbath, indefatigable in trade-labors and unheard of in operations for Christ's kingdom or his poor. J. W. A.—Believer, the more worldly business lies upon thy hand the more need thou hast to keep close to thy closet. Much business lays a man open to many sins, many snares, and many temptations. Brooks.—Most businesses have wide gaps; all have some chinks at which devotion may slip in. Be we never so urgently set or closely intent on any work, be we feeding, be we traveling, be we trading, be we studying, nothing can forbid that we wedge in a thought concerning God's goodness, and a word of praise for it; that we reflect on our sins, and spend a penitential sigh on them; that we descry our need of God's help, and dispatch a brief petition for it. Barrow.—Often a man in the multitude and pressure of his avocations exercises a more God-pleasing humility and real waiting upon God than in highly favored moments of elevated devotion. Beng.

12. Wilt thou resolutely strive against slothfulness? Then rejoice in hope—in the hope of that glory which is the portion of the true Christian. Wilt thou be and remain fervent in spirit? Then be patient—that is, at once enduring and resolute—in tribulation. Patience strengthens the power out of which true zeal is born; and, in order to do much for the kingdom of God, we must have learned to suffer, if need be, for his sake. Wilt thou, finally, serve the Lord uprightly in thy work? Continue instant in prayer. To work and pray are not to the Christian two opposite things; far less does the one exclude the other—they flow together incessantly in higher unity. Persevering, believing prayer alone will give thee enjoyment, courage, and strength for the daily service of the Lord, even in a post which perhaps thou wouldst not have chosen for thyself. The hidden power of the prompt, busy hand lies in the constantly bowed knee. Van O.—If afraid of fainting, yea, if at the point of fainting, prayer revives the soul, draws in no less than the strength of God to support it. And what, then, can surcharge it? Oh! acquaint yourselves with prayer, and by it with God, that, if days of trouble come, you may know whither to go and what way; and, if you know this way, whatever befalls you, you are not much to be bemoaned. L.

15. Rejoice, weep. This indeed is a characteristic trait that distinguishes the Christian faith from every religious pretension that was ever set up. It is not one-sided, as being all for melancholy or all for mirth—not stoical or epicurean. It has as many sides as our life has, goes with us wherever we can go, and only asks that it may consecrate everything with its blessing. F. D. H.—I am obliged to great thankfulness to God for the mercies of this life which he has shown to my friends. That which promotes their joy should increase mine. Nature and grace teach us to be glad, when our friends are well and prosper. Do good to men's bodies if thou wouldst do good to their souls. Say not, "Things corporeal are worthless trifles for which the receivers will be never the better." They are things that nature is easily sensible of; and sense is the passage to the mind and will. Dost thou not find what a help it is to thyself to have at any time any ease and alacrity of body; and what a burden and hindrance pains and cares are? Labor then to free others from such burdens and temptations, and be not regardless of them. If thou must "rejoice with them that rejoice, and weep with them that weep," promote then thy own joy by helping theirs, and avoid thy own sorrows in preventing or curing theirs. Baz.

16. Mind not high things. In order to escape the perils of a false elevation, to avoid falling either into the snares of the flesh or the snares of pride, aspire to things higher than all those to which the world unjustly gives the name of high things. Neither to the right nor to the left, but upward! Upward! in the practice of all the duties which God has given you to fulfill. Upward! in simple love to him who has loved you, diligently seeking his glory while despising your own. Upward! in the exactness, not the scrupulous and legal, but the tender and zealous exactness of Christian obedience, in humility truly humble, and that childlike simplicity which so admirably accords with enlightened reason in the intelligent but docile acceptance of the gifts which God has given, and the truths which he has taught you. A. V.

17. All that is required of us is that we should not suffer our resentment of injuries to carry us beyond the bounds of justice, equity, and Christian charity; that we should not recompense evil for evil, or repay one injury by committing another; that we should not take fire at every slight provocation or trivial offense, nor pursue even the greatest and most flagrant injuries with implacable rancor; that we should make all reasonable allowances for the infirmities of human nature, for the passions, the prejudices, the failings, the misapprehensions of those we have to deal with; and, without submitting tamely to oppression or insult or giving up rights of great and acknowledged importance, should always show a disposition to conciliate and forgive; and rather to recede and give way a little in certain instances, than insist on the utmost satisfaction and reparation that we have perhaps a strict right to demand. P.—It is not manhood but childishness to be quieted with striking the thing that hurts us. Though enemies be not worthy to be loved by us, yet malice is unworthy to be lodged in us. 'Tis true, the precept of loving enemies is contrary to unsanctified nature. But God alone knows how to punish our enemies without passion and inequality. It is our duty to weary persecutors with patience. A Christian must not, like the flint, seem to be cool but be fiery when struck. He that takes up fire to throw (though against his enemy) hurts himself most. To be kind to the kind argues civility; to be unkind to the unkind argues corruption; to be unkind to the kind argues devilishness; to be kind to the unkind argues Christianity. Jenkyn.

18. Lieth in you. The emphasis is best laid on the word you. Not a mere repetition of the first clause, "if it be possible," but further insisting on that thought, as if in answer to the suggestion, "I would but somebody else will not." A proverb says, "It takes two to quarrel": keep peace on your side. O. E. D.—Remember that, when any man reviles you, it is not the tongue that gives you the opprobrious language that injures or affronts you; but it is your own resentment of it as an injury or affront that makes it such to you. Epicetus.

19. The second injury, done by way of revenge, differs from the first that provoked it little or nothing but in point of time; and certainly no one man's sin can procure privilege to another to sin in that or the like kind. If another hath broken the bonds of his allegiance and obedience to God and of charity to thee, yet thou art not the less tied by the same bonds still. By revenge of injuries thou usurpest upon God's prerogative, who is the avenger, as the apostle teaches. This doth not forbid either the magistrate's sword for just punishment of offenders, or the soldier's sword in a just war; but such revenges as, without authority or a lawful call, the pride and perverseness of men do multiply one against another: in which is involved a presumptuous contempt of God and his supreme authority, or at least the unbelief and neglect of it. L.—20. Coals of fire. That fiery coals signify benefits is manifest by the words of Solomon which the apostle here reciteth. Benefits may properly be called coals of fire, for they inflame the heart with love, which was before cold and inactive. Luther.

21. When we meet with an opposition which frets and irritates us, Christian prudence counsels us to pray that the temptation may be removed; and in particular that our self-love and injured feelings may not weaken our love for our neighbor. But this prudence, if it counsels nothing further, is not prudent enough. If the same feeling which disposes us to pray does not dispose us to pray for our enemies or opponents, it is difficult to believe that it is a movement of charity. Charity can not be thus arrested. Its nature is to overcome evil with good, and this means not merely that it does not render evil for evil, but that in return for evil it renders good. It would not be charity if it did less. To pardon truly it is necessary to do more than pardon. Evil must be overcome by good; and after the example of God himself, where the offense has abounded, grace must much more abound. This is to say that pardoning, sparing, loving, all are secured in the person offended only when he prays for the offender. A. V.

Section 254.

ROMANS xiii. 1-14.

1 LET every soul be subject unto the higher powers. For there is no power but of God:
 2 the powers that be are ordained of God. Whosoever therefore resisteth the power, resist-
 3 eth the ordinance of God: and they that resist shall receive to themselves damnation. For 4 rulers are not a terror to good works, but to the evil. Wilt thou then not be afraid of the 5 power? do that which is good, and thou shalt have praise of the same: for he is the min-
 6 ister of God to thee for good. But if thou do that which is evil, be afraid; for he beareth
 7 not the sword in vain: for he is the minister of God, a revenger to execute wrath upon him
 8 that doeth evil. Wherefore ye must needs be subject, not only for wrath, but also for con-
 9 science' sake. For for this cause pay ye tribute also: for they are God's ministers, attending 10 continually upon this very thing. Render therefore to all their dues: tribute to whom trib-11 ute is due; custom to whom custom; fear to whom fear; honour to whom honour.
 12 Owe no man any thing, but to love one another: for he that loveth another hath fulfilled the law. For this, Thou shalt not commit adultery, Thou shalt not kill, Thou shalt not steal, Thou shalt not bear false witness, Thou shalt not covet; and if there be any other commandment, it is briefly comprehended in this saying, namely, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. Love worketh no ill to his neighbour: therefore love is the fulfilling of the law. And that, knowing the time, that now it is high time to awake out of sleep: for now is our salvation nearer than when we believed. The night is far spent, the day is at hand: let us therefore cast off the works of darkness, and let us put on the armour of light. 13 Let us walk honestly, as in the day; not in rioting and drunkenness, not in chambering and 14 wantonness, not in strife and envying. But put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make not provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts thereof.

IF, indeed, God's kingdom were shining around us in its full beauty; if every evil thing were driven out of his temple; if we saw nothing but holy lives and happy, the fruits of his Spirit, truth, and love, and joy; then we might be less anxious for ourselves; our course would be far smoother. What evil thoughts would not be withered and die long ere they could ripen into action, if the very air which we breathed were of such keen and heavenly purity! It is because all this is not so that we have need of so much watchfulness; it is because the faults of every one of us make our brethren's task harder; because there is not one bad or careless person among us who is not a hindrance in his brother's path, and does not oblige him to exert himself the more. Therefore, because the day is not bright, but overclouded, because it is but too like the night, and too many use it as the night for all works of darkness, let us take the more heed that we do not ourselves so mistake it; let us watch each of us the light within us, lest, indeed, we should wholly stumble; let us put on the Lord Jesus Christ. To put on Christ is a truer and fuller expression, by far, than if we had been told to put on truth, or holiness, or goodness. It includes all these, with something more, that nothing but itself can give—the sense of safety, and joy unspeakable, in feeling ourselves sheltered in our Saviour's arms, and taken even into himself. Assuredly, if we put on the Lord Jesus Christ, we shall not make provision for the flesh to fulfill the lusts thereof. T. A.

2. For "damnation" read "condemnation"; punishment for that disobedience, not eternal perdition, being meant. A.

1-7. It is conscientious subjection that is spoken of; free, willing, hearty; not forced or constrained. It is to proceed from respect to the authority enjoining obedience, and not from a mere dread of the consequences of disobedience. W. S.—Christianity sees in the body politic not an arbitrary human invention; in the magistracy, not a mere slavish creature of the sovereign will of the people, but a divine ordinance for the administration of eternal justice, which punishes evil and rewards good; for upholding the majesty of law; for maintaining order and security both of person and of property; and for promoting the public weal. The state is moral society resting on law; the Church, the same resting on the gospel. The one is necessarily limited and national; the other, catholic and universal. The former looks to temporal welfare; the latter, to eternal. But each promotes and protects the other. As to the particular form of government for a state the apostles give no directions. As all power and authority come from God, so also does the power of the civil government, be it an absolute or a limited monarchy or a republic, be it an aristocracy or a democracy. In virtue of its elevation above the temporal and earthly, Christianity may exist under all forms of civil government, and will always favor that which most corresponds to the historical relations and wants of a nation, and which is, therefore, relatively the best. Of course, however, in this point also, it tends steadily to improvement and to the highest possible perfection; to the abolition of hurtful laws and institutions and the introduction of good; to an organization under which the power is judiciously distributed, the rights of the individual as well as of the commonwealth best preserved, and the moral ends of the race most efficiently promoted and most surely attained. P. S.

Christianity refused to be mixed up with any political system, or to bind those who followed it down to any form of political union, as it had refused to bind them down to any particular form of religious union. Leaving itself perfectly free, it could therefore enter as a spirit of good into any form of government. All its fundamental ideas—the fatherhood of God, the brotherhood of all men in Christ, the equality of all men before God, the individual responsibility of every human soul, the surrender of all things for others, the one necessity of salvation for all alike, emperor and peasant—are spiritual ideas which bear an easy translation into political ideas, and which, gathering strength, have proved the ruin of many tyrannies. S. A. B.—Above and beneath all civil constitutions—the foundation of their stability, the dome of their protection, their corner-stone, their wall of defense, their genial and sheltering sky—is the religion and gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ. Virtue is loyalty. Goodness is patriotism. The best citizenship is the best Christianship. The best legislator is the truest and wisest man. Character is the strength of the state. They are the friends, the ornaments, the defenders of the country and its constitution, who will not swerve from its three original, immortal ideas—Faith, Freedom, Fraternity. F. D. H.

5. The subjection here required is not absolute and unlimited. In obeying the constituted authorities—thus runs the exhortation—a man should, properly speaking, obey God only, whose minister the magistrate is, and whose sword he bears. And hence obedience to an earthly ruler must be measured and limited by the obligation to the heavenly. P. S.—The limits of every duty must be determined by its reasons, and the only ones assigned here, or that can be assigned for submission to civil authority, are its tendency to do good; wherever therefore this shall cease to be the case, submission becomes absurd, having no longer any rational view. But at what time this evil shall be judged to have arrived, or what remedy it may be proper to apply, Christianity does not decide, but leaves to be determined by an appeal to natural reason and right. R. Hall.—No command to do anything morally wrong can be binding; nor can any which transcends the rightful authority of the power whence it emanates. What that rightful authority is must be determined by the institutions and laws of the land, or from prescription and usage, or from the nature and design of the office with which the magistrate is invested. The right of deciding on all these points, and determining where the obligation to obedience ceases, and the duty of resistance begins, must, from the nature of the case, rest with the subject, and not with the ruler. The apostles and early Christians decided this for themselves, and did not leave the decision with the Jewish or Roman authorities. Like all other questions of duty, it is to be decided on our responsibility to God and our fellow-men. C. H.

8-10. The whole sum of the law is love; love to God and love to man; these two contain all, and the former of the two contains the latter; love to God is the only true principle and spring of all due love to man, and all love that begins there returns thither likewise and ends there. The engaging the whole mind and soul to the love of God does not engross it so that there should be no kind of love communicable to man; on the contrary, it is to refine it that it may flow forth the purer and better. All love should be once called in to God, to be sublimated and purified there, and then set in its right channel and motion, so as man be loved in him and for him; and so to love man is to love God, that love taking its rise from him and terminating in him; and in this circle is the proper motion of celestial divine love. L.

This love is exercised in obedience to the authority of God's word. It is a principle, not merely a feeling; it is cultivated and exercised as a duty, not yielded to merely as a generous instinct; it is a submission to God's command, not merely an indulgence of constitutional tenderness. J. A. J.—Remember that love fulfils obedience, and does not abolish it any more than faith abolishes the law; that he who loves obeys joyfully, but still obeys; that he obeys better than before, but still obeys. Nothing, no attainments of the spiritual life, however sublime, can abolish obedience; and the spiritual life can not be advancing when obedience is on the decline. The proof of progress is better obedience. A. V.—Love as obligatory is the law of our being. In substance, and as expressing his inmost nature, Love is the one imperative word uttered by God in the Bible. It is also the one imperative word uttered by Him through the constitution and conscience of man, and in the coincidence of these two utterances we find a perfect proof that both are from Him. Law and love! These are the two mightiest forces in the universe. Law is stern, majestic, and the fountain of all order. Love is mild, winning, the fountain of all rational spontaneity, that is, of the spontaneity that follows rational choice. Love without law is capricious, weak, mischievous; opposed to law, it is wicked. Law without love is unlovely. The highest harmony of the universe is in the love of a rational being that is coincident with the law of that being rationally affirmed; and the deepest possible jar and discord is from the love, persistent and utter, of such a being in opposition to his law. It is because there is in the Divine Being this harmony of law with love that He is perfect. It is because this harmony is required in the divine government that that is perfect, and no philosophy for the regulation of human conduct can be both vital and safe in which that same union is not consummated. M. H.

9. The term neighbor includes every creature of God that needeth a blessing and can be blessed. Thus doth Christianity set the heart of man to throbbing along with the heart of everlasting love, in behalf of all that wear his form, and circulate life currents filled by the same heavenly Father. Thus does it create a spirit in man which sends him abroad with both hands full of all that can bless and endow human existence. Under the gospel, man is not all inhumanity to man. Heart does meet heart; does warm and grieve at the call of sorrow and need; if another be burdened, feels itself the pressure; if he be delivered, exults in the emancipation. White.

11. Our salvation nearer. The best thoughts we can have about the future life are thoughts that make us better men now—more fit to live under the eye of God, and in daily intercourse with our neighbors, just where we are—kinder and purer at home, more just and honorable in business, more reverent and humble in prayer, more charitable in our judgments of each other. Unless we are very thoughtless indeed, there can not fail to be a strong and salutary influence breathing on us continually by remembering this: that we are so near, one day's march nearer every night, to a world that is all love and all life, without selfishness and without death, and that world eternal. The prospect itself, if we realized it, would shed some new sanctity over the life we are living. F. D. H.

12. The night. A picture of the Christian's present state. In comparison with other men he is in broad day; and so he is in comparison with his own former condition. But here the apostle is not thinking of other men, nor looking back to our own natural state: he is looking forward; he has a glorious eternity in view; and as he contemplates that, he feels that he and his fellow-believers are all still in darkness, that night with its shadows is still overspreading them. The day. Brightness and beauty and happiness are all connected in our minds with the word, and all the pleasant visions the word calls up in our minds are embodied and realized in heaven. Now this day, the apostle says, is near: "The night is far spent, the day is at hand." He speaks like a man who has long felt himself benighted in the world, and who sees at last the morning breaking. "Now," he says in the preceding verse, "is our salvation nearer than when we believed," than when we first believed; time has brought it nearer. He looks on himself and his fellow-believers as standing on the very verge of God's kingdom. C. B.

Holiness, under the name of light, is by the apostle spoken of as the Christian's armor. Put on, saith he, the armor of light, in opposition to the works of darkness. Strange armor! that a man may see through. A good man's armor is, that he needs none: his armor is an open breast. Likeness to God is armor of proof, that is, an imitation of him in his moral goodness, which holiness as a general name comprehends. A person truly like God is secure from any external violence, so far as that it shall never be able to invade his spirit. He is in spirit far raised above the tempestuous, stormy region, and converses where winds and clouds have no place. Hove.

13. It is a common saying that the night is without shame, and this is in a measure true; for men often do those things in the night which they fear to do in the day, lest their acts should be discovered and they brought to shame and punishment. Therefore the apostle says, Let us walk honestly as in the day. Luther.

14. What is the wedding garment? Some say it is the imputed righteousness of Christ, some that it is the imparted righteousness of Christ, others that it is holiness of character. I consider it to consist of all three together. "Putting on the Lord Jesus Christ" is possessing his righteousness imputed, his holiness imparted, and his example imitated. He first makes the robe, and then fits us to wear it. R. Hill.—Dress relates to the form or figure of the body, character to the form or figure of the soul—it is, in fact, the dress of the soul. On the ground of this analogy it is that the Scriptures so frequently make use of dress to signify what lies in character, and represent character, in one way or another, as being the dress of the soul. As character is the soul's dress, and dress analogical to character, whatever has power to produce a character when received is represented as a dress to be put on. Thus Paul, conceiving Christ to be the soul's new dress, or what is nowise different, its new character, says, "Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ." Christ is to be a complete wardrobe for us himself, and that by simply receiving his person we are to have the holy texture of his life upon us, and live in the infolding of his character. We must put on Christ himself, and none but him. We must put him on just as he is, wear him outside, walk in him, bear his reproach, glory in his beauty, call it good to die with him, so to be found in him, not having our own righteousness, but the righteousness that is of God by faith. Cover us in it, O thou Christ of God, and let our shame be hid eternally in thee. H. B.

Make not provision for the flesh. Once in Christ, your necessary care for this natural life will be regulated and moderated by the Spirit. And for all unlawful desires of the flesh you shall be rid of providing for these. Instead of all provision for the life of the flesh in that sense, there is another guest and another life for you now to wait on and furnish for. L.—When Christ is really put on, the world falls off, and the lusts of property, and fame, and power, and appetite, subside or fall away. The effect runs both ways under the great law of action and reaction—as the old man is put off that the new may be put on, so the new put on still further displaces the old. And so if there be any overmastering temptation which baffles you, and keeps turning you off in your endeavors, and boasting itself against you, here is your deliverance—raise no fight with it in your own will, as you always have done when you have failed, but simply turn yourself to Christ alone: let your soul be covered in by the power of his grace upon you. H. B.

Section 255.

ROMANS xiv. 1-23.

- 1 HIM that is weak in the faith receive ye, but not to doubtful disputations. For one be-2 lieveth that he may eat all things: another, who is weak, eateth herbs. Let not him that 3 eateth despise him that eateth not; and let not him which eateth not judge him that eateth:
 4 for God hath received him. Who art thou that judgest another man's servant? to his own master he standeth or falleth. Yea, he shall be holden up: for God is able to make him 5 stand. One man esteemeth one day above another: another esteemeth every day alike.
 6 Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind. He that regardeth the day, regardeth it unto the Lord; and he that regardeth not the day, to the Lord he doth not regard it.
 He that eateth, eateth to the Lord, for he giveth God thanks; and he that eateth not, to the Lord he eateth not, and giveth God thanks.
- 7 For none of us liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself. For whether we live, we 8 live unto the Lord; and whether we die, we die unto the Lord: whether we live therefore,
 9 or die, we are the Lord's. For to this end Christ both died, and rose, and revived, that he 10 might be Lord both of the dead and living. But why dost thou judge thy brother? or why dost thou set at naught thy brother? for we shall all stand before the judgment seat of 11 Christ. For it is written, As I live, saith the Lord, every knee shall bow to me, and every 12 tongue shall confess to God. So then every one of us shall give account of himself to God.
 13 Let us not therefore judge one another any more: but judge this rather, that no man put a 14 stumblingblock or an occasion to fall in his brother's way. I know, and am persuaded by the Lord Jesus, that there is nothing unclean of itself; but to him that esteemeth any thing 15 to be unclean, to him it is unclean. But if thy brother be grieved with thy meat, now 16 walkest thou not charitably. Destroy not him with thy meat, for whom Christ died. Let 17 not then your good be evil spoken of: for the kingdom of God is not meat and drink; but 18 righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost. For he that in these things serveth 19 Christ is acceptable to God, and approved of men. Let us therefore follow after the things 20 which make for peace, and things wherewith one may edify another. For meat destroy not the work of God. All things indeed are pure; but it is evil for that man who eateth 21 with offence. It is good neither to eat flesh, nor to drink wine, nor any thing whereby thy 22 brother stumbleth, or is offended, or is made weak. Hast thou faith? have it to thyself before God. Happy is he that condemneth not himself in that thing which he alloweth.
 23 And he that doubteth is damned if he eat, because he eateth not of faith: for whatsoever is not of faith is sin.

We want this bond of unity between the dead and the living to throw a purifying and ennobling influence into our present daily life, to save it from sinking, as our life is so terribly tempted to, into a besotted mammonism, an insane frivolity, or a miserable selfishness; to make it a noble and ever more perfect preparation for what is to come. We want this constant "power" of a practical connection between the two worlds, to keep the present from being a mere carnival of the senses, a place to eat and dress and sleep in, as well as to keep the future from being a sentimental phantasy or a dead blank. We are tempted hourly—nobody denies it—to unclean transactions, to covetousness and bad temper, to envying and evil speaking, to indolence, impatience, and unbelief. Now, one of the great powers by which we are to struggle against these successfully, and finally overcome, is the certainty of a day when Christ—who is life to those that love him, and whose eyes are like a flame of fire to those that are untrue to him and unrighteous to each other—shall appear. The new man in him is to be put on immediately. Even in these self-seeking earthly streets the Christian is to walk unselfishly and unblamably, his pride humbled, his temper controlled, his motives godly. Whatever is done in word or deed is to be done in the name and spirit of the Lord Jesus, risen from the dead, by those that are on the way to meet him. F. D. H.

- 1-6. Those Christians who still cling to superstitious distinctions between meats and days should be treated with indulgence by the more enlightened, and all should treat each other with charity, and
- forbear from condemning one another, whether Jews or Gentiles, since Christ had received both into his favor as their common Lord. C.
3. Let not him that eateth despise him that eateth not. That is to say, beware of the fancied superiority to the weaknesses and narrowness of your more scrupulous brother which is prone to creep into the hearts of the more liberal and strong. It may be that what you call over-scrupulous timidity is the fruit of a more earnest Christian principle than yours, and that what you call in yourself freedom from foolish scruples is only the result of a less sensitive conscience, not of a more robust Christianity. Let not him which eateth not judge him that eateth. Judge not from the height of your superior self-denial your brother who allows himself what you avoid. Your besetting sin is self-righteous condemnation of those who perhaps, after all, are wiser as well as wider than you, and who in their strength may be able to walk as near to God on a road which to you would be full of perils. Let us all remember, besides, that a thing which to ourselves is no weight may yet be right for us to forsake out of true and tender brotherly regard to others who, weaker than we, or perhaps more conscientious than we, could not do the same thing without damaging their spirits and weakening their Christian life. "Him that is weak in the faith receive." Him that is weak in the faith help. And in all these matters indifferent, which are weights to one and not weights to another, let us remember, first, for ourselves, that a weight retained is a sin; and let us remember, next, for others, that they stand not by our experience, but their own; and that we are neither to judge their strength nor to offend their weakness. A. M.

4. It was well and wisely said by Augustine that they were most likely to be uncharitable toward error who had never learned by their own experience how hard it was to arrive at truth. They who are so happy as to have arrived at truth, whose hearts and minds have been opened to receive the wisdom which is from God, they know how many are the ways to error on either side; how truth is for ever mixed with error, and error with truth; and they would rather dwell thankfully on that truth which their neighbor holds than be extreme to note his errors. T. A.

5. Persuaded in his own mind. Man must deny his self-will, but only in order to regain his will in a sanctified and refined state, which he subordinates only to that of God, that he may be the organ of the divine will, which is the only true freedom of a created spirit. But whoever denies his own will, in order to become the will-less organ of another man, denies the image of God in the dignity of his own free personality, turns himself from being a free servant of God into a servant of man, and gives to the creature the honor due to God alone. Every Christian must be a living organ of the Deity, a temple of the Holy Ghost, one taught of God, acknowledging only one Lord and Master. N.—Men are for ever acting without being fully persuaded in their own mind; and that in various ways. The mischief of this is great and manifold. It makes men either, as so many are, wholly without depth and earnestness—living and acting, as it were, quite at random, and without an interest in anything but their own comfort or enjoyment—or else it makes them obstinate and unjust, persisting doggedly in their own ways and their own notions, without being able to render the least reason for either; or, lastly, it makes them insincere and sophistical, beguiling themselves and others with a show of reason, attacking other men's opinions and maintaining their own. It is evident that there must be attained a state of mind where men could be fixed and earnest, yet not obstinate or unreasonable, having opinions and principles dear to them as their very life's blood, and yet being all the while fair and teachable, ready to hear and to be convinced, and to make all just allowance for others. And this state would be his and his only, who, according to the apostle's words, was to be fully persuaded in his own mind. T. A.

Another external hindrance which deterred the heathen from Christianity was the variety of opinions and sects into which Christians were divided. "How can we look for truth among you," they said, "since you are not of one mind among yourselves about your religion?" Chrysostom thus replies to this objection: "If we professed to follow human reasonings, thou mightest be perplexed; but if we say that we believe the Scripture, and this is simple and true, thou mayest easily come to a decision. Whoever agrees with it, he is a Christian; whoever opposes it, he is very far from being one." The heathen rejoins: "But if some one comes and says, This stands in Scripture, but thou sayest something different; and so the Scripture is interpreted arbitrarily, and our minds are distracted." "But hast thou not reason and the power of judgment given thee by God?" is Chrysostom's reply. N.

6. The Christianized Jew, though he admitted that "Christ is the end of the law to every one that believeth," that in Him all the scattered rays of type and prophecy converge and are for ever lost—yea, rather, are fixed and eternalized—yet still could not resist his tendency to preserve some fragments of the old preparatory creed, and incorporate them into the spiritual religion of Christ. The abstinence from peculiar meats, the observance of peculiar days, and others of the formal traditions of the synagogue, he was loth altogether to resign, though he could not altogether justify. W. A. B.

7. None liveth to himself. God never meant religion to terminate on itself. He enlightens to enable us to shine, and we very much doubt if there be any force in all nature, or any gift or any work of God, that is self-contained or non-communicative. Certainly he is not, for he is always giving to all. Not so his Son, who said, "It is more blessed to give than to receive"; not so the Holy Ghost, who is ever giving light and joy and peace; not the angels, who are all ministering spirits sent forth to minister to the heirs of salvation. Nor in nature do we find anything great shut up in self. Not the sun, or moon, or stars, whose beams fill every land; not the sea, whose broad expanse gives forth the vapors that water the earth; not the rivers, that give back their gathered wealth to the sea; not the land, that gives its harvests; not the air, that forms the vital breath of all things. And when God shines into man's heart to give the light of his glory, shall man hide the light? This were to convert into a possession what God ties up as a trust, and bids us use for the creature's good. J. Hall.—That which a man is—that sum total made up of the items of his beliefs, purposes, affections, tastes, and habits, manifested in all he does and does not—is contagious in its tendency, and is ever photographing itself on other spirits. He himself may be as unconscious of this emanation of good or evil from his character as he is of the contagion of disease from his body, or, if that were equally possible, of the contagion of good health. But the fact, nevertheless, is certain. If the light is in him, it must shine; if darkness reigns, it must shade; if he glows with love, it will radiate its warmth; if he is frozen with selfishness, the cold will chill the atmosphere around him; and if corrupt and vile, he will poison it. Nor is it possible for any one to occupy a neutral or indifferent position. In some form or other he must affect others. N. M.

8. They, and they only, live unto the Lord who realize his authority and do everything he enjoins, as an act of willing and cheerful obedience, as a part of that homage they owe to their Master, who make his approbation their governing aim, and his glory their supreme end in all that they do, and who are wholly resigned to his wise, righteous, and loving disposal. R. W.—We are no more to die to ourselves than to live to ourselves. Our Lord Jesus hath purchased to himself a dominion over both states, of the living and dead; and, whether we live, we must live to him, or die, we must die to him. It is the glory of a Christian to live so much above the world that nothing in it may make him either fond of life or weary of it. Howe.—Unto him, as Christians, we are called upon to live; he who is the principle of our spiritual life is also made the object of it. Unto him, as Christians, we are called upon to die; he who died for us is made the object of our death likewise, that, as "our life is hid with Christ in God," so, "when he who is our life shall appear, then we also may appear with him in glory." No reserve is admitted in the statement of our profession. We live and die to Christ; our whole nature, in all its aspects and positions, is offered to him as one solemn and perpetual sacrifice. "Bought with a price," we are delivered to him as his own spiritual property in this world; "we are Christ's, and Christ is God's"—so that, as it were, through him, as man, we pass into the very presence of the supreme divinity, enter within the verge of that ineffable nature with which he connects us, and catch upon our weak and shivering humanity the beams of the everlasting light of God! W. A. B.

9. Lord of dead and living. How strikingly, with a single touch, is the glory of Christ here pictured to us! No dominion can be imagined which in extent surpasses his. Even the mightiest monarch, although he had at last conquered the whole world, yet only sways his scepter over the living. The dominion of Christ embraces not only the visible world but also the invisible; it is one and the same law which is obeyed on this side of the grave and on yonder. His right to reign over both is founded on this double and irrevocable fact of his death and resurrection. Van O.

10. While each should enjoy his own opinion, and turn neither to the right hand nor to the left in the discharge of duty, he will find it no part of his duty to condemn those who may not be able to see as he does; no part of his duty, for things not essential, to set at nought and judge his brethren, because both he and they are equally answerable to the Judge of all. R. T.

We shall all stand. Earth must fade away from our eyes, and we must anticipate that great and solemn truth which we shall not fully understand until we stand before God in judgment; that to us there are but two beings in the whole world—God and ourselves. The sympathy of others, the pleasant voice, the glad eye, the smiling countenance, the thrilling heart, which at present are our very life—all will be away from us when Christ comes in judgment. Every one will have to think of himself. Every eye shall see him; every heart will be full of him. He will speak to every one; and every one will be rendering to him his own account. Newman.—God governs this world, governs you and me, down to the very depths of our being. And we possess the power of choosing right and wrong: right by the grace of God, and wrong by our failing to use that grace; and as responsible for such a power we shall be summoned at last before the judgment-seat of Christ. Abp. Thomson.

12. Woe to you if you do what others think right, instead of obeying the dictates of your own conscience! woe to you if you allow authority, or prescription, or fashion, or influence, or any other human thing, to interfere with that awful and sacred thing—your own responsibility! “Every man,” said the apostle, “must give an account of himself to God.”

14. “To him that esteemeth anything to be unclean, to him it is unclean.” In other words, whatever may be the abstract merits of the question—however in God’s jurisprudence any particular act may stand—to you, thinking it to be wrong, it manifestly is wrong, and your conscience will gather round it a stain of guilt if you do it. F. W. R.

15. Destroy not. How destroy him? Evidently by inducing him, through force of example, to do what his conscience condemned. This abstinence to which the strong Christian should submit for the sake of the weak, however, was not to be perpetual. When there was no danger of his doing injury to his weak brother, the stronger and more enlightened Christian was free to act as he pleased.

16. Let not your good be evil spoken of. In one sense it is impossible to avoid such evil speaking. The best deeds of the best Christians may be misrepresented, and their kindest actions may be attributed to the meanest, if not the worst, motives. Paul and his fellow-laborers in the gospel had an ample experience of such speaking at the hands of those who “falsely accused their good conversation in Christ.” These words, therefore, must refer to evil speaking of a different sort. They teach that a Christian must not use what is good in itself, or what may be good to him, in such a manner, or under such circumstances, as to give occasion of evil speaking in regard to it. In the enjoyment of those good things which God has placed within his reach, he must take heed that he does not bring reproach on his good confession. The rule is one which is neither hard to be understood nor difficult of application, if he has a simple and honest desire above all things to please the Lord. And if Christian people would keep this brief precept in mind, they would be saved from much of the perplexity which they sometimes profess to feel in regard to various popular or fashionable amusements. Forsyth.

17. Earnest desire of holiness is holiness in the germ thereof. Soon shalt thou know, if only thou wilt follow on to know, the Lord. But sanctity is not the work of a day, but of a life. Growth in grace is subject to the same law of gradual and imperceptible advance as growth in nature. Be but true to your convictions. Do but follow the instigations of the Spirit. Follow him in darkness and light, through honor and dishonor, through evil report and good report, and in due time the new creation shall dawn within thee, and the fair fabric of God’s spiritual kingdom shall be built up step by step—“righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost.” E. M. G.

19. It is the ordinance of God that Christians should be often asserting the things of God to each other, and that by their so doing they should edify one another. Church-fellowship, rightly managed, is the glory of all the world. No place, no community, no fellowship is adorned with such beauties as is a church rightly knit together to their head, and lovingly serving one another. Bun.

20, 21. There are some things which are right or wrong in themselves. They depend on the positive enactments of God and on the eternal distinctions of things, and can not be compromised, modified, or disregarded. There are other things, however, which may be regarded as matters of personal comfort, convenience, or gratification. They are clearly right in themselves, but they may be so connected, or there may be such associations in regard to them, or others may entertain such views of them, that indulgence in them by us will be an injury to others. It may shock or pain them as if we were doing wrong; or, acting on our example, they may be led further than we would go, and fall into sin; or they may be led by our example to do that which they now regard as sin, and which would be sin to them. In such a case the course which we are to pursue becomes clear, and it is good neither to eat flesh, nor to drink wine, nor anything whereby a brother is offended, or is made weak. A. B.

There is no self-denial deserving the name that is not willing to give up any privilege of the palate or the passions rather than endanger the least or lowest of God’s children. And then, if it is demanded, “Why should I be deprived of the lawful use of some agreeable thing merely because some less guarded, less experienced, or less coolly constituted neighbor will abuse it?” we will leave the ground of justice altogether and come upon that of magnanimity and of privilege. We will ask, not what we have a right to do, but what is to be gladly chosen because it is right to be done. In the estimates of God and eternity, the generosity that shields a human heart from shame will stand above a genial style of hospitality. Not till comfort shall become the creed of Christendom, can free living be the testimony of faith. . . . Too little, too little, will there appear in that day of any positive achievements of ours for God and his truth, proportioned to our opportunity. But at least let it not be found that, when some frail fellow-creature was inclining to baseness and to ruin, any frivolity or unconcern of ours made his downward way easier and swifter; or, if any other soul was struggling up into light and victory, that our faithlessness discouraged him, our inconsistencies confused him, our self-love drew him back.

22. Hast thou faith? have it to thyself.

There is no impersonal character, no pardon by proxy, no collective salvation. The work is for each. "Repent" is for each. "Take up the cross and come after me," is for each. The apostolic view of practical Christianity as a "calling" individualizes, first, the Christian principle as having a place distinct from all other principles, and, secondly, individualizes the Christian life as having all its awful obligations, its joys and sanctions, centered upon each personal conscience and heart. F. D. H.

23. For "damned," "condemned." In hardly any place where this terrible word is used is its use justified, or is the meaning to be referred to a future life. A.—The very duties of religion, if self be the soul of them, are nothing but guilt. Where there is faith, there is humility; but where there is not faith, there is nothing but pride and self-deceit.

Therefore, whatsoever is not of faith is sin. G. B. C.
—He that doubteth. In every undertaking our first care should be to have a clear conscience. Rectitude is a sacred and awful thing; and, as its eternal laws should never be despised by open and deliberate transgression, so the very possibility of invading them by rashness and imprudence should fill us with constant vigilance and unceasing caution. J. H. T.—Misgivings and doubts and scruples are intended to make us think, but not to make us waste all our energy on thinking; they are intended to make us pause, but not to make us stop; they are intended to make us repent, but not to make us give up everything else to fruitless sorrow. And if we can not attain peace or light all at once, we must not, for all that, complain, lag, or despair; we must simply obey and wait. F. T.

Section 256.

ROMANS XV. 1-33.

1 WE then that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, and not to please our-
2 selves. Let every one of us please his neighbour for his good to edification. For even 3 Christ pleased not himself; but, as it is written, The reproaches of them that reproached
4 thee fell on me. For whatsoever things were written aforetime were written for our learn-5 ing, that we through patience and comfort of the scriptures might have hope. Now the God of patience and consolation grant you to be likeminded one toward another according 6 to Christ Jesus: that ye may with one mind and one mouth glorify God, even the Father 7 of our Lord Jesus Christ. Wherefore receive ye one another, as Christ also received us to 8 the glory of God. Now I say that Jesus Christ was a minister of the circumcision for the 9 truth of God, to confirm the promises made unto the fathers: and that the Gentiles might 10 glorify God for his mercy; as it is written, For this cause I will confess to thee among the 11 Gentiles, and sing unto thy name. And again he saith, Rejoice, ye Gentiles, with his peo-12 ple. And again, Praise the Lord, all ye Gentiles; and laud him, all ye people. And again, 13 Esaias saith, There shall be a root of Jesse, and he that shall rise to reign over the Gentiles; 14 in him shall the Gentiles trust. Now the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing, that ye may abound in hope, through the power of the Holy Ghost.

14 And I myself also am persuaded of you, my brethren, that ye also are full of goodness, 15 filled with all knowledge, able also to admonish one another. Nevertheless, brethren, I 16 have written the more boldly unto you in some sort, as putting you in mind, because of the 17 grace that is given to me of God, that I should be the minister of Jesus Christ to the 18 Gentiles, ministering the gospel of God, that the offering up of the Gentiles might be ac-19 ceptable, being sanctified by the Holy Ghost. I have therefore whereof I may glory through 20 Jesus Christ in those things which pertain to God. For I will not dare to speak of any of 21 those things which Christ hath not wrought by me, to make the Gentiles obedient, by word
22 and deed, through mighty signs and wonders, by the power of the Spirit of God; so that 23 from Jerusalem, and round about unto Illyricum, I have fully preached the gospel of Christ.
24 Yea, so have I strived to preach the gospel, not where Christ was named, lest I should build 25 upon another man's foundation: but as it is written, To whom he was not spoken of, they 26 shall see: and they that have not heard shall understand. For which cause also I have been 27 much hindered from coming to you. But now having no more place in these parts, and 28 having a great desire these many years to come unto you; whensoever I take my journey into Spain, I will come to you: for I trust to see you in my journey, and to be brought on 29 my way thitherward by you, if first I be somewhat filled with your company. But now I 30 go unto Jerusalem to minister unto the saints. For it hath pleased them of Macedonia and Achaia to make a certain contribution for the poor saints which are at Jerusalem. It hath 27 pleased them verily; and their debtors they are. For if the Gentiles have been made partakers of their spiritual things, their duty is also to minister unto them in carnal things.

 28 When therefore I have performed this, and have sealed to them this fruit, I will come by 29 you into Spain. And I am sure that, when I come unto you, I shall come in the fulness 30 of the blessing of the gospel of Christ. Now I beseech you, brethren, for the Lord Jesus Christ's sake, and for the love of the Spirit, that ye strive together with me in your prayers 31 to God for me; that I may be delivered from them that do not believe in Judæa; and that 32 my service which I have for Jerusalem may be accepted of the saints; that I may come unto 33 you with joy by the will of God, and may with you be refreshed. Now the God of peace be with you all. Amen.

SELF-PLEASING always tends to meanness of character. It is clean against all that we understand by nobleness, magnanimity, courage, honor. It is against all the public virtues, such as patriotism, benevolence, and the charities of life. It always inflicts injury and misery upon others. Self-pleasing is enormously difficult to the self that is always seeking to be pleased, so difficult as to be ultimately quite impossible of realization. More and yet more must be had, until more is not to be had. Better and yet better, and, alas! better will not come. And Christian people ought to be constantly and watchfully on their guard against this thing. There is, absolutely, no one whom it will not beset. The vivacious will have it presented to them in forms of excitement and amusement, which, if indulged in, will draw them away from the important duties of daily life, as well as from some of the severer duties of Christian service. The quiet and retiring will have it presented to them in forms of sloth and ease—they will think that it can injure no one, and no precious interest, that they should take their rest. The busy will have it presented to them in the forms of avarice, and ambition, and fame, and honor; in fact, all the vices and all the faults are but different dresses which that protean character, the old self, puts on as it goes up and down the world, murmuring, "We ought to please ourselves!" Beware! brother; sister; young disciple; old disciple—beware! lest, unwittingly, ye fall into that soft and easy habit of pleasing self. Please the higher self and welcome. Please your conscience. Please the love that lies sleeping in you, deep, and vast, and far. Please the powers, and the sensibilities, and the activities of the Christian life; and then, not you alone, but angels and God himself, will be pleased. But as to pleasing that other self, that second you, that meaner creature you sometimes find yourself lapsing into, all danger and all soul-death lie that way. It is surely no irreverence to follow the figure that has been given us, and say, "Let that man be crucified." Put fresh nails into the hands and the feet. Pierce that cold black heart with the soldier's spear. The dear Christ died in his love and purity, and rose again, and revived, that that dark man of sin might die for ever. A. R.

1. The world abounds in wretchedness which can neither help itself nor make compensation for the help of others, and which appeals for relief to those who are able to render it. Here we have the law of unrequited or gratuitous service—the strong must serve the weak. Human need creates a lien on the ability to relieve it. Every man is debtor, as much as in him is, to use his superior power, of whatever kind, in uncompensated service to those who need. And the greater the power to serve, the greater the proportion of this kind of service that is due—preëminent ability, preëminent service; greatness, great service. Here we reach the Christian principle of stewardship—that men hold property and all means of influence, not for selfish ends, but in trust for the advancement of Christ's kingdom and the promotion of the best interests of man. J. H.

The strong virtue that can go on its own way without being shaken by any ordinary temptation too often forgets the duty due to the weakness close to its side. By stern treatment of faults which were yet much struggled against, by cold refusal to acknowledge any except plainly successful efforts, by rejecting the approaches of those who have not yet learned the right way, but are really wishing in their secret hearts to learn it, those who are strong not unfrequently do much harm to those who are weak. F. T.

The ignorant and prejudiced, the contracted and infirm, generally expect that their weakness, ignorance, and infirmity (under other and of course finer names) are to give the law to the strong and to the free; and that no one ought to do either what they can not do or will not. Certainly it is the duty of the strong "to bear the infirmities of the weak, and not to please themselves"; but also it is the duty of the weak to become strong, and not to need to be pleased by being allowed the selfish luxury of putting restraints on the liberty of others. T. B. —Rather trying are the infirmities of the weak. Very tiresome is a continual touchiness in a neighbor, or the perpetual recurrence of the same faults in a pupil or a child. But if by self-restraint and right treatment God should enable you to cure those faults, from how much shame and sorrow do you rescue them, from how much suffering yourself!

In this form of effort there can never be total failure; in trying to cure the patient, the physician heals himself. In combating his bad temper, you are obliged to conquer your own; and, in order to expel from that other sullenness, self-indulgence, petulance, you are compelled to go to God, and beg for your own spirit a larger supply of sweetness, generosity, long-suffering, and all those noble radiant attributes which in the contest with depravity make the sun-like Christian more than conqueror. Hamilton.

2. "Good to edification" means good in the spiritual sense; the building up of the character in spiritual life. It is not that one Christian man is to yield to another simply because he wishes it. It is this: that a man in yielding must exercise an enlightened benevolence, and have a view to the real and lasting good of the person with whose desires, or wishes, or tastes, such compliance is made. And he, my neighbor, will see that I am yielding for Christ's sake. He will see that it is the yielding of strength; that it is the yielding of love, in which all strength lies; and that will be to him like a very presence of Christ, and will do more to correct his errors, and supply his deficiency, and corroborate his feebleness, than the clearest statements and the firmest reasonings can do. A. R.

3. Some of the Roman Christians considered the meat that had been offered to idols unfit for Christian use, while others of them could partake of it without scruple. But, not contented with enjoying their own liberty, they set themselves to indulge in mutual recrimination. The one class considered the other unconscientious, while these retorted on them as weak-minded. It is a quarrel that, in some shape, has turned up ever since. The apostle Paul belongs unmistakably to the one side, that which saw no conscience in the matter, but he is not devoured by a zeal to bring all to his own mind. He sees that there are things infinitely more important than uniformity. Charity is greater, and liberty. Those who can not eat must believe in the good faith of those who can, and they who have no scruples must refrain from taunting those who have. Then from the whole controversy he rises to this great principle, which lifts the thing out of the local and temporary, and gives it a world-wide and permanent interest. In our intercourse with our fellow-Christians or fellow-men, we are not to make our own pleasure, but the pleasure of our neighbor, our chief end. This is the example set by Christ, our great Master: "He pleased not himself." The violation of this principle has produced more unhappiness and sin than many other things that seem at first sight more deadly—has broken up the communion of the Church and the comfort of the social and family circle. Ker.

Even Christ. As the brightness of the Father's glory, he discloses the love of God appearing under human limitations in service and sacrifice. As the ideal man, he reveals in service and sacrifice the image of God perfected in human character. The character expressed and developed in loving service is the highest and noblest type of character. Jesus reveals the divine in the human, and the human in its ideal perfection. That ideal is found in his life of service; he came not to be ministered unto, but to minister. The conception of greatness by ministering is the conception of manly strength and power to serve, of resources given without impoverishment. So we assent to the words of Jesus, seeing therein our highest dignity: "It is enough for the disciple that he be as his Master, and the servant as his Lord." J. H.

4. The words should stand, "that through the patience and the comfort of the Scriptures we might have hope." The verse is sometimes read as if "patience" were one thing by itself, and "comfort of the Scriptures" another by itself. But the two go together: it is "patience of the Scriptures and comfort of the Scriptures," i. e., patience and comfort, both arising from the Scriptures, produced by their study. A.—The New Testament is to us and our successors the same precious inheritance its gospels and epistles and prophecies were to the first believers; with this only difference: that as prophecy gathers to fulfillment, as the shadowy outlines of prediction begin to fill and flush with the vivid colors of fact, the story of Christ the Redeemer and of the human heart as acted on by Christ—the Bible history of man—becomes still more authentic and still more valuable. Truly, "whatsoever things were written aforetime were written for our learning, that we, through patience and comfort of the Scriptures, might have hope." W. A. B.—We need no voice from heaven in order to make us happy. There is enough in the Bible to cause every heart in this wretched world to burn with joy. We are told of pardon for the guilty, sanctification for the polluted, rest for the burdened soul, salvation for the lost, Christ for a Comforter, heaven for a home. And we are told of these things for this express purpose: to give us consolation. C. B.

6. A grand end to live for. How many are the strong yet most tender, the common yet most sacred ties that bind us to it, no man can tell. We have more reason for living to God's glory than any angel has. He made us, has preserved us in life and provided for our wants; to us he has been merciful and gracious, besides being abundant in goodness and in truth—having borne with us, pitied us, spared us, loved us, and, not sparing his own Son, redeemed us, as well, by his gracious Spirit, and called us out of darkness into his marvelous light. And so the warmest love to God should burn in human breasts, and in the heavenly choir the highest notes should be sung, not by angels, but those whom Jesus has redeemed to God by his blood out of every kindred, and nation, and people, and tongue. T. G.

13. We rejoice because our future is filled with hope—the hope of the glory of God. Joy comes then from hope; hope from the God of love; hope sure and steadfast; hope that maketh not ashamed; everlasting hope. Glory is ours in prospect—the glory of the new heavens and earth, the glory of resurrection, the glory of the kingdom, the very glory of Christ. And it is all ours, simply as those who have known and believed this free love of God. Hence the apostle's prayer, "The God of (the) hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing." Bonar.—There is "peace in believing." To the man of intelligent, heartfelt, yet childlike faith in the testimony of Jesus Christ, the principles and promises of that testimony are what the facts of nature are to the philosopher—absolute certainties, in which the mind may rest. He never is the subject of doubt, while his views of things are conformed to the disclosures of this testimony, and his feeling and course are in harmony with its requirements. In resting upon this word as the ultimate ground of certainty, in taking from it his ends, his rules, his motives, his encouragements—all the powers and elements of his nature work in harmony with each other; his conscience, his intellect, and his heart draw together. What the mind perceives to be taught here as true, conscience approves as right, and the heart loves as good. The man has never yet been found who felt that he was doing wrong in submitting himself in a spirit of implicit faith to the truth of Jesus Christ. His submission has always been the source of his peace; a peace as deep and refreshing and satisfying as his faith has been strong and decided. E. M.

16. The apostle represents himself as "acting the part of a priest in reference to the gospel of Christ," and in the exercise of this office laying on the altar of God the converted Gentiles as a sacrifice acceptable to God. In plain language, the design of his apostleship was, that the Gentiles, being converted by the faith of the gospel through his instrumentality, and by the agency of the Holy Ghost, might devote themselves to God as his peculiar property. J. B.—The doctrine of Christ concerning the Holy Ghost (John 14-16) can be no other than this: that, after the body of Jesus should be removed from the Church, he should still continue to carry on the spiritual work of renewing, sanctifying, and saving souls—which is his eternal ministry—the Church itself thus becoming the body of his Spirit, that visible, but he indwelling, yet manifest still in the fruits of holy love and life; that, in thus acting on the spirits of believers in answer to prayer, the Son and the Father who sent him are together united in counsel and one in purpose; and that the agent by which they thus move and draw and change the heart is the Holy Spirit, but also known as the Comforter, the Paraclete, the Spirit of truth, and the Holy Ghost. F. D. H.

19. "So that from Jerusalem, and round about unto Illyricum, I have fully preached the gospel of Christ." These words import that Paul had come to the confines of Illyricum, and that these confines were the external boundary of his travels. Paul considers Jerusalem as the center, and is here viewing the circumference to which his travels had extended. Illyricum was the part of this circle which he mentions in an epistle to the Romans, because it lay in a direction from Jerusalem toward that city, and pointed out to the Roman readers the nearest place to them to which his travels from Jerusalem had brought him. Illyricum adjoins upon Macedonia. If, therefore, Paul traversed the whole country of Macedonia, the route would necessarily bring him to the confines of Illyricum, and these confines would be described as the extremity of his journey. The account of Paul's second visit to the peninsula of Greece is contained in Acts 20 : 2. Paley.

24. Into Spain. Clement, the disciple of Paul, mentioned Phil. 4 : 8, writing from Rome to Corinth, expressly asserts that Paul had preached the gospel "in the east and in the west"; that "he had instructed the whole world [i. e., the Roman Empire, which was commonly so called] in righteousness"; and that he "had gone to the extremity of the west" before his martyrdom. Now, in a Roman author, the extremity of the west could mean nothing short of Spain, and the expression is often used by Roman writers to denote Spain. Here, then, we have the express testimony of Paul's own disciple that he fulfilled his original intention of visiting the Spanish peninsula, and consequently that he was liberated from his first imprisonment at Rome. ROMANS xvi. 1-27.

1 I COMMEND unto you Phebe our sister, which is a servant of the church which is at Cen-
2 chrea : that ye receive her in the Lord, as becometh saints, and that ye assist her in whatsoever business she hath need of you : for she hath been a succourer of many, and of myself
3 also. Greet Priscilla and Aquila, my helpers in Christ Jesus : who have for my life laid 4 down their own necks : unto whom not only I give thanks, but also all the churches of the 5 Gentiles. Likewise greet the church that is in their house. Salute my wellbeloved Epæne-
6 tus, who is the firstfruits of Achaia unto Christ. Greet Mary, who bestowed much labour 7 on us. Salute Andronicus and Junia, my kinsmen, and my fellowprisoners, who are of note among the apostles, who also were in Christ before me.

8 Greet Amplias my beloved in the Lord. Salute Urbane, our helper in Christ, and Stachys
10 my beloved. Salute Apelles approved in Christ. Salute them which are of Aristobulus'
11 household. Salute Herodion my kinsman. Greet them that be of the household of Nar-12 cissus, which are in the Lord. Salute Tryphena and Tryphosa, who labour in the Lord.
13 Salute the beloved Persis, which laboured much in the Lord. Salute Rufus chosen in the 14 Lord, and his mother and mine. Salute Asyncritus, Phlegon, Hermas, Patrobas, Hermes, 15 and the brethren which are with them. Salute Philologus, and Julia, Nereus, and his sis-16 ter, and Olympas, and all the saints which are with them. Salute one another with an holy 17 kiss. The churches of Christ salute you. Now I beseech you, brethren, mark them which 18 cause divisions and offences contrary to the doctrine which ye have learned ; and avoid 19 them. For they that are such serve not our Lord Jesus Christ, but their own belly ; and by 20 good words and fair speeches deceive the hearts of the simple. For your obedience is come abroad unto all men. I am glad therefore on your behalf : but yet I would have you wise 21 unto that which is good, and simple concerning evil. And the God of peace shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. Amen.
22 Timotheus my workfellow, and Lucius, and Jason, and Sosipater, my kinsmen, salute you.
23 I Tertius, who wrote this epistle, salute you in the Lord. Gaius mine host, and of the 24 whole church, saluteth you. Erastus the chamberlain of the city saluteth you, and Quartus a brother.

24 The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen. Now to him that is of 25 power to stablish you according to my gospel, and the preaching of Jesus Christ, according 26 to the revelation of the mystery, which was kept secret since the world began, but now is made manifest, and by the scriptures of the prophets, according to the commandment of 27 the everlasting God, made known to all nations for the obedience of faith : to God only wise, be glory through Jesus Christ for ever. Amen.

In this Epistle is treated in the most masterly manner everything that belongeth to the Christian life. Whatever it most concerns a Christian to know : law, gospel, sin, grace, justification, Christ, God, good works, faith, hope, charity ; all wherein true Christianity consisteth ; how it becometh a Christian to conduct himself toward his neighbors, whether good or bad, strong or weak, friends or enemies, and toward himself—all this is to be found here in such perfection, that it is impossible to wish anything more or better. So rich a treasure is it of spiritual wealth, that even to him who has read it a thousand times something new will be ever presenting itself. Its study, beyond every other, is found useful ; and the longer and the more deeply it is pondered, its excellences grow upon you, and it appears to be constantly becoming more delightful, more valuable, and more copious than itself. Luther.

1-15. These chapters of salutations, which you perhaps have been wont to pass over at a bound as possessing no general interest, present a study as attractive as it is instructive, by enabling you to penetrate into the private life of the apostle and into his personal relations. Monod.—At the time when Paul wrote, there were many Christian laborers in the great city—men and women well known to the apostle, and beloved for the truth's sake, and for their work's sake. They do not seem to have been as yet organized in one church-body. So we read in this chapter of churches, or groups, in various private houses. D. F.

We see woman in the early church already in a position of trust and high usefulness: a position, let me observe, which she retains in the Roman Catholic communion to this day, in conjunction with various conditions opposed to Christian freedom and our Lord's commands, but which, owing to those conditions having been justly repudiated by the Reformed Churches, she has very generally lost among ourselves. One of the gravest problems of our own and of the coming age will be, to bring in female help to the work of the Church, and woman into an accredited position in her service, without any admixture of the "votal" element; without any permanent obligations to poverty, to what is called "obedience," to what is mistaken for "chastity." Another matter of interest in this chapter is the examples which it gives us of the refined delicacy and courtesy of the great apostle. "To whom not only I give thanks, but all the churches of the Gentiles"; "which were in Christ before me"; "Salute Rufus, the elect in the Lord, and his mother—and mine"; i. e., his mother, whom I also love as a son. Yet another point of interest is this. On the southern side of Rome, as you approach the gate now called the Porta San Sebastiano—not far from the Arch of Drusus, under which Paul passed as he entered the city with the brethren—is a garden containing the "columbarium" or "pigeon-house" of the "family" of Nero. These "columbaria" are so called from their containing a number of small recesses like pigeon-holes, in which are deposited the ashes of the dead, and that the "family" of a Roman prince or noble comprehended all who lived in his court, his relatives, freedmen, and slaves. And with thus much explanation, we may repeat the result of our own researches in the columbarium of the family of Nero. Among the names inscribed on the memorial tablets there, we found Tryphena (v. 12), Tryphosa (v. 12), Hermes (v. 14), Hermas (v. 14), and Junias (v. 7). A.

20. The whole history of the world is interwoven with the doings of him whom Scripture calls "the serpent," "the God of this world," "the wicked one," "the devil," "the prince of the power of the air," "the accuser of the brethren," "the adversary." He is a living person, originally connected with heaven, now with earth, once associated with angels, now with men, full of malice, a murderer and a liar, a deceiver. His dealings first with Eve and then with Christ are the two great specimens of his nature, his tactics, and his aims. The first promise announced a battle between him and the seed of the woman. This battle has been going on without intermission between him and Christ and between him and the members of Christ's body. With them it is warfare, with the rest of mankind it is friendship. The warfare has been fierce as well as long, open as well as secret, outward as well as inward. In all his assaults and stratagems he has to a certain extent succeeded, but always in the end been baffled. It is to this ultimate baffling or bruising that the apostle here alludes. Bonar.—With so many hints given us in the Holy Scriptures that we wrestle not with flesh and blood alone, but with angels and principalities and powers of darkness—that there are devices of Satan of which it becomes us not to remain ignorant—that the great adversary goeth about seeking whom he may devour; with the command laid upon us, Resist the devil, and he will flee from you; with the promise given, The Lord shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly; should we not be ever acting on the conviction that our souls are the sphere of an unseen conflict, in which rival spirits of evil are struggling for mastery? W. H.

The Victory of the God of Peace.—It is as the God of peace that he wins the victory for us, and bruises Satan under our feet. It is as the bruised one that he bruises. He whom Satan smote is he who smites Satan. The God of peace has made peace; and, having made peace by the blood of his Cross, he proceeds to destroy all that had once marred the peace, all his enemies and ours, giving us complete victory and triumph. It is on the basis of the reconciling blood, the peace-giving work on the Cross, that the operations against Satan are carried on. It is under the banner of the God of peace that we fight. He is our captain, and the peace which he has made is that which secures the victory to us. We overcome by the blood of the Lamb, the blood that has made our peace. Bonar.

21. These Epistles are extraordinary productions, and it is inconceivable that any man should introduce them into the world by the fiction of addressing them to a church, and should connect such admirable sentiments with the details of their peculiar difficulties, and with salutations addressed to many persons by name. Let any man read the last chapter of the Epistle to the Romans (which is almost entirely made up of greetings and salutations), and ask himself if it is possible that any man, writing a letter for the purpose of deception, could have written it. Observe his particularity. Not only does Paul himself salute many persons, but Timotheus, his work-fellow, is joined with him, and Lucius, and Jason, and Sosipater, his kinsman, and Tertius, who wrote the Epistle, and Gaius, his host, and Erastus, the chamberlain of the city, and Quartus, a brother. M. H.

26. For the obedience of faith. Faith and reason have their limits; where reason ends faith begins; and if reason will be encroaching upon the bounds of faith, she is straight taken captive by infidelity. We are not fit to follow Christ, if we have not denied ourselves; and the chief piece of ourselves is our reason. We must yield God able to do that which we can not comprehend; and we must comprehend that by our faith which is disclaimed by reason. Bp. H.

27. One can not but think that, as Tertius laid down the reed which he had used, the apostle took it into his own hand and added the sublime sentence of doxology with which the Epistle ends. God was able to establish the brethren according to Paul's gospel, which was something more than "the gospel of the kingdom," for it was a proclamation of the unseen Christ as the Saviour of the world. And, as in the gospel which Paul preached, and this wonderful Epistle which he has written, the divine wisdom is brightly displayed, the doxology is in these words: "To God only wise be glory through Jesus Christ for ever. Amen." D. F.—This peculiar doxology, at the close of such an Epistle, connecting such a song of praise with the steadfastness of the saints of God, is very striking, and fraught with deep lessons to us. The glory of the God only mighty, and eternal, and wise, is connected with our being established; and the process of establishing us depends on his being what he is here represented to be. We have to do with him as the God of power and wisdom and eternity. Bonar.

The Epistle to the Romans begins with the power of God, then declares his righteousness, and closes with adoration of his wisdom. It is so with the heart that receives the great truths with which this Epistle deals. It begins its new experience under the power of God who raised up Jesus Christ. It finds peace through the declaration of his righteousness. And then it rests in admiration and adoration of his wisdom in planning, providing, and applying the salvation of the world through Christ Jesus. D. F

Section 258.

1 CORINTHIANS i. 1-21.

1 PAUL, called to be an apostle of Jesus Christ through the will of God, and Sosthenes our
 2 brother, unto the church of God which is at Corinth, to them that are sanctified in Christ
 Jesus, called to be saints, with all that in every place call upon the name of Jesus Christ 3 our Lord, both their's and our's: grace be unto you, and peace, from God our Father, and 4 from the Lord Jesus Christ. I thank my God always on your behalf, for the grace of God
 5 which is given you by Jesus Christ; that in every thing ye are enriched by him, in all utter-
 6 ance, and in all knowledge; even as the testimony of Christ was confirmed in you:
 7 so that ye come behind in no gift; waiting for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ:
 8 who shall also confirm you unto the end, that ye may be blameless in the day of our Lord
 9 Jesus Christ. God is faithful, by whom ye were called unto the fellowship of his Son Jesus Christ our Lord.

10 Now I beseech you, brethren, by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye all speak the same thing, and that there be no divisions among you; but that ye be perfectly joined to-11 gether in the same mind and in the same judgment. For it hath been declared unto me of you, my brethren, by them which are of the house of Chloe, that there are contentions 12 among you. Now this I say, that every one of you saith, I am of Paul; and I of Apollos;
 13 and I of Cephas; and I of Christ. Is Christ divided? was Paul crucified for you? or were 14 ye baptized in the name of Paul? I thank God that I baptized none of you, but Crispus 15 and Gaius; lest any should say that I had baptized in mine own name. And I baptized 16 also the household of Stephanas: besides, I know not whether I baptized any other.
 17 For Christ sent me not to baptize, but to preach the gospel: not with wisdom of words, 18 lest the cross of Christ should be made of none effect. For the preaching of the cross is to them that perish foolishness; but unto us which are saved it is the power of God.
 19 For it is written, I will destroy the wisdom of the wise, and will bring to nothing the 20 understanding of the prudent. Where is the wise? where is the scribe? where is the dis-21 puter of this world? hath not God made foolish the wisdom of this world? For after that in the wisdom of God the world by wisdom knew not God, it pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe.

MAN had lost sight of God. Three kinds of selfishness had blinded them: self-admiration, self-will, self-indulgence; three forms of sin; three usurpers of the human soul. One—self-admiration—perverts and makes a rebel of the intellect; another—self-will—of the conscience; the other—self-indulgence—of the passions. In this threefold treachery and corruption the world had grown giddy, rapacious, and godless. Curiosity was all that was left as the highest aim in science; war, in enterprise; and a sensuous enthusiasm for the beautiful in art. Alexandria, Rome, and Athens represented these three ambitions. In losing his God, man had lost himself, as always happens. Faith in God and the dignity of man went down together. With divine worship fell human rights and liberties. The scholars and the priests mystified the people, the Epicureans tempted them, the Stoics flattered and despised them. There were gods enough: one for every propensity. But they were either patrons to be purchased, or abstractions to be apostrophized, or demons to be propitiated. Religion, where it was not a voluntary deception, had degenerated into an incantation and a ceremony. The priest, if he was a pagan, was a juggler or a dupe; if he was a Jew—read the twenty-third chapter of Matthew, and its eightfold woes on the hypocrites, to know what he was. There was intellect enough; but the amount of all that was, as Paul put it, that the world by wisdom knew not God, and never would till that “Logos,” or Messiah, came, who was the power of God and the wisdom of God unto salvation to them that believe. F. D. H.

(Read carefully pages 129-132.) Paul's first missionary labor among the Corinthians extends over a year and a half, during which period he lived with Aquila and Priscilla, and wrought with his own hands to earn his daily bread. Some of the Jews, and those men of mark, as Justus and Crispus, the ruler of the synagogue, were converted and baptized; but the Corinthian Church was mainly a Gentile one, and the questions there discussed were not Jewish, did not turn on the value of circumcision or the obligation of the law, but were such as concerned a people just converted from idolatry, and emerging from the corruption of heathen life in a city of Greece. This is the most varied and comprehensive of all the weighty letters of Paul, and exhibits throughout his fine tact and practical wisdom. It is less theological than the Epistle to the Romans; more casual in the good sense of that term. It says nothing of the law or of justification, discusses no doctrine whatever save that of the resurrection, but treats in a masterly manner of love, purity, conscience, discernment, and reverence in the Church of God. D. F.

It was written at Ephesus early in the same year in which he left Ephesus for Macedonia (1 Cor. 16:8). Its immediate occasion seems to have been the arrival at Ephesus of the family, or some of the family, of a Christian matron of Corinth named Chloe. These had brought unfavorable intelligence from the Corinthian Church. The apostle names only the report of divisions and parties; but we can hardly be wrong in believing that the news of the very serious matter treated in chapter 5 were brought by the same persons. These tidings, together with the questions on which apostolic counsels were requested, induced Paul to write this, one of the longest and most important of his pastoral letters, and the pattern, above all others, of earnest and weighty admonition and declaration springing out of circumstances. For of such a character, above all others, is this Epistle—not a treatise on any point or any system of Christian doctrine, as some others by this same apostle, but a series of fragments, or episodes, each of them occasional, arising out of something referred to him, or heard of by him, but not one of them devoid of interest for those who come after in all the long ages of the Church. No Epistle raises in us a higher estimate of the varied and wonderful gifts with which God was pleased to endow the man whom he selected for the apostle of the Gentile world, or shows us how large a portion of the Spirit, who worketh in each man severally as he will, was given to him for our edification. The depths of the spiritual, the moral, the intellectual, the physical world are open to him. He summons to his aid the analogies of nature. He enters minutely into the varieties of human infirmity and prejudice. He draws warning from the history of the chosen people; example from the Isthmian foot-race. He refers an apparently trifling question of costume to the first great proprieties and relations of Creation and Redemption. He praises, reproves, exhorts, and teaches. Where he strikes he heals. His large heart holding all, where he has grieved any, he grieves likewise; where it is in his power to give joy, he first overflows with joy himself. A.

1. Paul learned that his authority was questioned; and so he opens his Epistle with these words, written partly in self-defense: “Called to be an apostle through the will of God.” In the firm conviction of that truth lay all his power. No man felt more strongly than Paul his own insignificance. He told his converts again and again that he “was not meet to be called an apostle,” that he was “the least of all saints,” that he was the “chief of sinners.” And yet, intensely as he felt all this, more deeply did he feel something above and beyond all this, that he was God's messenger, that his was a true apostleship, that he had been truly commissioned by the King; and hence he speaks with courage and with freedom. His words were not his own, but His who had sent him.

2. The church of God. The Church is that body of men in whom the Spirit of God dwells as the source of their excellence, and who exist on earth for the purpose of exhibiting the divine life and the hidden order of humanity: to penetrate and purify the world, and, as salt, preserve it from corruption. It has an existence continuous throughout the ages; continuous, however, not on the principles of hereditary succession or of human election, but on the principle of spiritual similarity of character. Paul asserted this spiritual succession when he said that the seed of Abraham were to be reckoned, not as his lineal descendants, but as inheritors of his faith. F. W. R.

The Christian Church is modeled on the Jewish congregation, and the word ecclesia is simply the translation of the Hebrew word signifying "congregation." S.—Inasmuch as the synagogue existed when the temple was unknown, and remained when the temple fell, it followed that from its order and worship, and not from that of the temple, were copied in their general features the government, the institutions, and the devotions of those Christian communities which, springing directly from the Jewish, were first known as "synagogues" or "meeting-houses," and afterward by the adoption of an almost identical word, "ecclesia," "assembly-house." A. P. S.

The Church is at once a divine institution, in that it is the perpetuated body of Christ and witness of his redeeming power, and it is also a practical manifestation of whatever spiritual life resides among us. It is the appointed means for unfolding and nourishing our capacities for piety. It is the soul's house, collecting, protecting, cherishing, multiplying, spiritual life. This is what the Church is by intention, the Church of God's design. But come into the Church as it is. What do we see? Life? interest? energy? reality? Pass in there from the streets of travel and the shops of merchandise. Is there life before you like the eager, throbbing intensity of life you leave behind you? Pass in there from the halls of legislation and political debate. Is there interest in duty and worship like the interest in the problems of public economy and the questions of party success? Pass in there from the schoolhouse and the university. Is there energy spent on forming righteous characters like the energy that beams in the faces and animates the ambition of students and their teachers? Pass in there from the joyous groups of kindred in their homes. Is there reality like the reality of the love and the sympathy, the fellowship and fervor, of families and wedlock, of parental devotion and filial gratitude? F. D. H.

Corinth. The city was the hot-bed of the world's evil, in which every noxious plant, indigenous or transplanted, rapidly grew and flourished; where luxury and sensuality thrived rankly, stimulated by the gambling spirit of commercial life, till Corinth now in the Apostle's time, as in previous centuries, became a proverbial name for moral corruption. Amid this universal degeneracy there were two classes among the Greek population. There were, first, the uncultivated and the poor, to whom the ancient glories of their land were yet dear, to whom the old religion was not merely hereditary, but true and living still, whose imagination still saw the solemn conclave of their ancient deities on Mount Olympus, and still heard Pan, and the Fauns, and the wood-gods piping in the groves. Very different, however, was the state of the cultivated and the rich. They had lost their religion. Their civilization and their knowledge of the world had destroyed that; and, that being lost, they retained no natural vent for the energies of the restless Greek character. Hence out of their high state of intellectual culture there arose a craving for "wisdom"; not the wisdom which Solomon spoke of, but wisdom in the sense of intellectual speculation. The energy which had found a safe outlet in war now wasted itself in the amphitheatre. The enthusiasm which had been stimulated by the noble eloquence of patriotism now preyed on glittering rhetoric. Men spent their days in tournaments of speeches, and exulted in gladiatorial oratory. F. W. R.

Them that are sanctified, called to be saints. Paul chooses to regard those to whom he is writing as being in all respects true Christians, as being worthy of their privileges, as answering to what God had done to them. He might have thought indeed that, if he wrote to them as redeemed, justified, sanctified, as having all things new, as being the children of God and the heirs of God, and the temples of the Holy Ghost, any individual who felt that he was none of these things, that sin was still mighty within him, and that he was sin's slave, would neither deny his own conscience nor yet call Paul a deceiver, but would read in the difference between Paul's description of him and the reality the exact measure of his own sin and need of repentance and watchfulness. But he does not rely on this only: he notices sins as actually existing; he mingles the language of reproof and of anxiety, so as to make it quite clear that he did not mean his descriptions of their holiness and blessedness to apply to them all necessarily; he knew full well that they did not; but yet he knew also that, considering what God had done for them, it was monstrous that they should not be truly applicable. Let us ponder all the magnificence of the Scriptural language, not as describing what we are when we are full of sin, nor yet as mere exaggerated language, which must be brought down to the level of our present reality. Let us consider it as containing the words of truth and soberness; not one jot or one tittle needs to be abated; it must not be lowered to us, but we rather raised to it. It is a truth, it is the word of God, it is the seal of our assurance; it is that which good men of old would have welcomed with the deepest joy, which to good men now is a source of comfort unspeakable. For it tells us that God has done for us, is doing, will do, all that we need; it tells us that the price of our redemption has been paid, the kingdom of heaven has been set open, the power to walk as God's children has been given; that so far as God is concerned we are redeemed, we are saved, we are sanctified; it is but our own fault merely that we are not all of these actually and surely. T. A.

5. Utterance. Knowing a truth is one thing, being able to express it is quite another thing; and then, again, to be able to express a truth is one thing, but to dare to do it is another thing altogether. "Utterance" implies both power and courage. And therefore the power of utterance becomes, by the grace of God, truly a faculty divine. F. W. R.

7. Of this future coming, of this true advent-season of eternity, though much is known, much too is hidden. Between the Church and the Church's head there still subsists, even in this intimate union, a mysterious separation; and on the period of that separation a holy reserve. It has already lasted for ages, and we can not dare to predict at what epoch it is to close. The veil that hangs before the celestial sanctuary is still undrawn; and it is vain for us to "marvel," as of old the expectants of Zacharias, that the High Priest of our profession "tarrieth so long in the temple." He has willed it that, certain of his eventual arrival, we should remain in uncertainty as to its destined moment. "The times and the seasons which the Father hath put in his own power" he would have us desire, and expect, and conjecture, but not dare to define. W. A. B.

8, 9. Paul's congratulation contains a ground of hope for the continuance and successful issue of those blessings—"God shall confirm you to the end"; and again, "God is faithful." He relies not on any stability of human goodness; he knows that he can not trust to their inherent firmness or fidelity: his ground of confidence is in God. He does not count on their faithfulness to God, but on God's faithfulness to them. F. W. R.—Yet faith in man and faithfulness in God are the two members of one spiritual harmony. Neither is to be conceived without the other. Man, without God, would be fatherless; and God has almost permitted us to say that without his people (the "little children" whom he wills not "to perish") he would himself be, as it were, childless in his own celestial family! W. A. B.

There is complete fellowship with Christ. It is to this that we are called by a faithful God; and is it not a high and glorious calling? Fellowship in his Cross, his grave, his resurrection, his throne, his glory! All this faith secures to us; and of all this the Holy Spirit bears witness to us. Believing, we are reconciled, saved, accepted, blessed with all spiritual blessings in Christ Jesus. Let us walk worthy of it, as men who really believe it, happy, holy, unworldly, zealous, generous, loving. Let us carry the consciousness of our calling into everything, great or small; into business, daily life, recreations, reading, education, everything; maintaining our true position before men; manifesting our proper character; letting the world know our prospects, and doing nothing inconsistent with what we profess to be now, and with what we shall be when the Lord comes. Bonar.

11. Contentions among you. It is painful to be compelled to acknowledge among the Christians of the apostolic age the existence of so many forms of error and sin. It was a pleasing dream which presented the primitive church as a society of angels, and it is not without a struggle that we bring ourselves to open our eyes and behold the reality. But yet it is a higher feeling which bids us thankfully to recognize the truth, that "there is no partiality with God," that he has not rendered schism and heresy impossible in any age of the Church. C.—Nothing more certainly eats out the heart and life of religion than party spirit. Christianity is love; party spirit is the death of love. Christianity is union amid variety of views; party spirit is disunion. F. W. R.

12. Certain persons had arisen as teachers antagonistic to Paul, and claiming superiority to him on various accounts: some as representing the teaching of Peter, an elder apostle; some as following the Alexandrine learning of Apollos; some again as having had the advantage of nearer personal intercourse with Christ himself; while the followers of Paul were degenerating into the same type of a mere personal adhesion to him, instead of following him as he followed Christ. This confused embryo state of parties appears to have been all that can be safely assumed. A.

Apollos had been educated at Alexandria, the university of the world, and we are told that he was mighty in the Scriptures and remarkable for eloquence. The eloquence of Paul was rough and burning; it stirred men's hearts, kindling in them the living fire of truth; that of Apollos was more refined and polished. Peter was as gifted in his way as Paul; but there was this difference between them: that, whereas the Spirit of God had detached Paul from Judaism by a sudden shock, in the heart of Peter Christianity had been regularly and slowly developed; he had known Jesus first as the Son of man, and afterward as the Son of God. It was long before he realized God's purpose of love to the Gentiles. In his conception the Messiah was to be chiefly King for the Jews; therefore all the Jewish converts, who still clung to very much that was Jewish, preferred to follow Peter. F. W. R.

Envy and strife go often under the mask of zeal. These whom the apostle addresses were apt to glory in their carnal strifes. It is easy to tack on a pretense of religion, and to baptize envious contests with a glorious name. There are so many things that look like zeal but are not; and our own interest is so often concerned in the interests of religion, that we have need to suspect ourselves, lest the wild gourds of frowardness and passion be mistaken for the planting of the Lord, zeal and righteousness. There are two shrewd presumptions upon which, if you can not absolutely condemn such motions, you have cause to suspect them. One is, when they boil up into irregular and strange actions; true zeal, though it increase the stream, does not usually overflow the banks, and break one rule to vindicate another. The other is, when we are apt to glory and boast, as in the case before us. T. M.

13. What was Paul's method of curing schism, and of making men truly one who had been "divided"? He directed every eye, and every heart, and every spirit, to one object—Jesus Christ, the personal Saviour, the center and source of unity; in fellowship with whom all men would find their fellowship with each other. N. M.

14-17. It may be expected that those whom the apostle baptized with his own hands were converts distinguished from the rest by some circumstance, either of eminence or of connection with him. Accordingly, of the three names here mentioned, Crispus (Acts 18:8) was a "chief ruler of the Jewish synagogue at Corinth, who believed in the Lord, with all his house." Gaius (Rom. 16:23) was Paul's host at Corinth, and the host, he tells us, "of the whole Church." The household of Stephanas, we read in the sixteenth chapter of this Epistle, "were the first-fruits of Achaia." Paley.

17. Paul knew that "Christ had sent him to preach the gospel, not with wisdom of words, lest the Cross of Christ should be made of none effect." All the arts of rhetoric and philosophic argument, the "excellency of speech and wisdom," the "enticing words of man's wisdom," were abjured by the very apostle who was qualified to use them on the very field that invited and provoked their display, in order to give place to the "manifestation of spirit and of power," to prove that the simplicity of preaching was God's instrument for saving them that believe, and to assure the converts that "their faith was not in the wisdom of man, but in the power of God." S.

18-21. In this passage we have a sublime strain of prophetic utterance from Paul, coming with such irresistible power of inspiration, and with such self-attesting credentials of the Spirit of truth in its majestic affirmations, as to supersede argument, and leave the poor conceits of irreligious knowledge and genius to contempt. F. D. H.—The sects of philosophers, though numerous and exceedingly various, were all agreed in proudly trusting in themselves that they were wise, and despising others. Their published opinions, their private speculations, their personal immorality, made them irreconcilable adversaries of Christianity. It went up into their schools, and called their wisdom foolishness, and rebuked their self-conceit. As with the Epicureans and Stoics who encountered Paul, mockery was the natural expression of their minds when they heard of the resurrection of the dead. The apostles, therefore, in attempting to propagate the gospel among the Gentiles, were opposed by all the wit and learning and sophistry, all the pride and jealousy and malice, of every sect of philosophers. McIlvaine.

19. Destroy wisdom of the wise. Modern idolatry has raised two altars, to which a crowd of idolaters press forward. One of these is the altar of matter, the other that of intellect. Upon both human victims are offered; for all idolatrous worship is murderous worship. The adoration of intellect has its barbarity as well as the adoration of matter. The man of intellect finds his account in sparing nothing. He who despises most passes for having the most sagacity. It has been said that the heart often has intellect, but that the intellect has no heart. In the unrestrained pleasures of the intellect, as in the unrestrained pleasure of the senses, the heart dries up. A. V.

21. Till we arrive at that world of glory we have no reason to expect any grace but in the diligent use of means appointed thereto. If the Ethiopian eunuch is to be instructed in the gospel, Philip must be miraculously directed to him to open to him its glad tidings. If Cornelius is to receive the same blessing, an angel shall instruct him where to find a teacher; but not a ray of light does he receive except through God's appointed ordinance—the foolishness of human preaching saving them that believe. Look to it, then, that you undervalue not these outward ministrations; look to it, also that you do not rest in them, but in his Spirit accompanying them. Look through and above all ordinances to the God of ordinances. Goode.—To make Christianity depend on the power of its preachers or the skill of theologians is at once to measure absolute beauty, truth, and good by mortal competency, and to stimulate the pulpit with a spur as foreign from gospel simplicity as it is insulting to the authority of God. The function of a clergy is not the audacious one of representing the Majesty of Heaven, but to plead generously with the reluctance of men; not to dole out God's compassion by the petty dimensions of their intelligence, but to be unpretending heralds of a Christ who makes their weakness his strength, and even the foolishness of preaching the wisdom of God unto salvation. F. D. H.

Section 259.

1 CORINTHIANS i. 22-31.

22 For the Jews require a sign, and the Greeks seek after wisdom : but we preach Christ
 23 crucified, unto the Jews a stumblingblock, and unto the Greeks foolishness ; but unto them
 24 which are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ the power of God, and the wisdom of God.
 25 Because the foolishness of God is wiser than men ; and the weakness of God is stronger
 26 than men. For ye see your calling, brethren, how that not many wise men after the flesh, 27 not many mighty, not many noble, are called : but God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise ; and God hath chosen the weak things of the world to 28 confound the things which are mighty ; and base things of the world, and things which are despised, hath God chosen, yea, and things which are not, to bring to nought things that 29 are : that no flesh should glory in his presence. But of him are ye in Christ Jesus, who of 30 God is made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption : that,
 31 according as it is written, He that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord.

WHAT Christianity really is appears most evidently in its filling vessels that are insignificant and contemptible in human eyes with a heavenly glory which infinitely outshines all earthly glory, since it pours into them the powers of the world to come, compared with which all the powers of earth are nothing. In all ages the glorious declaration of the apostle in verse 27 has been amply verified in the operations of the gospel. Listen while Gregory describes the life of a man who, in the lowest worldly station, in the most needy and helpless lot, manifested the glory of a divine life: "He had been worn out by long illness ; he could neither stand, nor sit upright in his bed, nor raise his hand to his mouth, nor turn himself from one side to the other. Whatever he received in alms he distributed with his own hands to the poor. He could not read, but he had purchased a Bible ; he received all pious men as his guests, who read to him constantly out of the Bible. And thus, without being able to read, he became acquainted with the whole Bible. Amid all his pains he endeavored to thank God, and to spend day and night in praising him. When he felt himself near death he begged his visitors to stand up near him, and to sing psalms with him in expectation of his approaching dissolution. And as he was singing with them he made a sudden pause, and exclaimed aloud : 'Hush ! do you not hear how the praise of God sounds in heaven ?' And, as he applied the ear of his heart to this praise of God which he perceived mentally, the holy soul departed from the body." N.

22. The Jews. In their way they were religious, but it was a blind and bigoted adherence to the sensuous side of religion. They had almost ceased to believe in a living God, but they were strenuous believers in the virtue of ordinances. God only existed to them for the benefit of the Jewish nation. To them a Messiah must be a World-prince. To them a new revelation could only be substantiated by marvels and miracles. To them it could have no self-evident spiritual light ; and Paul describes the difficulty which this tendency put in the way of the progress of the gospel among them in the words : "The Jews require a sign." F. W. R.

The Greeks seek after wisdom. Full of system and of science, of the all-sufficiency of reason, the dignity of human nature, and the absolute perfection of stoical wisdom and virtue, they must needs regard with supercilious contempt an unsystematic and unscientific religion, first promulgated in an unpolished and unlettered corner of the world, by the son of a carpenter, who never studied at Athens or at Rome ; preached afterward by illiterate fishermen and mechanics, and received with eagerness by the illiterate populace. They would never endure a religion that rejected the aid of eloquence and learning, in the pursuit of which they had spent their lives ; a religion that laid open the weakness and depravity of the human heart, and the insufficiency of our own powers, either to lead us to a just knowledge of our duty or support us in the due performance of it, without supernatural aid ; which inculcated the necessity of a mediator, a redeemer, a sanctifier, and required the very unphilosophical virtues of meekness, humility, contrition, self-abasement, self-denial, renovation of heart and reformation of life ; which taught the doctrines of a resurrection from the grave, and an eternal existence in another world. P.

23. Unto the Jews a stumblingblock. The scribes and Pharisees turned away from the Cross, and their hatred darkened into derision, not merely because of a pride of wisdom, but because of a complacent self-righteousness that knew nothing of the fact of sin, that never had learned to believe itself to be full of evil, that had got so wrapped up in ceremonies as to have lost the life; that had degraded the divine law of God, with all its lightning splendors, and awful power, into a matter of "mint and anise and cummin." Not transgression shuts a man out from mercy. Transgression, which belongs to us all, makes us subjects for the mercy; but it is pride, self-righteousness, trust in ourselves, which "bars the gates of mercy on mankind"; and the men that are condemned are condemned not only because they have transgressed the commandments of God, but "this is the condemnation, that light came into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil." A. M.

Foolishness. The Greek philosophers expected to have all the difficulties relating to Jesus and the resurrection cleared up to them, to have all the reasons on which God acted laid open before them, and all his proceedings with mankind justified on the principles of human wisdom. Till this were done, the doctrine of Christ crucified would always appear "foolishness to the Greeks." P.

Paul did not become less a philosopher by being a Christian, but the energies of his mind were given neither to philosophy nor to literature, but to something far higher. And so, now, many of the finest spirits of our race are diverted from science by the practical calls and self-denying duties arising from the spiritual wants of the world. But does this dwarf the intellect? Can that dwarf the intellect which shows it realities more grand than those of science; which, with a full comprehension of the nature and processes and ends of science and of literature, yet gives them their rightful though subordinate place? Never. For energy and balance, I would rather have the intellect formed by the Bible alone—by grappling with its mighty questions, by communing with its high mysteries, by tracing its narratives, by listening to its matchless eloquence and poetry—than to have that formed by all the popular literature and the scientific tracts in existence; and if these should practically exclude the Bible, instead of being a blessing, they would only bring disaster. M. H.

24. Christ himself is, in his sacrifice, the mighty power of God. This is the power that has new-created and sent home, as trophies, in all the past ages, its uncounted myriads of believing, new-created, glorified souls. It can do for you, O sinner of mankind! all that you want done. Go to the Cross, and meet there God in sacrifice. Behold him, as Jesus, bearing your sin, receiving the shafts of your enmity! Embrace Him, believe in Him, take Him to your inmost heart. Do this, and you shall feel sin die within you, and a glorious quickening—Christ the power of God, Christ in you the hope of glory—shall be consciously risen upon you as the morn of your new creation. H. B.

25. Whence was it that they who, while Christ was alive, did not withstand the attack of the Jews, afterward, when Christ had died and been buried, set themselves against the whole wide world? Hold fast these two heads of the argument: How did the weak overcome the strong? And, being the men they were, how did it occur to them to form such a plan unless they had the help of God? Chrys.

26. This should read, "How that not many of you are wise after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble." A.—That which remained concealed from philosophers and sages, in the most brilliant periods of the human intellect, twelve poor fishermen, from the lakes of Judea, quitted their nets to announce to the world. Certainly they had not more of imagination, of reason, of heart, or of conscience than the rest of mankind; yet they put to silence the wisdom of sages, emptied the schools of philosophers, closed the gates of every temple, extinguished the fire on every altar. They exhibited to the world their crucified Master, and the world recognized in him that which their anxious craving had sought in vain for three thousand years. A new morality, new social relations, and a new universe sprung into being at the voice of these poor men, ignorant of letters and of all philosophy.

27-29. Things which are not. He has brought into competition riches and poverty, wisdom and ignorance, philosophy and rusticity; but poverty, rusticity, and ignorance have conquered. From time to time he has called to his aid genius and power, and permitted them to coöperate in his work; but when he has so willed it, the sling of the young son of Jesse has sufficed to overthrow Goliath. The smallness of the means has only served to enhance the power of him who employed them. In all time the Church has been sufficient to the Church, truth has been sufficient to truth. Eloquence and enthusiasm have not done so much for this sacred cause as the modest virtues, the uniform activity, and the patient prayers of thousands of believers whose names are unknown. A. V.—In that day of simple spiritual revelation, when the secrets of all hearts shall be revealed, all earthly distinctions leveled, and all ranks and badges forgotten, the question shall not be, Who was highest, who lowest? who richest or who most beautiful? who cultivated alone, or refined alone? But, Who loved God and man, who honored the right, who was loyal to truth, who lived and walked in the Spirit, who had faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, and out of that faith, as toward Christ himself, did minister to those hungry, athirst, naked, strangers, sick, in prison? So, many that are here first shall be last, and the last first. F. D. H.

30. "Ye are," says the apostle. After speaking of "things that are not," and of "things that are," he turns to his fellow-believers and says, "but ye are." And whence is this existence found? From Him, from God himself, as its immediate origin and still continuous author. And where is it found? "In Christ Jesus." In Christ Jesus! As the simple voice of faith this word is ever uttered with joy unspeakable and full of glory. But preacher or commentator who may attempt to sound the depths or open the treasures of its meaning, must feel his tongue falter under the sense of the inadequacy of every explaining word. Let us, however, at least assert the reality of the fact which it expresses, for it is no symbolical form of speech, but the statement of a fact, as real in regard to the spirit as the fact of our being in the world is real in regard to the body. T. D. B.

As there is no other channel to God but Christ Jesus, so there is no other beginning or termination to the work of Christ Jesus but God. The language of Scripture on this point is wonderful, unfathomable. It would appear that, as regards the work of grace, God sees nothing but Christ Jesus alone and altogether. He is made to us wisdom by enlightening us, righteousness by justifying us, sanctification by purifying us, redemption by purchasing us into immortality. He justifies as Christ crucified and risen without us; He sanctifies as Christ crucified and risen within us; He glorifies in virtue of both, as Christ enthroned in the fullness of consummate power, and at length "subduing all things unto himself." W. A. B.—This wisdom, righteousness, and sanctification, indispensable conditions of eternal life and sacred earnestness of our inheritance, are in germ and principle included in faith in the work of redemption; they come forth from it spontaneously, just as the blade sends forth the stalk, and the stalk the grain. In the soul whose look is fixed upon the Cross there exists a beginning of wisdom, a beginning of righteousness, a beginning of sanctification;

and in proportion as the believer's work is so fixed, the spiritual life, under the three forms which the above terms imply, grows and is silently developed in his breast. A. V.

One day as I was passing into the field, suddenly this sentence fell upon my soul, "Thy righteousness is in heaven"; and methought I saw, with the eyes of my soul, Jesus Christ at God's right hand. There was my righteousness; so that, wherever I was or whatever I was doing, God could not say of me, "He wants my righteousness," for that was just before him. I also saw, moreover, that it was not my frame of heart that made my righteousness better, nor yet my bad frame that made my righteousness worse; for my righteousness was Jesus Christ himself. By this Scripture I saw that the man Christ Jesus, as he is distinct from us as touching his bodily presence, so he is our righteousness and sanctification before God: here therefore I lived for some time at peace with God through Christ. Oh! methought, Christ, Christ! there was nothing but Christ that was before my eyes. I was not now only for looking upon this and the other benefits of Christ apart, as of his blood, burial, or resurrection, but considered him as a whole Christ, as he in whom all these and all his other virtues, relations, offices, and operations met together, and that as he sat on the right hand of God in heaven. 'Twas glorious to see his exaltation, and the worth and prevalence of all his benefits. Now Christ was all: all my wisdom, all my righteousness, all my sanctification, and all my redemption. Bun.

31. He that glorieth let him glory in the Lord. On the one hand, Christ is "set forth evidently crucified among us"; on the other, we see "the heavens opened, and the Son of man standing on the right hand of God." On the one hand, "Behold the Man!" and the crown of thorns; on the other, "Behold the Man!" and the crown of glory, and the raptures of an assembled universe! But whether on the cross or on the throne, in Him alike and in Him alone will we glory. W. A. B.

Section 260.

1 CORINTHIANS ii. 1-16.

1 AND I, brethren, when I came to you, came not with excellency of speech or of wisdom,
 2 declaring unto you the testimony of God. For I determined not to know any thing among 3 you, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified. And I was with you in weakness, and in fear, 4 and in much trembling. And my speech and my preaching was not with enticing words of 5 man's wisdom, but in demonstration of the Spirit and of power: that your faith should not 6 stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God. Howbeit we speak wisdom among them that are perfect: yet not the wisdom of this world, nor of the princes of this world,

7 that comé to nought : but we speak the wisdom of God in a mystery, even the hidden wis-
 8 dom, which God ordained before the world unto our glory : which none of the princes of this world knew : for had they known it, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory.
 9 But as it is written, Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart
 10 of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him. But God hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit : for the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things 11 of God. For what man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of man which is in 12 him ? even so the things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God. Now we have received, not the spirit of the world, but the Spirit which is of God ; that we might know 13 the things that are freely given to us of God. Which things also we speak, not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth ; comparing spiritual 14 things with spiritual. But the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God :
 for they are foolishness unto him : neither can he know them, because they are spiritually 15 discerned. But he that is spiritual judgeth all things, yet he himself is judged of no man.
 16 For who hath known the mind of the Lord, that he may instruct him ? But we have the mind of Christ.

PAUL knows nothing but Christ crucified. When he entreats for purity among them, and the purging out of their sensuality, this is his reason : "Christ our Passover is sacrificed for us." Keep your bodies holy as temples, for they are "bought with a price," and that price is Jesus' blood. When he remonstrates against misleading or tempting an unguarded heart, this is his expostulation : "Shall the weak brother perish, for whom Christ died ?" When he urges them with all tenderness to cherish a forgiving and forbearing temper, this is his motive : "If I forgave anything, to whom I forgave it, for your sakes forgave I it in the person of Christ." When his own sufferings and weakness oppress him, this is his consolation, that in that infirm and aching body he can "bear about the dying of the Lord Jesus." And when he comes to offer to the reverential reception of the Church the Supper of the Lord, this is the inmost meaning he assigned to it : it shows forth the Lord's death till he come ; it represents the dying love ; its profaners are they who do not discern the Lord's broken body there. It is plain enough where the apostle Paul sets the doctrine of the propitiatory sacrifice in the New Testament system of theology, and among the practical powers and consolations of the Christian life. He sets it where the church evangelic and catholic finds it, and has kept it, in the supreme and central place. F. D. H.

2. Know nothing but Christ. Everything which we are to believe, to know, to practice ; all which pertains to God and to man ; all of the least importance concerning other worlds and other orders of beings ; all history from the beginning of time ; all prospect and expectation of the future till time shall be no more ; all that by any possibility we can know concerning eternal retributions when this world has disappeared from its present place and uses ; all arts, all sciences, all discoveries, inventions, and achievements, wars, revolutions, governments, if they be any thing, are related to him for whom all things were made, and by whom all things consist, in their diversity, their totality, and their unity. Be sure of this. When the converted scholar of Tarsus determined to know nothing but Christ and him crucified, he restricted himself to no mean and narrow bounds ; for he placed himself at that focal center where he could command every radius in the vast infinity of knowledge. W. A.

Him crucified. That Christ had suffered the most degrading form of death, the death of a criminal slave, the death which every freeman would have considered a taint upon his blood and an ignominy never to be wiped out from his family—this was the one great trial of faith to the wise Greek and the proud Jew. It is perhaps impossible for us, by any effort of mind, to appreciate the stigma which, at the time when Paul wrote these wonderful words, attached to the cross of Christ. The reproach of crucifixion, as an historical punishment actually inflicted upon our blessed Lord, is entirely rolled away. His cross has, in fact, become to our apprehensions his crown ; the hearing that he underwent this death never wakes in any mind a feeling even of surprise, much less of disgust, or of derogation from his dignity ; gratitude and love are the only sentiments which the spectacle of Calvary, looked at through the veneration of ages—a glorifying perspective—stirs in the mind of his professing followers. E. M. G.

Christ is the very foundation and subject-matter of preaching, and all preaching without Christ is building castles in the air. Christ is the life and soul of preaching, and all preaching without him is like a body without life and spirit. Christ is the great end of preaching; preaching is to manifest his glory; and, when Christ is not preached, the great end is lost. R. S.—Let the great end be to render him precious in the eyes of his people, to lead them to him as a sanctuary to protect them, a propitiation to reconcile them, a treasure to enrich them, a physician to heal them, an advocate to present them and their service to God; as wisdom to counsel, as righteousness to justify, as sanctification to renew, as redemption to save, as an inexhaustible fountain of pardon, peace, comfort, victory, glory! Bp. Reynolds.

The New Testament says nothing of "Christianity." The word is not there. But when God would save the world, he sends the Saviour with a throbbing heart and a living voice. The first teachers said nothing about Christianity; but "Christ crucified" and "the resurrection" they could preach in jails and synagogues, turn the world upside down for and die for, counting it all joy. Dying men speak little of Christianity. They say Christ. Last breaths are too short for abstractions, and can only articulate the one dear and all-prevailing name. The fading sight loses all images but the cross. F. D. H.

4. Paul does indeed discard the "enticing words of man's wisdom," but he does not discard eloquent, powerful, and well-ordered discourse; or what mean his own matchless discourses before Agrippa and the Athenian Areopagites, and his farewell to the Ephesian elders, and his descent upon the resurrection? T. H. S.

It is well known that not a few of the Hebrew nation, from the age of the Macedonian conquests, and during the course of the four following centuries, ambitiously addicted themselves to Grecian literature; and in this ambiguous course advanced as far toward a treasonable admiration of polytheistic philosophy, poetry, and art, as could well consist with their professed attachment to the national faith. Some went further than this limit. Scattered indications of the incongruous mixtures of opinions which thence resulted are to be found in some allusions of the New Testament, in the apocryphal books, and in the Rabbinical commentaries. But evidence to the same purport, and more at large, is presented in the writings of the Jewish philosopher of Alexandria, and of the Jewish courtier of Jerusalem. But it is observable in all these instances that the superinduction of Grecian modes of thinking upon the Hebrew mind was, to the whole extent of it, a corruption of faith. Philo is but an Alexandrian rabbi and a barbarian philosopher; Josephus little better than a renegade. Paul of Tarsus affords an instance of another sort. He was as well read as Philo; almost as much conversant with active life as Josephus; he was a reader of the Greek drama, and a great master of that mental management which then was to be learned only within the circle of Grecian dialectics and rhetoric. Nevertheless, he remains most completely national in his mode of thinking and his phraseology: it was at the feet of Gamaliel that he sat, though he learned lessons elsewhere. There is no alien spirit, no shrinking from Moses, no blending of things incompatible, no affectation of doctrines more enlarged and liberal or more refined than were taught by the prophets in the writings of Paul. He is not now the Jew, now the Christian, now the sophist; but always both Jew and Christian, and as fully so as Peter or as James. Paul grasped in a much firmer manner than they the vital principles which were the glory of the Jewish people. Even as a Jew, and still more as a Christian, he was better qualified than they to estimate justly the intrinsic value of Grecian philosophy and refinement. He knew how to strike the balance of merit between Plato, or Pindar, or Menander, and David or Isaiah. He neither repudiated the Grecian literature with a rude fanatical arrogance because it was at fault in matters of religion, nor labored to deck himself in its flowers at the cost of consistency; but while he adhered in spirit and letter, in form and substance, to that fashion of thought and language which the divine oracles had set, did not scruple to avail himself of whatever aid might fairly be drawn from a foreign source. I. T.

God and his truth are one and inseparable; truth manifesting God, and God manifest through the truth; truth testifying for God, and God convincing by the truth; truth shining round all divine things, and God making all divine things savingly perceptible. This is the eternal union and coöperation of the Infinite with the light in which he dwelleth. The true idea of "gospel motives" is this—God moving in the gospel; and this is "the love of Christ truly constraining us"; Christ constraining us by the love which his word makes known; while the true "demonstration of the Spirit and of power" lies here, the Spirit demonstrating the power of that "preaching which is not with enticing words of man's wisdom." J. S. S.

5. In compassion to our weakness God has placed at our disposal that body of historical proof which, in its combination and details, deserves our admiration as much as the most exquisite arrangements of the organic world. These proofs lead as far as the door of the sanctuary, leaving it to us thereafter to remain outside or to enter. We may remain upon the threshold, holding in our hand the title-deeds which give us right of entrance; but if a last step, a last impulse which is divine, makes us enter, then we believe with a new faith and on new evidence. Our faith had till then been founded in some measure on the wisdom of men; but now it is founded on the power of God, because it is not by any ordinary means of which we can give account, but by the power of God, that this evidence is made complete. A. V.

6. Originally intellect is the ally and discoverer of truth; it finds its highest employment as the instrument of religious truth; and Jesus Christ, who restores the harmony of our nature, speaks "a wisdom" or philosophy "among them that are perfect"—a wisdom of which illuminated intellect is the student and guardian, and which amply recognizes the high and abundant honor which the Creator has put upon his creature's thought. H. P. L.

7. The gospel, in the language of Paul, is a mystery—the mystery of God—the mystery hidden from ages everlasting in his own bosom, but now revealed unto men. In other words, it is the revelation of the glorious plan of his wisdom and love in our redemption. It is, therefore, a scheme of doctrine—something taught—and that which as taught is “the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth”—that on the knowledge of which all right feeling and all holy obedience depends. Stability in the Christian faith is therefore no less important than stability of Christian character, since without the former the latter can not exist. N. P.

Verses 9, 10 ought to stand, “But as it is written, Things which eye hath not seen, ear hath not heard, and which have not entered into the heart of man, things which God hath prepared for them that love him, hath God revealed unto us through his Spirit.” A.—These glorious words are sometimes strangely misinterpreted, as if the apostle merely meant rhetorically to exalt the conception of the heavenly world, as of something beyond all power to imagine or to paint. The apostle meant something infinitely deeper; the heaven of God is not only that which “eye hath not seen,” but that which eye can never see; its glories are not of that kind at all which can ever stream in forms of beauty on the eye, or pour in melody upon the enraptured ear—not such joys as “the heart of man” can invent or imagine; it is something which these sensuous organs of ours never can appreciate—bliss of another kind altogether, revealed to the spirit of man by the Spirit of God—joys such as spirit alone can receive. Do you ask what these are? “The fruits of the Spirit are love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance.” That is heaven. F. W. R.

10. The Spirit searcheth. The reliance of the soul on Christ, the singleness and fixedness of purpose in divine things, the breathing of the soul after him, will lead to persevering intensity in prayer, the Holy Spirit will be vouchsafed, and God will shine into the heart so that it will be full of light. The degree of spiritual discernment possessed by a being taught of the Spirit of God depends much upon the habits of the soul, the study of spiritual things, the degree of watchfulness against sin, the faithfulness of the soul in prayer, the time one has been conversant with divine realities, and the habit of living with reference to them. G. B. C.

11. As no one man is acquainted with the consciousness of another man, even so the things of God—his counsels, thoughts, ways of viewing men and actions, objects of complacency and aversion—

“even so the things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God.” We may hear the echoing thunder of God's judgments when they are abroad in the world; we may have the examples of his mercy and the monuments of his wrath before our eyes; the still small voice of his gracious invitations may be addressed to us; the letter of Holy Scripture may be familiar to us from our youth upward as a household word; and from these aids we may form some general conjectures as to the Divine character: but to God's own thought and counsel we must remain strangers, until the Holy Spirit initiates us into it intrinsically, by the communication of the Divine mind into the mind of the creature. E. M. G.—He who has found in his Bible the material for conversation, the topic for discussion, or the field for criticism and controversy, but who has not found in it the unfathomable fountain of peace undisturbed, the solace for every earthly suffering, the silent but faithful friend—he who has not found, in short, “righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost,” ever inviting him within that volume—though he may know the lore and the languages of antiquity, has yet to learn in the school of the Spirit. W. A. B.

12. Received the Spirit, that we might know the things given of God. The Spirit is both the principle of the external revelation, as having inspired the Scriptures which foreshow this glory, and of the internal revelation also, to enlighten blind minds that would otherwise never be able to discover things afar off: therefore called the spirit of wisdom and revelation, by which the eyes of the understanding are enlightened to know the riches of his inheritance among the saints. Howe.—The Spirit takes of the things of Christ and shows them to us; and then what was before like a book in a strange language becomes, on a sudden, instinct with the language of God, which we hear and understand as readily as if it were our own tongue wherein we were born. T. A.

13. “Comparing spiritual with spiritual,” should be “interpreting spiritual things to the spiritual.” A.—It is by the preaching of his gospel, in all varying ways, that Christ, through the Spirit, seeks to illumine the darkened mind and to renew the wicked heart of “the natural man”; to lay the foundations of holy character deep and strong and broad in the understanding and in the affections; to build up and garnish with heavenly graces the structure of individual holiness for which those foundations are laid; to “chase away erroneous and strange doctrines” from the church of God; to keep truth victorious, and to multiply the bright and blessed conquests of Christ's spiritual kingdom. J. S. S.

14. The persons here spoken of are described as natural, the same word as that used by Jude (v. 19) to express persons "not having the Spirit." Such men, when the truths of the gospel are proposed to them, though it be "in the words which the Holy Ghost teacheth," receive them not, see no glory in them, no correspondence with their character and condition; nay, count the representations made to them of spiritual joys and terrors, of corruption in them and mercy in God, of man's ruin and recovery through the gospel to holiness and happiness, of the vanity of the world and the blessedness of forsaking it for another, to be overstrained, false, gloomy, enthusiastic. They are foolishness unto them. Goode.

14. They are spiritually discerned. That is, they are discerned only by a faculty which he has not; and, therefore, as beings devoid of reason can not understand the truths of science or of man's wisdom, for they are without the faculty which can discern them, so beings devoid of God's Spirit can not understand the truths of God. T. A.—There is absolutely nothing to prevent the intellect from exercising itself upon the Christian revelation more than upon the contents of any other printed book, or the reason from estimating it, or the imagination from building on it, or even the gentler affections from softening at its details. But all this external similarity is accompanied with a total internal difference; and this book differs from every other in requiring, so to speak, an organ specially prepared to receive its real purport. These things are "spiritually discerned." W. A. B.

15. For "judgeth," "judged," substitute "dis-cerneth," "discerned." A.—As in all subjects, we can understand language only as far as we have some experience of the things it imports, so in religion (by the very same principle) the spiritual heart alone can understand the language of the Spirit. Think of it for a moment, and you will find that, in every book whatever, it is the mind of the reader that puts meaning in the words. The language of the new covenant is a celestial language, and they who will give their fullness to its blessed words must have caught their secret from heaven! W. A. B.

16. The mind of Christ. A higher standard of judging and of acting has been set up in the mind of the world. Our Lord has not only purified man's abstract conceptions of virtue, but he has taught us what to admire and approve in life and action. He has lived a life, the principles of which are an everlasting protest against the misjudgments of men arising from their low standards. He has shown us the highest human excellence misunderstood, the highest reason pronounced a derangement of reason, and thus has put us on our guard against similar mistakes. In him we see the true measure of what is right and what is practical in conduct, of what in the end must commend itself to the rectified judgment of the world. That is practical and that is practicable which commends itself to a sound soul, to a calm, trustful, courageous soul in unison with Christ, which commends itself to a faith that overcomes the world, to a love that is capable of self-sacrifice. Undertakings will not suffer shipwreck, however maligned or scorned, into which men who have his spirit enter. T. D. W.

Section 261.

1 CORINTHIANS iii. 1-23.

1 AND I, brethren, could not speak unto you as unto spiritual, but as unto carnal, even as 2 unto babes in Christ. I have fed you with milk, and not with meat: for hitherto ye were 3 not able to bear it, neither yet now are ye able. For ye are yet carnal: for whereas there
4 is among you envying, and strife, and divisions, are ye not carnal, and walk as men? For 5 while one saith, I am of Paul; and another, I am of Apollos; are ye not carnal? Who 6 then is Paul, and who is Apollos, but ministers by whom ye believed, even as the Lord gave 7 to every man? I have planted, Apollos watered; but God gave the increase. So then 8 neither is he that planteth any thing, neither he that watereth; but God that giveth the in-9 crease. Now he that planteth and he that watereth are one: and every man shall receive 10 his own reward according to his own labour. For we are labourers together with God: ye 11 are God's husbandry, ye are God's building. According to the grace of God which is given 12 unto me, as a wise masterbuilder, I have laid the foundation, and another buildeth thereon.
13 But let every man take heed how he buildeth thereupon.

14 For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ. Now if any 15 man build upon this foundation gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble; every 16 man's work shall be made manifest: for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed 17 by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is. If any man's work abide 18 which he hath built thereupon, he shall receive a reward. If any man's work shall be 19 burned, he shall suffer loss: but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire. Know ye not

17 that ye are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you? If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy; for the temple of God is holy, which 18 temple ye are. Let no man deceive himself. If any man among you seemeth to be wise in 19 this world, let him become a fool, that he may be wise. For the wisdom of this world is 20 foolishness with God. For it is written, He taketh the wise in their own craftiness. And 21 again, The Lord knoweth the thoughts of the wise, that they are vain. Therefore let no 22 man glory in men. For all things are your's; whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the 23 world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come; all are your's; and ye are Christ's; and Christ is God's.

EVERY Christian is in himself a temple, "a temple of God," as well as a separate or single stone in the general edifice. He has to build up, on the foundation of faith, all that is holy in personal character. "Other foundation can no man lay," as the inward basis of Christian virtue, "than that which is laid, which is Jesus Christ." Religious faith—faith which accepts a personal Redeemer and a personal redemption—is the support and groundwork of Christian excellence. That excellence, however, is reared and perfected by sore labor and slow degrees. "Let every man," therefore, "take heed how he buildeth"; after what model and with what materials. The aims and purposes, the motives and ends, which influence the soul, the walk and conversation, the practical habitudes that appear in the life, all that properly constitutes character, the character of the inward and the outward man—this is the building which individual Christians have to labor to erect. In the materials that constitute personal character, as in those that compose the visible Church, there may be the solid and the durable, the chaffy and the worthless. There may be the gold and silver, the precious stones and resplendent ornaments of a divine virtue; or there may be the wood and hay, the straw and the stubble of an earthly life. Just as it is incumbent on the official builders to take care, in their relations to others, that they teach nothing but the true, and sanction and encourage none but the good, so is it incumbent on the private Christian to take care, in relation to himself, that he do the same; that is, that he have just views of what it is that is to be "built up" on the foundation of his faith as "holy living," and that he strenuously endeavor to embody and realize this divine "idea" in the positive habitudes of his daily life. And still further: just as in the end the work of one builder will "abide" and he "have a reward," and that of another will be "burnt" and he "suffer loss," so also will it be with individual Christians, according as they may be found, at the day of reckoning, to have traded with their talents with intelligence and skill, or to have misunderstood or abused or buried them in the earth. When the Lord is revealed at the last day, the event will be productive of various feelings even in the circle of the saved themselves! Some will rejoice with instantaneous exultation, and be "found of him in peace, without spot and blameless," while others "will be ashamed before him at his coming," awake to apprehension, and be "saved as by fire." T. B.

1, 2. Paul taught the Corinthians all the doctrine he had to teach, but not all the conceptions of the blessed life which he knew of. He showed them that, leaving the principles of doctrine, they were to keep themselves in the love of Christ, and be strengthened more and more with his Spirit in the inner man, growing up unto him in all things. But all this by degrees. F. W. R.

5. As to Apollos, who had followed Paul in evangelical labors at Corinth, the apostle is in no wise jealous of him, and does not for a moment suspect him of fostering the spirit of faction. This is quite evident from his desiring his "brother Apollos" to return to that city (12 : 16). But he presses on the Corinthians to remember that both Apollos and he were not masters, but servants, by whom they believed; that they were builders, but the building was not their house; it was God's temple. The church was not for the ministry, but the ministry for the church, and the church for the Lord. D. F.

7. You may rise up early and go to bed late, and study hard, and read much, and devour the marrow of the best authors; and when you have done all, unless God give a blessing to your endeavors, be as lean and meager, in regard of true and useful learning, as Pharaoh's lean kine were after they had eaten the fat ones. It is God that both ministereth the seed to the sower and multiplieth the seed sown: the principal and the increase are both his. Sanderson.—What a powerful incentive to thankfulness and prayer, and at the same time to watchfulness and activity! He who must give the increase will do so where the planting and watering are done with an eye upon him. Van O.

8. This is the true inspired remedy for all party spirit: "He that planteth and he that watereth are one." Each in his way is indispensable. To do our own share in the acting, and to feel that each is an integral, essential portion of the whole, not interfering with the rest; to know that each church, each sect, each man, is cooperating best in the work when he expresses his own individuality (as Paul and Cephas, and John and Barnabas did) in truths of word and action which others, perhaps, can not grasp—that is the only emancipation from partisanship. F. W. R.

Not according to his talents and opportunities, but to the use made of them; not to the harvest that is reaped, but to the seed sown. "Every man shall receive his own reward, according to his own labor." Not according to his gifts; not according to his successes; not according to the worldly applause he may have won; but "according to his labor." This meets the case of every disciple, as well the poorest as the richest, as well the obscurest as the greatest, as well the servant with one talent as the servant with five. Only be faithful to your trust, and when the labor of the day is over, and you go up to the great harvest-home, you will be "satisfied." H. A. B.

9-15. Paul's favorite images are drawn, not from the operations and uniform phenomena of the natural world, but from the activities and outward exhibition of human society, from the life of soldiers, from the life of slaves, from the market, from athletic exercises, from agriculture, from architecture. Here he first uses an agricultural metaphor, and then he passes to an architectural. Paul has planted the precious trees. Apollos, and probably others with him, are watering them. Suddenly the image changes to one more capable of being turned to what the apostle wishes to enforce. A building in progress rises before us. Paul has laid the foundation—laid it once for all, and laid it well. He has no objection to say this, for it has been done by the grace of God. On this foundation Apollos and others are building. As to building on another foundation, this is set aside at once. The work is going on, and will go on indefinitely in the future; but it will be tested. A day will come when the fire will burn up those wretched edifices of wood and straw, and leave unharmed in their glorious beauty those that were raised of marble and granite, and decorated with silver and gold. Those who raised such structures as these shall not only be safe but rewarded; those who lost their time on the others shall just escape out of the conflagration, because they built on the right foundation, but their escape shall be barely an escape. H.

9. God's building. The Church below is at best but a small part of the entire structure which belongs to all ages. Much that we behold is, after all, only scaffolding that shall be removed, or rubbish that shall be cast away. But meanwhile the work is going forward, and the walls, however slowly, are rising. Everything in God's providence respecting the present world is made to lead to this. All preaching of the word, diffusion of truth, conversion of sinners, and edification of saints, are means in God's hands for carrying up his structure. Prophets and apostles are humble instruments in the work. J. W. A.

11. "Ye are God's building," he tells his Corinthian converts, and then he immediately alludes to Christ as the foundation of this building, and the only one. If we divest this language of metaphor, its meaning is that the Lord Jesus stands in a relation to his Church similar to that which a foundation bears to a building. His Church rests on him. Its pardon, its holiness, its hope, its blessedness, its safety, its very existence, all depend on him. C. B. —That foundation on which the Christian architect builds is Jesus Christ—that is, his experience of Christ as his Saviour. There may be moral men, amiable men, benevolent and charitable men, who do not have this; but you can not call them Christian men. Their life, admirable in some respects, is not a Christian life. The structure they build may be a splendid pantheon or museum, but it is not a Christian temple. They may use labor and diligence, but the Christian corner-stone is wanting, and when the test-hour comes they will find it so. E. H. G.—Some are all their days laying the foundation, and are never able to build upon it to any comfort to themselves or usefulness to others. And the reason is, because they will be mixing with the foundation stones that are only fit for the building. They will be bringing their obedience, duties, mortification of sin, and the like, unto the foundation. These are precious stones to build with, but unmeet to be first laid to bear upon them the whole weight of the building. The foundation is to be laid in mere grace, mercy, pardon in the blood of Christ; this the soul is to accept of and rest in merely as it is grace, without the consideration of anything in itself, but that it is sinful and obnoxious to ruin. Owen.

13. It takes a spiritual vision to see that nothing but what is invisible is indestructible. Only truth, love, purity, spiritual affections, and spiritual attainments survive that fire which shall try every man's work, of what sort it is. The soul is holier than the scene and the instruments amid which it is trained, because it has an everlasting consciousness, responsibility, judgment. It is not written of our reputation, our trade, or our estate, but of our souls, that they shall "all stand before the judgment-seat of God." F. D. H.

15. Saved so as by fire. Many get to the foundation, "other than which no man can lay," which is "Jesus Christ." The faith which unites them to him is a foundation in themselves, on which is to be built the beautiful fabric of the Christian virtues; but they build nothing upon it at all, or nothing but "wood, hay, and stubble"; or the materials of their character are so heterogeneous that it appears to consist of a strange mixture of the valuable and the worthless. Christian professors with enormous means do nothing. With great influence, they never exert it for great ends; with talents for service, they let them lie unimproved; or, having only one talent, they bury and conceal it because they have not ten. What strange practical inconsistencies are to be seen on all sides! What questionable conformity to the world! What subjection to fashion! What luxury and display! What liberties of speech! What keenness in business—so very nigh to taking an advantage, imposing upon ignorance, or overreaching the unwary! What clutching and covetousness and hardness of heart! What terrible justice in some people; in others what explosions of temper! In most, what a want of harmony and entireness; and in many, at times, what strange apparitions of even the old animal life! Yet, along with all these diversities of defect, or in connection with most of them, there shall be unquestionable proofs of the men having a firm standing on "the foundation"; and there shall be manifest in the entire structure of their habits several portions of solid masonry, and, mixed with the mud and rubble they put into it, a good many valuable and precious things. T. B.

16. The Spirit of God dwelleth in you. No passing visit is here, no sudden but transient illumination, no power fitfully given and suddenly withdrawn. "I will dwell in them, and walk in them; and I will be their God, and they shall be my people." We need motives, strong motives, one and all of us. We need them for purposes of action and for purposes of resistance. And among these none is better and more serviceable than the motive which appeals to the sanctity, the responsibility, the powers, the capabilities implied in that inward presence of the eternal Spirit, which is the great gift of the new covenant between God and man. In moments of moral surprise, in moments of unusual depression, in moments of a felt sense of isolation which threatens to take the heart out of our whole life, in moments of spasmodic daring, when ordinary sanctions have lost their hold upon us, it is well to fall back upon the reassuring, tranquilizing, invigorating resources of such an appeal as that of the apostle: "Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?" H. P. L.

A sublime truth is here! The body of every saint is a temple far more real than that on Mount Zion, and the heart of every saint is a "holiest of all" far more glorious than that of old; for the Shechinah was but a symbol of the divine presence, but the Spirit is infinitely beyond a symbol. He is an actual Deity, positively dwelling in the heart, and beatifying it with his own heaven. Davies.—Roofs arched with gold and palaces adorned with marble are vile in comparison with that house which the Lord has chosen to be his temple, in the which the Holy Ghost dwells. Illuminate this house with the light of righteousness. Its ornaments shall never fade, and it shall dwell hereafter in spotless beauty and eternal majesty. Cyprian.

17. The Corinthian Christians were guilty of sins both against purity and charity. The popular idolatries of Corinth, aggravated by the commercial and maritime importance of the place, would probably have exposed them to considerable temptations to unclean living; and they had even learned to look with self-complacency upon evils which were not tolerated by heathen opinion. And so little did they understand the love which was due to their brethren in Christ, that they evidently regarded the Church as only another form of political life, with its natural divisions of opinion and its heated passions and its pervading earthly taint. For both evils the remedial truth is one and the same: Christians are members of a society which the Spirit inhabits, because he dwells in them individually, and so has made them collectively the body of Christ. H. P. L.

22. Whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas. No doubt there were some differences of views even between Paul, and Peter, and Apollos; for while, on the one hand, they were all enlightened by the Spirit of God, yet, on the other hand, they retained still their human differences of character and disposition, which must on several occasions have been manifest. But Paul was earnest that schism should be ended by all parties remembering that whatever became of the truth or falsehood of their own particular views of Christianity, yet that Christianity according to any of their views was the one great thing which was their glory and their salvation. "Paul, and Apollos, and Peter, are all yours; but you are Christ's." T. A.—There is not a wise or a luminous man of the past, or of the present age, who does not shine to give light to the children of light, who does not belong to all the good. A. R.

The world. The soul, by virtue of union with God, has the divine life in it. Rising above the fears and fascinations of sin, growing into the image of him whose new life is now the soul's life, it becomes absorbed in the pursuit and the enjoyment of something higher and better than it ever tasted or sought before. The sources of pleasure from which the soul drank before are not cut off;

but those sources are themselves purified, and living water springs up even in a desert. Love, friends, letters, music, art, are not less to the soul in Christ than they were when the eye and ear and heart had not been anointed. They are all loved more, enjoyed more, because "All things are yours, and ye are Christ's, and Christ is God's." Prime.

Life, or death. Life is the Christian's in a far higher and fuller sense than it is the worldly man's, since he enjoys it on a far higher level of blessedness, and uses it in a much nobler cause. Even death is his, since, though for a moment it triumphs over him, in the end he triumphs over it, and, while he seems to yield to it, he treads it under his feet. For it is the portal to life; and while our friends are weeping at our bedside a chorus of angels welcomes us into Paradise. What the world dreads, the believer at last welcomes, for it severs us from sin, and takes us to the vision of God. A. W. T.

Things present. Wherever the Lord Jesus takes up his abode, what before was evil, and a complication and accumulation of evils, becomes now a train of God's ministers for good, a chariot of fiery and glorious discipline, to which Satan himself is harnessed, if God pleases, to do God's bidding. G. B. C.

Things to come. Thine are not only all the former and present but also all the future; thine the new heaven and the new earth; thine all the promises and their glorious fulfillment; thine all the battles, and, therefore, also the coming final one between light and darkness, and the mighty victory of light, eternal peace, the unending rest of the people of God! Thine are the angels and all the blessed in the New Jerusalem; thine all the glory of God and Christ in the world of light; for thee shine all the stars in this life and the next; for thee are rising the enduring mansions of the heavenly home. Christlieb.

All are yours. All things are the Christian's—this marvelous life, so full of meaning, so pregnant with infinite opportunities. Still more death, which seems to come like a tyrant—death is his in Christ, his minister to lead him to higher life. Paul is his, to teach him freedom. Apollos his, to animate him with his eloquence. Cephas his, to fire him with his courage. Every author his, to impart to him his treasures. But all things are ours on this condition—that we are Christ's. When the law of the cross is the law of our being, when we have learned to surrender ourselves, then, and then only, they are ours, not we theirs. The Christian is "creation's heir." He may say triumphantly, "The world, the world is mine." F. W. R.

Section 262.

1 CORINTHIANS iv. 1-21.

1 LET a man so account of us, as of the ministers of Christ, and stewards of the mysteries
2 of God. Moreover it is required in stewards, that a man be found faithful. But with me
3 it is a very small thing that I should be judged of you, or of man's judgment: yea, I judge
4 not mine own self. For I know nothing by myself; yet am I not hereby justified: but he
5 that judgeth me is the Lord. Therefore judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come, 6 who both will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and will make manifest the 7 counsels of the hearts: and then shall every man have praise of God. And these things,
8 brethren, I have in a figure transferred to myself and to Apollos for your sakes; that ye 9 might learn in us not to think of men above that which is written, that no one of you be 10 puffed up for one against another. For who maketh thee to differ from another? and what 11 hast thou that thou didst not receive? now if thou didst receive it, why dost thou glory, as 12 if thou hadst not received it?

8 Now ye are full, now ye are rich, ye have reigned as kings without us: and I would to 9 God ye did reign, that we also might reign with you. For I think that God hath set forth 10 us the apostles last, as it were appointed to death: for we are made a spectacle unto the 11 world, and to angels, and to men. We are fools for Christ's sake, but ye are wise in Christ;
12 we are weak, but ye are strong; ye are honourable, but we are despised. Even unto this 13 present hour we both hunger, and thirst, and are naked, and are buffeted, and have no cer-14 tain dwellingplace; and labour, working with our own hands: being reviled, we bless;
15 being persecuted, we suffer it: being defamed, we entreat: we are made as the filth of the 16 world, and are the offscouring of all things unto this day. I write not these things to 17 shame you, but as my beloved sons I warn you. For though ye have ten thousand instruc-
18 tors in Christ, yet have ye not many fathers: for in Christ Jesus I have begotten you through 19 the gospel. Wherefore I beseech you, be ye followers of me. For this cause have I sent 17 unto you Timotheus, who is my beloved son, and faithful in the Lord, who shall bring you into remembrance of my ways which be in Christ, as I teach every where in every church.

 18 Now some are puffed up, as though I would not come to you. But I will come to you 19 shortly, if the Lord will, and will know, not the speech of them which are puffed up, but 20 the power. For the kingdom of God is not in word, but in power. What will ye? shall 21 I come unto you with a rod, or in love, and in the spirit of meekness?

To do right, to do always right, and to do it without concern as to the judgment of human creatures, belongs to the very highest degrees of moral culture, to the strong man in Christ Jesus. Yet we should strive after it as indispensable as well to our holiness as our happiness. Multitudes are daily kept from doing or attempting what they know to be right, by the dread of what fellow-creatures will say or think. In this there is such a weakness that we are prompt to despise it, when presented in the abstract, or in the case of another, while we are perpetually incurring the same condemnation by our indecision and cowardice. As the character thus formed is insusceptible of true greatness, so it is liable to unspeakable misery. No man can lift up his head with manly calmness and peace, who is the slave of other men's judgments. It is, therefore, a matter of great moment, in our discipline of heart and life, to keep before our minds those considerations which shall dispose and enable us to say with Paul, "With me it is a very small thing that I should be judged of you or of man's judgment." J. W. A.

1, 2. These verses are addressed to congregations in order that a right estimate may be formed by them of the ministerial office, which neither, on the one hand, ought to be depreciated, nor, on the other, to be unduly valued. Paul's view was in opposition to all tendencies to worship the man, or to represent the office as magical or mysterious; and, on the other hand, his view was in direct opposition to all opinions which value it only as a sphere for the exhibition of gifts and talents. And in reference to that right, so liberally assumed, of passing judgment, of criticising individual ministers, the apostle teaches that the same definition excludes this right, because of the impossibility of judgment; for all that a steward can have of merit is fidelity, and fidelity is exactly that which men can not judge—it is a secret hidden with God. F. W. R.—As a faithful steward does not curtail to his master's servants their due, but gives them their portion of meat in due season, so is it also with stewards in the kingdom of grace. Thereby they prove themselves to be honest, blameless laborers, by rightly dividing the word of truth, by not corrupting the word of God, by feeding souls unto eternal life with unadulterated doctrine, and with sound words which can not be condemned. Besser.

3. A small thing that I should be judged of you. Not because he was above judgment, not because he was infallible, or teaching truths too grand for them, but because he was to be judged before a tribunal far more awful than Corinthian society. F. W. R.—It is a good observation of Fuller that "those are the best Christians who are more careful to reform themselves than to censure others." The world, it must be expected, will be void of charity toward God's people, and judge them as hypocrites, enthusiasts, and what not; but it is much to be lamented that the children of grace should judge one another so rashly as we often see them do. Hill.

4. "By myself" should be "against myself." When our version was made, "by myself" had this meaning, as may be seen in the comments and sermons of the time. A.—He that judgeth me is the Lord. Suppose men condemn me, yea, suppose all men unite in censure and reprobation, what is this, if He that sitteth in the heavens looks down with approval? This is the only true ground to take in regard to the regulation of our conduct: to do all as in the immediate presence of God and as subject to his animadversion. How serenely, how loftily may a true Christian go on in the performance of some distasteful or unpopular duty, if he can say with assurance, "I know that the eye of my God looks down with approbation on what I am doing." This sustained Paul, and has sustained God's most faithful servants in every age; the thought and assurance of God as ever sitting in judgment upon every act. J. W. A.

We need such an order of men still, not self-assuming or dominant, as "lords over God's heritage," but gentle among them, while loyal to truth and to its God—men of kingly nature, because they serve a heavenly Master, and who are bold to utter his word without fear and without favor. Never since the world began were such men needed more. And let it be remembered that, while this duty falls with double weight on those who have been called to it by the rule of God's house, it does not belong to them alone. Wherever a man feels the force of divine truth within him, he should be fearless in his place to speak it out, without shrinking, and to show that he is a witness for God. It was the noble wish of Moses, "Would that all the Lord's people were prophets," and all that follow him, however humbly, to testify in word or deed to the truth of God, shall have a share in his reward. "This honor have all his saints." Ker.

5. Before the assembled myriads of all the earth's inhabitants, before listening angels, before the great Judge himself, the secrets of our hearts will be laid bare, and our inmost thoughts brought into the light. The veil of hypocrisy will drop off; and many, who in the praise of men have had their reward, will stand exposed in the shame and deformity of their own imaginations. The self-deceiver and the careless alike will be dismayed at the array of sins which dwelt unheeded, if not encouraged, in the secret chambers of their hearts. And the most faithful, watchful Christian may find matter for serious meditation in the truth that his every thought, as well as word and work, must be exposed on that day to the scrutiny of a righteous Judge. J. J.

8. "Ye are," says he, "already become full, ye are already become rich, ye reign without us." They were in spirit and conduct as if the kingdom of Christ had with them already reached its consummation, and they as partakers therein had attained to all riches, to the satisfaction of all their desires. And would this were so, says he; would they had already attained to this participation in the perfected kingdom of Christ; for then, assuredly, the apostles would not have been excluded therefrom, nor would their circumstances be such as they now are. Thus he holds up before them his own life of conflict, in contrast with their false security, their unauthorized and groundless exultation. N.

9. Persons appointed to death. This is an allusion to the Roman theatrical spectacles. In the morning those criminals to whom they gave a chance of escaping with their life fought with the wild beasts armed; but in the afternoon the gladiators fought naked, and he who escaped was only reserved for slaughter to another day; so that they might well be called "persons appointed to death." By comparing the apostles to these devoted persons, Paul hath given us a strong picture of the dangers which the apostles encountered in the course of their ministry: dangers which at length proved fatal to the most of them.

10. We are fools on account of Christ. The apostle repeats ironically the things which his enemies in Corinth said of him. And in the same spirit of irony he attributes to them the contrary qualities. M.

12. We are expressly told, in the history, that at Corinth Paul labored with his own hands. That manual labor he continued at Ephesus (Acts 20: 34); and not only so, but continued it during that particular residence at Ephesus near the conclusion of which this Epistle was written; so that he might with the strictest truth say, at the time of writing the Epistle, "even unto this present hour, we labor, working with our own hands." M. H.—It is during his sojourn at Ephesus that we get our first glimpse of a fact, which was no doubt one of the constant facts of his life—that he supported others as well as himself by his manual toils. When he took leave of the Ephesian elders, he says, "Ye yourselves know that these hands have ministered unto my necessities, and to them that were with me." It is one of the most touching and impressive scenes in a life rich above most in tragic adventures. As we see the apostle lift those thin strong hands, worn and scarred with constant toil, even we are moved by the appeal. Those toil-worn hands speak to us with a still more pathetic eloquence when we know how constant and unremitting were the labors in which they had been occupied. Cox.

15. Here the whole order, work, and result of the ministry are given in brief but significant summary. "In Christ Jesus," who giveth the Spirit, and whom the Spirit glorifieth, Paul, the living preacher, "had begotten" to their new birth the Corinthian disciples, "through the gospel," as the divinely appointed instrument of their renewal and conversion. And here, too, are summarily involved: the new man; his renewal, or new birth; the implied agency of the Spirit; and the instrumentality of knowledge, "the gospel." This unfolds the whole work. The gift of the Spirit, which results in that "new man" wherein dwelleth God, whether as the Father, or as Christ, or as the Holy Ghost, is communicated through, or by, the gospel, by means of knowledge or of divine truth. J. S. S.

16. When Paul says, once and again, I beseech you, be ye followers of me, it has a sound, taken as it may be taken, of conceit, or vanity; but, when we look upon him as a man who goes after Christ in the ways of scorn and suffering patience, bearing his Master's dark flag of patience and loss, and calling others to follow, we only see that he has taken Christ's own spirit, and despises even to send the flock before him, where he does not lead himself. H. B.—It is not good for a man to be living any life which he would not desire to see made perfect and universal through the world. Paul says, "Be what I am"; but Dives cries out of the fire where he lies, "Oh, send and warn my seven brethren lest they come where I am!" The dying Christian tells those beside him of the blessedness of serving Christ. The dying murderer with his last breath warns men from the scaffold not to be what he has been. Oh! test your lives thus! Do not consent to be anything which you would not ask the soul that is dearest to you to be! Be nothing which you would not wish all the world to be! P. B.

17. We have the history of the apostle Paul stated fully and circumstantially in the Acts, and then we have thirteen letters of the same apostle, purporting to have been written during the period covered by the history. If, therefore, the history and the letters are both genuine, we should expect to find the same general character ascribed to the apostle in the history that is indicated by his letters; we should expect to find in the letters numerous minute and undesigned references, such as could not be counterfeited, to the facts stated in the history. And all this we do find. The character of Paul was strongly marked, and no one can doubt whether the Epistles ascribed to him were written by such a man as he is described in the history to have been. How different are the characters of Paul, of Peter, and of John, and yet how perfectly do the writings ascribed to each correspond with his character! M. H.

Section 263.

1 CORINTHIANS v. 1-13.

1 It is reported commonly that there is fornication among you, and such fornication as is
2 not so much as named among the Gentiles, that one should have his father's wife. And ye 3 are puffed up, and have not rather mourned, that he that hath done this deed might be 4 taken away from among you. For I verily, as absent in body, but present in spirit, have 5 judged already, as though I were present, concerning him that hath so done this deed, in 6 the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, when ye are gathered together, and my spirit, with the 7 power of our Lord Jesus Christ, to deliver such an one unto Satan for the destruction of the 8 flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus. Your glorying is not good.
9 Know ye not that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump? Purge out therefore the old 10 leaven, that ye may be a new lump, as ye are unleavened. For even Christ our passover is 11 sacrificed for us: therefore let us keep the feast, not with old leaven, neither with the leaven
12 of malice and wickedness; but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth. I wrote 13 unto you in an epistle not to company with fornicators: yet not altogether with the fornica-tors of this world, or with the covetous, or extortioners, or with idolaters; for then must ye needs go out of the world. But now I have written unto you not to keep company, if any man that is called a brother be a fornicator, or covetous, or an idolator, or a railer, or a drunkard, or an extortioner; with such an one no not to eat. For what have I to do to judge them also that are without? do not ye judge them that are within? but them that are without God judgeth. Therefore put away from among yourselves that wicked person.

1. Ancient vices still infected the Christian converts. They carried into the Church the savor of their old life, for the wine-skin will long retain the flavor with which it has been once imbued. We find from these Epistles that gross immorality still existed, and was even considered a thing to boast of. We find their old philosophy still coloring their Christianity, for, on the foundation of the Oriental idea that the body was the source of all sin, they denied a future resurrection. We find the insolence of wealth at the Lord's Supper. We find spiritual gifts abused by being exhibited for the sake of ostentation.

2. It is a mistake to suppose that punishment is only to reform and warn. It is an expression on earth of God's indignation in heaven against sin. He who has done wrong has identified himself with wrong, and so far is an object of indignation. In our own day we are accustomed to use strange, weak words concerning sin and crime: we say, when a man does wrong, that he has mistaken the way to happiness, and that if a correct notion of real happiness could be given to men, crime would cease. We look on sin as residing, not in a guilty will, but in a mistaken understanding. Thus the Corinthians in Paul's days looked at it, and felt no indignation. They had some soft, feeble way of talking about it. They called it "mental disease," "error,"

"mistake of judgment," "irresistible passion," or I know not what.

In Scripture we read of two principal objects of punishment, viz., as an expression of righteous indignation and the reformation of the offender—his amelioration; and here the merciful character of Christianity comes forth. A third ground is the contagious character of evil. "A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump." Worldly minds, irreverent minds, licentious minds leaven society. You can not be long with persons who by innuendo, double meaning, or lax language show an acquaintance with evil, without feeling in some degree assimilated to them, nor can you easily retain enthusiasm for right among those who detract and scoff at godness. F. W. R.

5. Church discipline is primarily a process of self-purification in the Church, designed for the restoration and maintenance of her essential attribute of holiness. But it necessarily has reference also to the good of the offender on whom it is exercised. And here appears its evangelical element; since even in its strongest form, the anathema, it has in view not punishment but correction, the reclaiming of the soul, to which the temporal punishment is intended to serve only as a means. This is what the apostle intends by delivering a backslider "unto Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus." In this much-mistaken passage, as in the book of Job and 2 Cor. 12 : 7, Satan is conceived as a servant of God in the wider sense, as a being to whom power is committed to send upon men certain bodily chastisements and afflictions, but under the oversight and for the ends of Providence. So in the case before us, Paul expected that God, by means of the prince of darkness, would bring upon the excommunicated fornicator at Corinth some heavy trial, or sudden calamity, but that this punishment might arrest the sinful course of the unfortunate man, drive him to repentance, and result in his salvation in the day of the second coming of Christ. P. S.—There are cases occurring in almost every Church of Christ in which no means avail; applications, advice, prayers, have no permanent favorable effect. The difficulty is found to be unimproved by delay month after month; the Church is exposed to weakness and reproach; and the only hope is in the excision of that member from the body. Not that the body hates that member; not that its removal is not a calamity; but that the general health and salvation require it. R. T.

7. Christ our passover. The gospel passover commemorates a deliverance from spiritual thralldom, of which the release of the Jews from the Egyptian yoke affords but a faint and imperfect emblem. In those complicated sufferings which were the price of our redemption, we not only discover the unsearchable riches of divine love, but we likewise behold the full demerit of sin, and all the horrors of that misery into which we had plunged ourselves by our fatal apostasy; so that our triumph in the great salvation, by recalling to our minds the helpless state in which mercy found us, gives check to every self-exalting thought, and constrains us to ascribe to the free, unmerited favor of God the sole, the undivided praise of all that we have or hope to enjoy. R. W.

8. The words, "let us keep the feast with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth," look very like words suggested by the Passover season; at least they have, upon that supposition, a force and significance which do not belong to them upon any other; and it is not a little remarkable that the hints casually dropped in the Epistle, concerning particular parts of the year, should coincide with this supposition. Paley.

9-11. Many Corinthian Christians were addicted to those sins of impurity which they had practiced in the days of their heathenism, and which disgraced their native city even among the heathen. We can not wonder if it proved most difficult to root out immorality from the rising Church. The offenders against Christian chastity were exceedingly numerous at this period; and it was especially with the object of attempting to reform them, and to check the growing mischief, that Paul now determined to visit Corinth. He has himself described this visit as a painful one; he went in sorrow at the tidings he had received, and when he arrived he found the state of things even worse than he had expected; he tells us that it was a time of personal humiliation to himself, occasioned by the flagrant sins of so many of his own converts; he reminds the Corinthians afterward how he had "mourned" over those who had dishonored the name of Christ by "the uncleanness and fornication and wantonness which they had committed." H.

10. The Greeks and Romans, before the time of Christianity, had no idea, or even the faintest vestige of an idea, of what in the Scriptural system is called sin; and the idea was utterly and exquisitely inappreciable by pagan Greece and Rome. De Quincey.

Section 264.

1 CORINTHIANS vi. 1-20.

1 DARE any of you, having a matter against another, go to law before the unjust, and not
2 before the saints? Do ye not know that the saints shall judge the world? and if the 3 world shall be judged by you, are ye unworthy to judge the smallest matters? Know ye 4 not that we shall judge angels? how much more things that pertain to this life? If 5 then ye have judgments of things pertaining to this life, set them to judge who are least 6 esteemed in the church. I speak to your shame. Is it so, that there is not a wise man
7 among you? no, not one that shall be able to judge between his brethren? But brother
8 goeth to law with brother, and that before the unbelievers. Now therefore there is utterly 9 a fault among you, because ye go to law one with another. Why do ye not rather take 10 wrong? Why do ye not rather suffer yourselves to be defrauded? Nay, ye do wrong, and 11 defraud, and that your brethren.

9 Know ye not that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God? Be not deceived:
neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor effeminate, nor abusers of themselves 10 with mankind, nor thieves, nor covetous, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor extortioners, shall 11 inherit the kingdom of God. And such were some of you: but ye are washed, but ye are sanctified, but ye are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God.
12 All things are lawful unto me, but all things are not expedient: all things are lawful for 13 me, but I will not be brought under the power of any. Meats for the belly, and the belly for meats: but God shall destroy both it and them. Now the body is not for fornication, 14 but for the Lord; and the Lord for the body. And God hath both raised up the Lord, and 15 will also raise up us by his own power. Know ye not that your bodies are the members of Christ? shall I then take the members of Christ, and make them the members of an harlot? God forbid. What? know ye not that he which is joined to an harlot is one body? for two, saith he, shall be one flesh. But he that is joined unto the Lord is one spirit. Flee fornication. Every sin that a man doeth is without the body; but he that committeth fornication sinneth against his own body. What? know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost which is in you, which ye have of God, and ye are not your own? For ye are bought with a price: therefore glorify God in your body, and in your spirit, which are God's.

Redeemed, and yet owing service—this describes the disciple of Christ; redeemed, but just on that account bound to a walk hallowed of God. And who does not feel on reflection how much is here expressed to us in few words? "Ye are bought with a price"; inexhaustible declaration, well deserving to be written in indelible characters in the deepest recesses of the heart! Bought, ransomed, from what else than from the deadly power of sin, which, without Christ, held us as in iron fetters, and made us guilty before the face of spotless holiness! For how much ransomed? For a price not to be fully estimated even by angels, a price only within the reach of almighty power; by holiness demanded, by mercy paid, and through grace offered even to the chief of sinners: the blood of God's incarnate son, the sacrifice of his divine yet human life, through the act of highest love, and yet of absolute obedience. And whereunto redeemed, if not in order "that we, being delivered out of the hand of our enemies, might serve him without fear, in holiness and righteousness before him, all the days of our life"? "Therefore glorify God," writes the apostle, and thus binds together in the most beautiful manner grace and duty. This is the great principle of action for every really Christian life. "Glorify God," in the inner chamber, in the home circle, in society, under the father's roof, and far from the mother's eye; "glorify God," if thou wilt not that thy life should be useless, unhappy—nay, even lost. Glorify him "in your body," as in the temple in which you are the appointed priests, and this through all your members; and in his power keep yourselves pure. Glorify him "in your spirit," by directing all its powers and energies to the one grand aim, that God really may receive full honor from the work of his hands. Yea, verily, here is a task—an enjoyment for two lives; and the heart in which the work of sanctification has begun may thrill as with a blessed anticipation of what it shall be when the God of his salvation shall be perfectly glorified. Van O.

THIS Epistle deals with a large variety of isolated questions which the Corinthian Church had put to him on some previous occasion. Hence the Epistle is one of Christian casuistry—an application of Christian principles to the various circumstances and cases of conscience which arise continually in the daily life of a highly civilized and highly artificial community. This chapter contains the apostle's judgment on two such questions: 1. The manner of deciding Christian quarrels (vs. 1-11). 2. The character of Christian liberty, what is meant by it, and how it is limited (vs. 12-20).

1, 2. It appears from this account that questions arose among the Corinthian Christians which needed litigation: questions of wrongs done to persons or to property. These wrongs they carried to the heathen courts of judicature for redress. For this the apostle reproves them severely. F. W. R. —It should be remembered that the law gave its sanction to the decision pronounced in a litigated case by arbitrators privately chosen, so that the Christians might obtain a just decision of their mutual differences without resorting to the heathen tribunals. C.

3. We shall judge angels. When Christians are spoken of as kings and priests, it is not meant that they wear a crown or minister at an altar, but rather that in heaven they are exalted and honored like kings and priests on earth. Official relation is not at all designated, merely official dignity. In this way the office of a judge is most appropriately employed to image forth the same elevation. It is one of the most dignified and imposing of human titles. It brings before the mind the picture of venerable wisdom upon its elevated seat, dictating the noblest of sentiments to the noblest of pupils, and receiving the homage of the crowd. What more natural than that the beings, who are figuratively decked with the scepter of royal dignity and the miter of sacerdotal rank, should put on also the vestments of the judicial station. They receive the admiring tribute of the world, and they may be styled the judges of the world. They are in some respects more glorious than the angels of God, and they may be said to judge those angels. The sentiment here taught is that Christians in heaven will in some respects be superior to angels. Homer.

7-11. His argument runs thus: You ask me how the oppressed are to be freed from gross oppressors except by an appeal to legal justice? how flagrant crimes—such as that condemned in the fifth chapter—are to be prevented in Christians? I answer, The Church of Christ does not include such persons in the idea of its existence at all. It only contemplates men “washed, sanctified, justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God.” But drunkards, revilers, extortioners, covetous men, gross sensualists—I can not tell you how to legislate for such, for such ought not to be in your society at all. F. W. R.

He gives them a catalogue of the basest sinners that their profligate city or the whole earth could furnish, and then he says to these very men, these men destined for the walls of God’s glorious house, “Such were some of you.” We come then to this conclusion—no meanness, no guilt, will cause God to reject any one of us. An earthly builder is obliged to cast away bad materials, for he can not alter them. God has promised to cast away none that come to him, for he can alter them. He is willing to take the worst, for he is able to transform them and make them the very best. C. B.

11. First of all we are clean as He is clean, then we are set apart as He is set apart, then we are righteous as He is righteous. Cleansed, sanctified, justified—these are the three conditions or privileges into which a believing man is brought from the moment that, by faith, he identifies himself with Christ! All this in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God. The name washes, sanctifies, justifies. It is a name of power, containing everything in it that a sinner needs. He who consents to use it gets all that it contains! The Spirit washes, sanctifies, justifies. He has his part to do in all these, and he does it as the Spirit of Omnipotence! Bonar.

12. Men in the Corinthian Church, having heard the apostle teach the law of liberty, pushed that doctrine so far as to make it mean a right to do whatsoever a man wills to do. Accordingly he found himself called on to oppose a system of self-indulgence and sensuality, a gratification of the appetites and the passions taught systematically as Christianity. By these teachers self-gratification was maintained on the ground of the rights of Christian liberty and of the rights of nature. They said, We may eat what we will. We are free from the observance of days. All things are lawful. That which is done by a child of God ceases to be sin. Paul met this exaggeration by declaring that Christian liberty is limited, first, by Christian expediency, “All things are lawful”—yes, “but all things are not expedient”; and secondly, by its own nature, “All things are lawful for me, but I will not be brought under the power of any.” F. W. R.

Take the various forms of worldly amusement. So far as they are really amusements and not labor and sorrow (which in fact many of them are, dreadfully jading the body and mind, and exhausting the energies), and so far as no breach of God’s moral law is involved in them, they are innocent and lawful. But does any one find by experience that some worldly amusement, though innocent in itself, and very possibly innocent for others, yet has a tendency to influence his passions, to set up his vanity, and to brush rudely from his mind the thought of God’s presence? Then let there be no compromise. Or should he experience no evil spiritual effect from the indulgence, or at least none of which he is conscious, may he abandon himself without restriction to the amusement in question, live in it, sacrifice a considerable amount of money, leisure, time to it? Surely not. To live in any amusement is to be the slave of it. And the Christian should spurn any such dependence. The tone which he takes up toward all innocent enjoyments and recreations should be just that of the apostle, “All things are lawful for me, but I will not be brought under the power of any.” Besides, the Christian dares not give himself full latitude in this respect. With an insidious heart, with crafty, spiritual foes watching for his halting, with that awful warning respecting the straitness of the gate and the narrowness of the way ringing in his ear, it would not be safe to do so. He sports not within a very wide margin of the precipice’s edge. E. M. G.

13. The second plea of the teachers Paul is here condemning, is the rights of Nature. There is some difficulty in the exposition of this chapter, because the apostle mixes together the pleas of his opponents with his own answers to those pleas—states them himself, in order that he may reply to them. The first part of the thirteenth verse contains two of these pleas; the second part of this verse, with the fourteenth, contains his reply. 1. “Meats for the belly, and the belly for meats”—a natural correspondency. Here are appetites, and things made on purpose to satisfy appetites. “Therefore,” said they, “Nature herself says, ‘Enjoy!’” 2. The transitoriness of this enjoyment furnishes an argument for the enjoyment. “God shall bring to an end both it and them.” That is, the body will perish, so will the food and the enjoyments—they do not belong to eternity, therefore indulgence is a matter of indifference. It is foolish ignorance to think that these are sins any more than the appetites of brutes which perish. To the argument about correspondency of appetites with the gratifications provided for them, he replies thus: “The body is not for self-indulgence but for the Lord, and the Lord for the body.” In other words, he tells of a more exact mutual correspondency. He reveals a true and higher nature. F. W. R.—The body is for the Lord Jesus, to be consecrated by his indwelling to his service; and the Lord Jesus is for the body, to consecrate it by dwelling therein in the person of his Spirit.

15. Paul's argument here is, that sins of unchastity, though bodily acts, yet injure a part of our nature which will not be destroyed by death, and which is closely connected with our moral well-being. And it is a fact no less certain than mysterious that moral and spiritual ruin is caused by such sins, which human wisdom (when untaught by revelation) held to be as blameless as eating and drinking. C.

Your bodies are the members of Christ.

A man who is of a cleanly disposition loves to wear clean garments. The body is the garment of the soul, and a clean heart will preserve a pure body. Remember, Christians, by what hand your bodies were made, by what guest they are inhabited, by what price they are purchased, in what laver they have been washed, and to whose eye they shall hereafter be presented. Jenkyn.

19, 20. We hardly know which to admire most in this exhortation, the strength or the grandeur with which it is enforced. It makes duty appear so reasonable that we feel at once condemned if we shrink from it; and yet where in the whole Bible can be found a loftier description of the Christian's blessedness? And this is Paul's usual manner. He connects with the duty he inculcates some exalted privilege, and thus ennobles the service to which he calls us; causing us to glory in our work while we are performing it. Here he tells us whose the Christian is—he is God's; how he became God's—he has been "bought with a price"; what God makes him—"the temple of the Holy Ghost"; and then, what God expects from him—glory. C. B.

The second great truth peculiar to Spiritual Christianity is that of the sovereign and abiding influence of the Holy Spirit in renovating the soul in each instance in which it is renovated. This doctrine also, like the propitiation effected by the Son of God, while in one view it is an inscrutable mystery, is in another an intelligible truth, which accords at once with our consciousness and with the principles of sound philosophy. The contact of the infinite mind with the finite is indeed a depth; but not so the restoration of the moral faculties as a matter of consciousness. Let it only be granted that true felicity must consist in the predominance of holy affections or of emotions habitually tending toward God, and let it also be granted that no such affections ordinarily belong to us nor spontaneously spring up or grow with our growth, then must we not acknowledge that the doctrine so clearly affirmed in Scripture of the sovereign renovating influences of the Holy Spirit is full of consolation to ourselves, as well as strictly accordant with the best conceptions we can form of the goodness of God? Happy indeed, and ennobling as well as efficacious, is the belief that the body of the Christian is "the temple of the Holy Ghost"—a doctrine this which precludes at once despondency and presumption. For how should we despond, if He who "creates us anew in Christ Jesus" is almighty? or how presume, if we be convinced that, were the sacred energy withdrawn, there "would remain in us no good thing"? I. T.—Happy would it be for us if we could always maintain an unwavering persuasion as to the reality and the greatness of this inhabitation of God through the Spirit. It would confer a dignity, of which we now know too little, upon the whole tenor of a Christian life. Temptation would be disarmed by the sense of such a presence, and we should tremble at the thought of grieving one so great and yet so near. J. W. A.

19. Not your own. A man does not own himself till God owns him, and that ownership is solemnly acknowledged. He is a slave to his baser nature, even though his chains are inviting as diamond rings and bracelets of gold. While a passion against which reason revolts domineers over him, while a lust which conscience rebukes scoffs at conscience, he is ruled by a tyrant as vile and base as his own deformity. E. H. G.

20. Bought with a price. A word made us, a Calvary bought us; creation was painless, redemption was a torture. The price paid measures God's estimate of us. He does not pay a life so dear to him for souls that are insignificant. God paid Christ for them—the gold of his heart. Stand at the cross, and there God shows you and the angels his estimate of souls. That he might win them back, that he might have them again, he paid that price. J. D.—Therefore glorify God. As creatures who derive their being from God, we are bound to serve him to the utmost extent of the powers he hath given us. But his redeeming grace brings us under a new and still more endearing obligation to his service. Surely nothing can appear more just and equitable than that he who bought us should possess us, and that the ransomed should be entirely devoted to their Redeemer. R. W.

Which are God's. The being that lives continually in God may well be called God's. The whole man, from center to circumference, the man developed and the man undeveloped, all that lies within these souls in germ, waiting other scenes and other eyes and other influences to bring it out—all, all is God's. He stamps it his. We are only free when we come into the possession of God. Till then we are bond-servants—free ever after. We lose ourselves in God. When we allow God to call us his, then he allows us to call him ours. He gains a creature and we gain a Creator. He gains a lost sinner and we gain a Redeeming Saviour and an eternal Father and Friend. J. D.

Section 265.

1 CORINTHIANS vii. 1-40.

1 Now concerning the things whereof ye wrote unto me : It is good for a man not to touch
 2 a woman. Nevertheless, to avoid fornication, let every man have his own wife, and let 3 every woman have her own husband. Let the husband render unto the wife due benevo-
 4 lence : and likewise also the wife unto the husband. The wife hath not power of her own 5 body, but the husband : and likewise also the husband hath not power of his own body,
 6 but the wife. Defraud ye not one the other, except it be with consent for a time, that ye
 7 may give yourselves to fasting and prayer ; and come together again, that Satan tempt you 8 not for your incontinency. But I speak this by permission, and not of commandment. For 9 I would that all men were even as I myself. But every man hath his proper gift of God, 10 one after this manner, and another after that. I say therefore to the unmarried and widows, 11 It is good for them if they abide even as I. But if they cannot contain, let them marry :
 12 for it is better to marry than to burn. And unto the married I command, yet not I, but the 13 Lord, Let not the wife depart from her husband : but and if she depart, let her remain un-14 married, or be reconciled to her husband : and let not the husband put away his wife. But 15 to the rest speak I, not the Lord : If any brother hath a wife that believeth not, and she be 16 pleased to dwell with him, let him not put her away. And the woman which hath an hus-17 band that believeth not, and if he be pleased to dwell with her, let her not leave him. For 18 the unbelieving husband is sanctified by the wife, and the unbelieving wife is sanctified by 19 the husband : else were your children unclean ; but now are they holy. But if the unbel-
 20 lieving depart, let him depart. A brother or a sister is not under bondage in such cases :
 21 but God hath called us to peace. For what knowest thou, O wife, whether thou shalt save 22 thy husband ? or how knowest thou, O man, whether thou shalt save thy wife ?

17 But as God hath distributed to every man, as the Lord hath called every one, so let him
 18 walk. And so ordain I in all churches. Is any man called being circumcised ? let him not 19 become uncircumcised. Is any called in uncircumcision ? let him not be circumcised. Cir-
 20 cumcision is nothing, and uncircumcision is nothing, but the keeping of the commandments 21 of God. Let every man abide in the same calling wherein he was called. Art thou called 22 being a servant ? care not for it : but if thou mayest be made free, use it rather. For he that 23 is called in the Lord, being a servant, is the Lord's freeman : likewise also he that is called,
 24 being free, is Christ's servant. Ye are bought with a price ; be not ye the servants of men.
 25 Brethren, let every man, wherein he is called, therein abide with God. Now concerning 26 virgins I have no commandment of the Lord : yet I give my judgment, as one that hath ob-
 27 tained mercy of the Lord to be faithful. I suppose therefore that this is good for the pres-28 ent distress, I say, that it is good for a man so to be. Art thou bound unto a wife ? seek 29 not to be loosed. Art thou loosed from a wife ? seek not a wife. But and if thou marry, 30 thou hast not sinned ; and if a virgin marry, she hath not sinned. Nevertheless such shall 31 have trouble in the flesh : but I spare you. But this I say, brethren, the time is short : it 32 remaineth, that both they that have wives be as though they had none ; and they that weep, 33 as though they wept not ; and they that rejoice, as though they rejoiced not ; and they 34 that buy, as though they possessed not ; and they that use this world, as not abusing it : for 35 the fashion of this world passeth away.

32 But I would have you without carefulness. He that is unmarried careth for the things 33 that belong to the Lord, how he may please the Lord : but he that is married careth for the 34 things that are of the world, how he may please his wife. There is difference also between 35 a wife and a virgin. The unmarried woman careth for the things of the Lord, that she may 36 be holy both in body and in spirit ; but she that is married careth for the things of the 37 world, how she may please her husband. And this I speak for your own profit ; not that I 38 may cast a snare upon you, but for that which is comely, and that ye may attend upon the 39 Lord without distraction. But if any man think that he behaveth himself uncomely to-40 ward his virgin, if she pass the flower of her age, and need so require, let him do what he 41 will, he sinneth not : let them marry. Nevertheless he that standeth stedfast in his heart, 42 having no necessity, but hath power over his own will, and hath so decreed in his heart
 43 that he will keep his virgin, doeth well. So then he that giveth her in marriage doeth well ;
 44 but he that giveth her not in marriage doeth better. The wife is bound by the law as long 45 as her husband liveth ; but if her husband be dead, she is at liberty to be married to whom 46 she will ; only in the Lord. But she is happier if she so abide, after my judgment : and I think also that I have the Spirit of God.

EACH man's wisdom and happiness must consist in doing, as well as his faculties will admit, the work which God sets him. So thought and so wrote, by immediate inspiration, the great apostle of the Gentiles. He did not counsel his converts to join himself and Barnabas in their missionary tours; but while reminding them ever and anon that the great system of society would ere long run down and come to an end—ringing ever and anon the great funeral knell of the world, "the fashion of this world passeth away"—he told them distinctly and emphatically that so long as the system still worked on, each one was to retain his position in it. "Brethren, let every man, wherein he is called, therein abide with God." Ah! "with God." Those words wrap up the secret of which we are in search, the secret by which we may do God service in our daily business, and convert the most secular occupation, so long as it be an innocent one, into fine gold of the altar. E. M. G.

This world is not yours; thank God it is not. Things are passing; our friends are dropping off from us; strength is giving way; our relish for earth is going; and the world no longer wears to our hearts the radiance that once it wore. We have the same sky above us and the same scenes around us, but the freshness that our hearts extracted from everything in boyhood, and the glory that seemed to rest once on earth and life, has faded away for ever. Sad and gloomy truths to the man who is going down to the grave with his work undone. Not sad to the Christian, but rousing, exciting, invigorating. If it be the eleventh hour, we have no time for folding of the hands; we will work the faster. Through the changefulness of life; through the solemn tolling of the bell of Time, which tells us that another, and another, and another are gone before us; through the noiseless rush of a world which is going down with gigantic footsteps into nothingness. Let not the Christian slack his hand from work; for he that doeth the will of God may defy hell itself to quench his immortality. F. W. R.

In the application of the principles of Christianity to the varying circumstances of life, innumerable difficulties had arisen, and the Corinthians upon these difficulties had put certain questions to the apostle Paul. We have here the apostle's answers to many of these questions. It is manifestly plain that there are many questions in which right and wrong are not variable, but indissoluble and fixed; while there are questions, on the other hand, where these terms are not fixed, but variable, fluctuating, altering, dependent upon circumstances. As, for instance, those in which the apostle teaches in the present chapter the several duties and advantages of marriage and celibacy. There may be circumstances in which it is the duty of a Christian man to be married; there are others in which it may be his duty to remain unmarried. These are questions of casuistry, which depend on the particular case; from which word the term "casuistry" is derived.

6. The real distinction is not between inspired and uninspired, but between a decision in matters of Christian duty and advice in matters of Christian prudence. It is abundantly evident that God can not give advice; he can only issue a command. When we come to advice, there is introduced the human element. In all such cases, therefore, as are dependent upon circumstances the apostle speaks as one whose judgment we have no right to find fault with or to cavil at, who lays down what is a matter of Christian prudence, and not a bounden and universal duty.

10, 11. The apostle here gives his inspired decision, first, concerning the sanctity of the marriage-bond between two Christians. His verdict is given in the tenth verse. He lays down the principle that the union is an indissoluble one. Marriage is of all earthly unions almost the only one permitting of no change but that of death. It is not a union merely between two creatures, it is a union between two spirits; and the intention of that bond is to perfect the nature of both, by supplementing their deficiencies with the force of contrast, giving to each sex those excellences in which it is naturally deficient; to the one, strength of character and firmness of moral will, to the other, sympathy, meekness, tenderness. And just so solemn, and just so glorious as these ends are for which the union was contemplated and intended, just so terrible are the consequences if it be perverted and abused. For there is no relationship which has so much power to enoble and to exalt. Very strong language does the apostle use in this chapter respecting it: "What knowest thou, O wife, whether thou shalt save thy husband? or how knowest thou, O man, whether thou shalt save thy wife?" The very power of saving belongs to this relationship. And, on the other hand, there is no earthly relationship which has so much power to wreck and ruin the soul.

12, 13. The second decision which the apostle makes is as to the sanctity of the marriage bond between a Christian and one who is a heathen. With his usual inspired wisdom he decides that the marriage bond is sacred still. Diversities of religious opinion can not sanction separation.

14. They are holy. It follows, if the children are holy in this sense of dedicated to God, and are capable of Christian relationship, then the marriage relation was not unhallowed, but sacred and indissoluble. The value of this argument in the present day depends on its relationship to baptism. The baptismal question is this: whether we are baptized because we are the children of God, or whether we are the children of God because we are baptized. The apostle's argument is full, decisive, and unanswerable. He does not say that these children were Christian, or clean, because they were baptized, but they were the children of God because they were the children of one Christian parent.

17-22. The third decision which the apostle gives, the third principle which he lays down, is but the development of the last. Christianity, he says, does not interfere with existing relationships. Christian men were to remain in those relationships in which they were when called, and in them to develop the inward spirituality of the Christian life. Then he applies this principle in two ways. With respect to the Church, he says: "Is any man called being circumcised? let him not become uncircumcised. Is any called in uncircumcision? let him not be circumcised." Christianity required no change in these outward things, for it was not in these that the depth and reality of the kingdom of Christ consisted. Lastly, the apostle applies this principle to that civil relationship which, of all others, was the most difficult to harmonize with Christianity—slavery. "Art thou called," he says, "being a servant? Care not for it." This occurred in an age in which slavery had reached its worst and most fearful form, an age in which the emperors were accustomed, not unfrequently, to feed their fish with living slaves; when captives were led to fight in the amphitheatre with wild beasts or with each other, to glut the Roman appetite for blood upon a Roman holiday. And yet, fearful as it was, the apostle says, "Care not for it." F. W. R.

Verse 21 ought to stand, "Wast thou called being a slave? Care not for it: nay, even if thou canst be made free, use it [slavery] rather"; i. e., "abide in the calling wherein thou wast called." As the English version now stands, it bears a sense directly contrary to that which the apostle is enjoining; viz., the sense that the slave should get liberated if he could, which would be to desert the calling wherein he was called. Throughout this passage "servant" should be "slave"; otherwise the strong recommendation of the apostle is weakened. A.

24. Having found him, the business of life is to follow Christ. In following our respective callings we are to follow him. We may not perhaps be called away from our counters like Matthew, or our ships and nets like Peter and John, or our law-studies like Paul, but we must give up ourselves, in all these pursuits, to Christ, and must pursue them for Christ, and pursue him in them. A merchant who truly pursues his business for Christ, and maintains always a frame of heavenly-mindedness, may be so far forth a greater Christian than a minister of the gospel, who pursues his business for Christ; there being more to be overcome in the former case, greater difficulties in the way, and perhaps greater temptations. And certainly a man's crown of glory by and by will be determined, not by the position he filled, but the manner in which he filled it, whatever it might be; and the sacrifices he made, whatever they were. G. B. C.—To Paul, the work to which Paul was called of God, and for which Paul was prepared of God; and to you, your work, to which you have been equally called, and for which, doubt it not, you have been equally prepared. Whoever you are, and whatever you may have to do, be content with the task which is fallen to you; and while magnifying it, if God shall afford you the opportunity, be less solicitous to magnify than to fulfill it, that is, to leave no part of its duties which shall not be entered and penetrated by your action. Monod.

Abide with God. Certainly no man's calling is a calling away from God or godliness. Those are very ignorant who think themselves so closely tied up to their particular callings six days in the week that they must not intermeddle with any religious duties during those days. God, who is the Lord of time, has reserved some part of it to himself every day. Though the Jews were commanded to labor six days of the week, yet they were instructed also to offer up the morning and evening sacrifice daily. Brooks.

26-28. In the Church of Corinth there were two opposite parties holding views diametrically opposed to one another—one honoring the married and depreciating the unmarried life—the other attributing peculiar dignity and sanctity to celibacy, and looking down with contempt upon the married Christian state. Paul does not decide, as we might have been led to suppose he would, from his own peculiarity of disposition, upon one side only; but raises into relief the advantages and excellences of both. He attributes no intrinsic merit or dignity to either celibacy or marriage. The comparative advantages of these two states he decides with reference to two considerations: first of all, with respect to their comparative power in raising the character of the individual, and afterward with reference to the opportunities which each respectively gives for the service of God.

29-31. Observe the deep wisdom of this apostolic decision. In point of fact, it comes to this: Christianity consists of principles, but the application of those principles is left to every man's individual conscience. With respect to all the questions which had been brought before him, the apostle applies the same principle; the cases upon which he decided were many and various, but the large, broad principle of his decision remains the same in all. You may marry, and you have not sinned; you may remain unmarried, and you do not sin; if you are invited to a heathen feast, you may go, or you may abstain from going; you may remain a slave, or you may become free; in these things Christianity does not consist. But what it does demand is this: that whether married or unmarried, whether a slave or free, in sorrow or in joy, you are to live in a spirit higher and loftier than that of the world.

The apostle gives us two motives for this Christian unworldliness. The first is this: "The time is short." He turns, as it were, entirely away from the subject, as if worn out and wearied by the comparatively trivial character of the questions, as if this balancing of one earthly condition or advantage with another were but a solemn trifling compared with eternal things, and speaks of the shortness of time. The thought of time is solemn and awful to all minds in proportion to their depth. Let but a man possess himself of this thought, that time is short, that eternity is long, and he has learned the first great secret of unworldliness. The second motive which the apostle gives us is the changing character of the external world. "The fashion of this world passeth away"; literally, "the scenery of this world," a dramatic expression drawn from the Grecian stage. The principle of Christian unworldliness is to "use this world as not abusing it." The spirit of the world says: "Time is short, therefore use it while you have it; take your fill of pleasure while you may." Christianity says: "Use this world"; but in opposition to the spirit of the world it adds: "Do not abuse it." Unworldliness is this: to hold things from God in the perpetual conviction that they will not last; to have the world, and not to let the world have us; to be the world's masters, and not the world's slaves. F. W. R.

Paul was in the midst of work, full of the interest and joy of living, holding the reins of many complicated labors in his hands, and he quietly said: "This is not going to last long. Very soon it will be over." There is simply a calm and satisfied recognition of a fact. It is the quiet statement of a great eternal necessity, at which the wise man must feel the same kind of serious joy as that with which he follows the movements of the stars, and looks to see day and night inevitably give place to one another. P. B.

30. Paul found the secret of the wisdom that at once allows these tender alternations of human feeling, and yet subjects them to a holier faith: "They that weep should be as though they wept not; and they that rejoice, as though they rejoiced not." Because there is a life, possible to the soul through the Spirit, in which fear and mourning and suffering and death itself are swallowed up and lost, like bubbles on some calm, deep stream. F. D. H.

31. Use this world. Religion bars not the lawful delights that are taken in natural things, but teaches the moderate and regular use of them, which is far the sweeter; for things lawful in themselves are in their excess sinful, and so prove bitterness in the end; and if in some cases it requires the forsaking of lawful enjoyments for God and for his glory, it is generous and more truly delightful to deny them for this reason than to enjoy them. Men have done much this way for the love of their country and by a principle of moral virtue; but to lose any delight or to suffer any hardship for that highest end, the glory of God, and by the strength of love to him, is far more excellent and truly pleasant. L.

Religion is the art of being and of doing good; to be an adept in it is to become just, truthful, sincere, self-denied, gentle, forbearing, pure in word and thought and deed. And the school for learning this art is not the closet but the world; the common world, with its cares and temptations, its rivalries and competitions, its hourly, ever-recurring trials of temper and character. Prayer, praise, and holy ordinances are necessary to religion—no man can be religious without them. But religion is mainly and chiefly the glorifying God amid the duties and trials of the world; the bearing us manfully, wisely, courageously, for the honor of Christ, our great leader in the conflict of life. Caird.

As not abusing it. All immoderate use of the world and its delights wrongs the soul in its spiritual condition, makes it sickly and feeble; benumbs the graces of the spirit, and fills the soul with sleepy vapors; makes it grow secure and heavy in spiritual exercises, and obstructs the way and motion of the Spirit of God in the soul; therefore, if you would be spiritual, healthful, and vigorous, and enjoy much of the consolations of heaven, be sparing and sober in those of the earth, and what you abate of the one shall be certainly made up in the other. L.—A pleasure-seeking soul never can be unselfish, magnanimous, serene, brave, pure. Such qualities come from sources far higher than the love of personal enjoyment. They come from the love of truth, from the practice of duty, from the habit of self-sacrifice, from seriousness, reflection, prayer. The love of pleasure can not give these things, but the love and pursuit of pleasure can take them away; will certainly much diminish their strength, and put them all in peril. It is therefore one of the Christian's daily lessons to teach himself effectually how to "use this world as not abusing it"; i. e., how to extract from present things all fair and honest enjoyment, without allowing selfishness and mere appetite so to touch and transmute them in the process that the enjoyment shall have some admixture of baser elements, and be no longer the thing which the divine beneficence provides for man's hunger and thirst. A. R.

In verses 36 and 37, "his virgin" should be "his virgin daughter." The case supposed is that of a father, doubtful whether he shall or shall not give his daughter in marriage. A.

Section 266.

1 CORINTHIANS viii. 1-13.

1 Now as touching things offered unto idols, we know that we all have knowledge. Knowl-
 2 edge puffeth up, but charity edifieth. And if any man think that he knoweth any thing, 3 he knoweth nothing yet as he ought to know. But if any man love God, the same is 4 known of him. As concerning therefore the eating of those things that are offered in sacrifice unto idols, we know that an idol is nothing in the world, and that there is none 5 other God but one. For though there be that are called gods, whether in heaven or in 6 earth, (as there be gods many, and lords many,) but to us there is but one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him; and one Lord Jesus Christ, by whom are all things, 7 and we by him. Howbeit there is not in every man that knowledge: for some with conscience of the idol unto this hour eat it as a thing offered unto an idol; and their conscience 8 being weak is defiled. But meat commendeth us not to God: for neither, if we eat, are we 9 the better; neither, if we eat not, are we the worse. But take heed lest by any means this 10 liberty of your's become a stumblingblock to them that are weak. For if any man see thee which hast knowledge sit at meat in the idol's temple, shall not the conscience of him 11 which is weak be emboldened to eat those things which are offered to idols; and through 12 thy knowledge shall the weak brother perish, for whom Christ died? But when ye sin so 13 against the brethren, and wound their weak conscience, ye sin against Christ. Wherefore, if meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no flesh while the world standeth, lest I make my brother to offend.

RELIGION is the devotion of the soul to God. Then everything besides is not religion, but at most a means to it. That is true about all Christian ordinances. It is true about all acts and forms of Christian worship. These are not religion, but means to it. Their only value and their only test is, Do they help men to know and feel Christ and his truth? It is true about laws of life and many points of conventional morality. Remember the grand freedom with which the apostle dealt with the question about meats offered to idols. The same principle guided him when he said, "Meat commendeth us not to God; for neither if we eat are we the better, neither if we eat not are we the worse." The separation is broad and deep. On one side are all externals, rites, ceremonies, politics, church arrangements, forms of worship, modes of life, practices of morality, doctrines, and creeds—all which are externals to the soul; on the other is faith working through love, the inmost attitude and deepest emotion of the soul. The great heap is fuel; the flame is loving faith. The only worth of the fuel is to feed the flame; otherwise it is of no avail. We are joined to God by faith. Whatever strengthens that is precious as a help, but is worthless as a substitute. A. M.

1. Knowledge puffeth up. It does not say mistaken knowledge, or error, but knowledge in general, and, consequently, truth as well as error. Love edifieth. To edify is to construct, to build, to erect a solid monument or habitable abode; in two words, to produce a positive result. This is the true meaning of the word edify. Thus, then, in truth (if it is only thought) there is inflation, wind, nothing; in love is the positive and the real. Such is the doctrine of Paul. It is also evidently that of John, when he says that he who loves God knows him. A. V.—The understanding does not redeem the heart, for then were the learned the converted. Reason can not give man regeneration, though it can make him proud, and lead him into wrong paths. Reason is not the redeemer of men, but Jesus Christ the Crucified One. A. C.

4. The idol is nothing as a god, and has no share in the government of the world. The heathen had three classes of deities: the celestial gods, supposed to reside generally in the heavens; the terrestrial, called demons (see ch. 10 : 20), and the infernal. M.

5, 6. There is much of the spirit of these Corinthians existing now. Men throw off what they call the trammels of education, false systems, and superstitions, and then call themselves free: they think it a grand thing to reverence nothing. The true freedom from superstition is free service to religion; the real emancipation from false gods is reverence for the true God. For high knowledge is to be freed from the fear of the many in order to adore and love the one. And not merely is this the only real knowledge, but no other knowledge "buildeth up" the soul. Separate from love, the more we know the profounder the mystery of life becomes; the more dreary and horrible becomes existence. F. W. R.

6. I gratefully adore that incomprehensible existence, the Father in the Son and the Son in the Father. It is the life, the power, the spiritual grandeur, the one distinguishing fact and transcendent glory of the Christian faith. A God without unfathomable realities in the contents of his nature would be no God, just as a religion without mystery would be no religion. In the one case we should be orphans, as in the other we should be skeptics, faithless and forlorn. F. D. H.

But one Lord Jesus Christ. Some want a Christ who is not God; others a Christ who is not a sacrifice; a Christ without a cross, and without blood; a Christ who will teach but not expiate sin; a Christ whose life and death are an example of self-surrender to the utmost, but not an atonement; a Christ who is not a judge, nor a lawgiver, nor a priest, and only a prophet in the sense of teacher. Thus in the present day there are many Christs. It has been so all along; only the apostle John calls them not Christs but Antichrists—"many Antichrists." To us there is but one Christ. He who was announced as the woman's seed; he of whom Abel's sacrifice spoke; he of whom Enoch prophesied as the Avenger; he who was revealed to Abraham as his seed; he of whom Job spoke as the Redeemer; he of whom Moses spoke as the Prophet; of whose work the whole book of Leviticus is full; he of whom David sang as the sufferer yet the King; he of whom Isaiah and all the prophets sang; he who proclaimed himself as come to seek the lost; to whom John the Baptist pointed as the Lamb of God; who hung on the cross, and died in anguish, yet rose again and ascended on high; he is the one Christ whom we recognize. Bonar.

7. Their conscience, being weak, is defiled. There could be no harm in eating the flesh of an animal that had been offered to an idol or false god, for a false god is nothing. And yet if any man thought it wrong to eat such flesh, to him it was wrong; for in that act there would be a deliberate act of transgression—a deliberate preference of that which was mere enjoyment to that which was apparently, though it may be only apparently, sanctioned by the law of God. And so that act would carry with it all the disobedience, all the guilt, and all the misery which belongs to the doing of an act altogether wrong; or, as Paul expresses it, the conscience would become defiled.

Do what seems to you to be right: it is only so that you will at last learn by the grace of God to see clearly what is right. A man thinks within himself that it is God's law and God's will that he should act thus and thus. He is responsible for the opinions he holds, and still more for the way in which he arrived at them—whether in a slothful and selfish or in an honest and truth-seeking manner; but being now his soul's convictions, you can give no other law than this: "You must obey your conscience."

12. It was to him a prerogative far more precious to assert the rights of Christian conscience than to magnify the privileges of Christian liberty. The scruple may be small and foolish, but it may be impossible to uproot the scruple without tearing up the feeling of the sanctity of conscience, and of reverence to the law of God associated with this scruple. And therefore the apostle counsels these men to abridge their Christian liberty, and not to eat of those things which had been sacrificed to idols, but to have compassion upon the scruples of their weaker brethren. And this for two reasons. It might cause exquisite pain to sensitive minds to see those things which appeared to them to be wrong done by Christian brethren; and it might even lead their brethren into sin. F. W. R.

13. The word offend signifies to cause any one to fall from his faith, to renounce his belief in Christ by any means whatever; and against every one that makes use either of violence or artifice to terrify or seduce the believer in Christ from his faith and obedience to his divine master, the severest woes and the heaviest punishments are denounced. The several modes of making our brother to offend are persecution, sophistry, ridicule, immoral examples, and immoral publications. Immoral publications have the same tendency with bad examples, both in propagating vice and promoting infidelity; but they are still more pernicious, because the sphere of their influence is more extensive. A bad example operates comparatively within a small circumference. But the contagion of a licentious publication, especially if it be (as it too frequently is) in a popular and captivating shape, knows no bounds; it flies to the remotest corners of the earth; it penetrates the obscure and retired habitations of simplicity and innocence; it falls into the hands of all ages, ranks, and conditions, but it is peculiarly fatal to the unsuspecting and unguarded minds of the youth of both sexes, and to them its "breath is poison, and its touch is death." P.

How possible it is to mix together the vigor of a masculine and manly intellect with the tenderness and charity which is taught by the gospel of Christ! No man ever breathed so freely when on earth the air and atmosphere of heaven as the apostle Paul; no man ever soared so high above all prejudices, narrowness, littlenesses, scruples as he; and yet no man ever bound himself as Paul bound himself to the ignorance, the scruples, the prejudices of his brethren. So that what in other cases was infirmity, imbecility, and superstition, gathered round it in his case the pure, high spirit of Christian charity and Christian delicacy. Match us if you can with one sentence so sublime, so noble, as this single, glorious sentence of his, in which he asserts the rights of Christian conscience above the claims of Christian liberty: "Wherefore if meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no flesh while the world standeth, lest I make my brother to offend." F. W. R.

Section 267.

1 CORINTHIANS ix. 1-27.

1 AM I not an apostle? am I not free? have I not seen Jesus Christ our Lord? are not ye
 2 my work in the Lord? If I be not an apostle unto others, yet doubtless I am to you: for 3 the seal of mine apostleship are ye in the Lord. Mine answer to them that do examine me
 4 is this, Have we not power to eat and to drink? Have we not power to lead about a sis-
 5 ter, a wife, as well as other apostles, and as the brethren of the Lord, and Cephas? Or I 6 only and Barnabas, have not we power to forbear working? Who goeth a warfare any 7 time at his own charges? who planteth a vineyard, and eateth not of the fruit thereof? or 8 who feedeth a flock, and eateth not of the milk of the flock? Say I these things as a man?
 9 or saith not the law the same also? For it is written in the law of Moses, Thou shalt not muzzle the mouth of the ox that treadeth out the corn. Doth God take care for oxen?
 10 or saith he it altogether for our sakes? For our sakes, no doubt, this is written: that he that plougheth should plough in hope; and that he that thresheth in hope should be par-11 taker of his hope. If we have sown unto you spiritual things, is it a great thing if we 12 shall reap your carnal things? If others be partakers of this power over you, are not we rather? Nevertheless we have not used this power; but suffer all things, lest we should hinder the gospel of Christ.

13 Do ye not know that they which minister about holy things live of the things of the tem-
 14 ple? and they which wait at the altar are partakers with the altar? Even so hath the Lord 15 ordained that they which preach the gospel should live of the gospel. But I have used none of these things: neither have I written these things, that it should be so done unto me: for it were better for me to die, than that any man should make my glorying void.
 16 For though I preach the gospel, I have nothing to glory of: for necessity is laid upon me;
 17 yea, woe is unto me, if I preach not the gospel! For if I do this thing willingly, I have a 18 reward: but if against my will, a dispensation of the gospel is committed unto me. What is my reward then? Verily that, when I preach the gospel, I may make the gospel of 19 Christ without charge, that I abuse not my power in the gospel. For though I be free 20 from all men, yet have I made myself servant unto all, that I might gain the more. And unto the Jews I became as a Jew, that I might gain the Jews; to them that are under the 21 law, as under the law, that I might gain them that are under the law; to them that are without law, as without law, (being not without law to God, but under the law to Christ,) 22 that I might gain them that are without law. To the weak became I as weak, that I might 23 gain the weak: I am made all things to all men, that I might by all means save some. And 24 this I do for the gospel's sake, that I might be partaker thereof with you. Know ye not that they which run in a race run all, but one receiveth the prize? So run, that ye may 25 obtain. And every man that striveth for the mastery is temperate in all things. Now they 26 do it to obtain a corruptible crown; but we an incorruptible. I therefore so run, not as 27 uncertainly; so fight I, not as one that beateth the air: but I keep under my body, and bring it into subjection: lest that by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should be a castaway.

A good asceticism belongs to Christianity; the same which the apostle describes when he says, "I exercise myself to have a conscience void of offense." By which he means that he puts himself to it by the direct training of his will. In this good asceticism we take ourselves away purposely, when it seems to be needed, from society, from gain, and from animal indulgence, that we may assert, with more emphasis, the principle of self-subjection to God, or gird ourselves anew to the divine keeping. Christianity takes in this element. Filling us with great inspirations, it puts us to a stout self-discipline also, that we may get position for still greater and a still more victorious liberty. Over against this good asceticism, there is also a false and a bad. It makes a virtue of self-torment, contrives artificial distresses to move on God's pity, or pacify his resentments, or purchase his favor. It macerates the body to make the soul weak and tender. It dispenses, in fact, with faith itself, and even thinks to square its account with God by a due contribution of bodily pains and privations. This bad asceticism we exclude, the good we accept. And in this we shall train ourselves, sometimes even naturally, by a fast. If we are mortified by the discovery that the body is getting uppermost, if our Sundays are choked, our great sentiments stifled, by indulgences of the body we meant not to allow, we shall turn upon it in this good asceticism, and say to it with a meaning, "I keep under my body." H. B.

PAUL had laid down the principle that it was good to avoid all injury to the scruples and conscientious superstitions of weaker brethren. When Christian liberty permits indulgence, very often Christian love says, Abstain. This was Paul's principle. But does the apostle practice what he preaches? The whole of the ninth chapter is an assertion of his own consistency. He shows that he submitted himself for love's sake to restriction, to which he was not in absolute duty bound. In verses 1-14 he proves his right to certain privileges, and there declares his salutary abstinence from many of them. F. W. R.—He enforces the previous counsels by a fearless reference to the self-abnegation which he had practiced during his own residence at Corinth. Let the members of the Church follow him, who had not sought his own profit, but followed Christ, "who pleased not himself." The whole passage beautifully combines the Christian exemption from petty scruples, with Christian regard and tender consideration for all brethren in the Lord. D. F.

1-6. The privileges to which he had a right were domestic solaces and ministerial maintenance. Have we not power to lead about a sister-wife, that is, a wife who was one of the Christian sisterhood? Have we not, Barnabas and I, power to forbear working? The right to the first of these privileges he proves by the position of the other apostles: Cephas and others were married men. His right to the second—that of maintenance—he proves by his apostleship: "Am I not an apostle? Am I not free?" that is, not compelled to labor.

7-15. The apostolic or ministerial right he bases on these arguments: 1. By a principle universally recognized in human practice. A king warring on behalf of a people wars at their charge—a planter of a vineyard expects to eat of the fruit—a shepherd is entitled to take of the milk of the flock. All who toil for the good of others derive an equivalent from them. Gratuitous devotion of life is nowhere considered obligatory. 2. By a principle implied in a scriptural particular enactment, "Thou shalt not muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn." Did God, in this, take special care for oxen? or was it a great general principle—human, not confined to a single isolated case, but capable of extension to the plow and the sower? The ox was provided for, not because it was an ox, but because it was a laborer. 3. By the law of the Temple-service, the priests were supported by a special provision; animals sacrificed to God belonged partly to them. The whole Jewish ritual—the institution of Levites and priests—implied the principle that there are two kinds of labor—of hand and of brain; and that the toilers with the brain, though not producers, have a claim on the community. They are essential to its well-being, and are not mere drones. By all these arguments he proves his right. The apostle waived the right for himself; but he did this under special circumstances. He felt peculiarly bound, as specially and wonderfully saved. He had a peculiar gift qualifying him for celibacy. He lived in peculiar times, when it was necessary to have unmistakably clean hands, to be above all suspicion of mercenary motives. F. W. R.

10. Paul takes the plow as a representative character. He would teach us that even in worldly matters God had so linked labor with its reward, that every man who wisely and diligently pursues his work may reasonably hope for an auspicious result. The spiritual no less than the natural husbandman has ample reason to go on with his work in hope. In doing the divine will, whether in a public or private station, whether on a broad or a humble scale, whether in the way of action, of suffering, or of silent waiting, we have ground to hope for a beneficial result. It is, under God, one of the great secrets of success, this "ploughing in hope." We may take heart from the triumphs of others, from the promises of Scripture, and from the rewards of eternity. Honestly endeavoring to make the most of life, let us "hope on, hope ever," and we will live to some purpose. H. A. B.

16, 17. Woe is unto me, if I preach not the gospel! He was bound to do it. But he turned his necessity to glorious gain. That was his "reward," that is, made him rewardable—by forfeiting pay he got reward; and in doing freely what he must do, he became free. When "I must" is changed into "I will," you are free. And so in a profession you dislike, an alliance which is distasteful, a duty that must be done, acquiescence is Christian liberty. It is deliverance from the law. F. W. R.

20-23. Considering how uncompromising was Paul's maintenance of God's truth, what an infinite dislike of temporizing and dissimulation, what a strong love of plain speaking and plain dealing discovers itself in his character and conduct, it is surely very remarkable how he accommodates himself, not only to the general habits of thought, but even to the innocent prejudices of those whom he desired to win to Christ.

22. The one great aim which the Christian minister must ever have in view is nothing less than the salvation of souls—"That I might by all means save some." His object in pursuing any secular branch of knowledge may not legitimately be other than that to which at ordination he vows to devote his life. But how is all secular knowledge turned into the fine gold of the altar when the pursuit of it receives the consecration of an holy intention! In the day when the chief shepherd shall appear, what an honor shall we account it, an honor almost overwhelmingly great for flesh and blood, to have said a single word, or to have written a single line, whereby the Word of God shall have been vindicated against skeptical assaults, and the mind, which was tottering in its fundamental religious convictions, planted securely upon the rock of faith! E. M. G.

24-26. Among the localities of Corinth, our special attention is demanded by the Poseidonium, or sanctuary of Neptune, the scene of those Isthmian games from which Paul borrows some of the most striking imagery of his Epistles, and especially of those to the Corinthians. It stood at a short distance northeast of Corinth, on a platform above a ravine, along the edge of which ran the fortifications of the Isthmus, here at its narrowest width. To the south of the temple may still be seen the "stadium," in which, says the apostle, all the foot-racers run, but one receives the prize; and to the east those of the theatre, the probable scene of the pugilistic contest, the image of his own earnest fight with evil; and the coast is still fringed with the small green pine-trees that furnished for the victors that "corruptible crown," the symbol of the "incorruptible" promised to the Christian athlete who keeps his body under and brings it into subjection. S.

24. But one receiveth the prize. It is quite otherwise in the Christian race. There may be a great disparity among the candidates, but every one who endureth to the end shall be saved. He who is faithful over a little shall be as certainly rewarded as he who is faithful over much; each shall receive a crown as large as he can wear. They who run in other races have nothing but toil and labor till they obtain the prize; but in the Christian race the exercise itself carries part of the reward in its bosom: "Wisdom's ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace." R. W.

In verse 25, "striveth for the mastery" should be "contendeth in the games." In verse 27 the word rendered "keep under" signifies to bruise, to beat black and blue; "chastise" would be perhaps the nearest English. A.

The design of this passage is plainly to recommend the great Christian duty of being "temperate in all things," that is, of obtaining an entire command over our passions, or, as it is expressed a few verses after, of "keeping under our bodies, and bringing them into subjection." Poor as the reward was in those games, they who strove for the mastery in them were content to exercise the strictest discipline and abstemiousness, to renounce every pleasure and every indulgence that tended to weaken the body, and voluntarily to undergo many hardships in order to prepare themselves for the contest, and "to run so that they might obtain." Will not the Christian contentedly give up a few trivial indulgences and transient gratifications in order to secure a prize infinitely more glorious; a crown incorruptible, felicity commensurate to the existence and suited to the capacity of an immortal soul? P.

26. To fight wisely is not to fight at a venture, but with a definite aim. "So fight I," says the apostle, "not as one that beateth the air." In which words he is drawing an image from the boxing-match, and declares that in the spiritual combat he does not wear out his strength by vain flourishes of his hands in the air, but plants each blow certainly and with a telling aim. E. M. G.—The Christian conflict can not be imitated. The soul must not merely speculate about it, nor gaze upon others' record of it, but engage in it, each soul for itself. The closest watching of the Christian pilgrimage, the most accurate acquaintance with its theory, will be of no avail without this. G. B. C.

27. The fighting here alluded to is that pugilistic encounter with the cestus, or boxing-glove, which formed one of the Greek games held in honor of the god Neptune at the Isthmus of Corinth, and which, therefore, the apostle's Corinthian converts had frequently witnessed. His body he regards as his antagonist in a pugilistic encounter, and accordingly employs a peculiar word, which, literally translated, signifies, "But I cover my body with bruises." E. M. G.—Paul describes himself as one who by unremitting effort makes his body, the organ of sanctification intrusted to him, serviceable to himself as the servant of Christ. This conflict with the body of sin, inasmuch as the whole outward life of man manifests itself in the body, designates in general the entire conflict still to be waged by the spiritual against the fleshly man, by the new man against the old; and this in the case even of a Paul. N.—Perseverance is not only the duty but the privilege of all who set themselves in good earnest to run for heaven; and though the law of God obligeth them, and the new nature habitually inclines them, "to keep under the body, and to bring it into subjection," yet they have far better security than any efforts of their own. Omnipotence is their guardian, and they are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation. R. W.

A castaway. The meaning is, Lest after having preached to others the doctrine of self-abridgment of indulgences in things lawful, I myself should fail when put to the test; literally, should be that which will not stand proof. The advice to abstain from things lawful, he gave them in the eighth chapter; then, in the ninth, he shows that he had only done what he advised; he had a right to a wife, and a right to be supported by pay, but he had abridged himself of both these rights (though every principle of the Old Testament established his right), simply in order to be beyond suspicion and gain the more to Christ. Read the two chapters (8 and 9) as one argument, and the whole will become intelligible. F. W. R.

Section 268.

1 CORINTHIANS X. 1-22.

1 MOREOVER, brethren, I would not that ye should be ignorant, how that all our fathers
 2 were under the cloud, and all passed through the sea; and were all baptized unto Moses in 3 the cloud and in the sea; and did all eat the same spiritual meat; and did all drink the same
 4 spiritual drink: for they drank of that spiritual Rock that followed them: and that Rock was 5 Christ. But with many of them God was not well pleased: for they were overthrown in 6 the wilderness. Now these things were our examples, to the intent we should not lust after 7 evil things, as they also lusted. Neither be ye idolaters, as were some of them; as it is 8 written, The people sat down to eat and drink, and rose up to play. Neither let us commit 9 fornication, as some of them committed, and fell in one day three and twenty thousand.
 10 Neither let us tempt Christ, as some of them also tempted, and were destroyed of serpents.
 11 Neither murmur ye, as some of them also murmured, and were destroyed of the destroyer.
 12 Now all these things happened unto them for ensamples: and they are written for our admonition, 13 upon whom the ends of the world are come. Wherefore let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall. There hath no temptation taken you but such as is common to man: but God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able; but will with the temptation also make a way to escape, that ye may be able to bear it.
 14 Wherefore, my dearly beloved, flee from idolatry. I speak as to wise men; judge ye 15 what I say. The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not the communion of the blood of 16 Christ? The bread which we break, is it not the communion of the body of Christ? For 17 we being many are one bread, and one body: for we are all partakers of that one bread.
 18 Behold Israel after the flesh: are not they which eat of the sacrifices partakers of the 19 altar? What say I then? that the idol is any thing, or that which is offered in sacrifice to 20 idols is any thing? But I say, that the things which the Gentiles sacrifice, they sacrifice to 21 devils, and not to God: and I would not that ye should have fellowship with devils. Ye cannot drink the cup of the Lord, and the cup of devils: ye cannot be partakers of the 22 Lord's table, and of the table of devils. Do we provoke the Lord to jealousy? are we stronger than he?

Most Christians have to learn by the painful experience of repeatedly falling into sin that our strength is absolutely nothing. But plainly we ought to learn it by habitually distrusting ourselves, by habitually guarding against everything like boasting, above all, by a habit of walking through the world with a consciousness that God is looking on us and willing to lead us. And if we would ask what are the tokens of our having learned the lesson, the answer is, that besides the quiet trust in God the chief token of our having learned to lean on God and not on ourselves is the avoidance of all unnecessary temptation. The man who goes into temptation in the way of duty may well feel certain that God will help him; for he may well feel that God sent him, and that he who sent will also protect. But any one who goes into temptation without any need can not feel this. He must rely, if he relies on anything, on his own strength. And so he proves that he has not yet learned the truth—that his own strength is a prop rotten at the foot and incapable of upholding him in any real trial. The humble Christian will so distrust himself that his life is constantly checked by the same thought which he expresses in the prayer, "Lead us not into temptation." He will avoid what he has found dangerous or hurtful. For he knows that his enemy is one that he can not master, and he will therefore go nowhere unless Christ will go with him. F. T.—Thrice blessed the faithful love of Christ our Saviour, who constantly unveils himself to us, and, as with outstretched finger, points us to the abyss into which we are in danger of rushing whenever we trust more in our own hearts than on his unerring word. Are we reckless? He casts us down from our imagined heights; but when Satan would sift us and fling us forth as chaff, he thrusts aside the hand of the destroyer, and grasps compassionately ours and saves us ere we are awake. Assuredly, not our fidelity to Christ, but his own loyalty, inflexible even toward weak and faithless disciples, is the one ground of our hope. Let us trust henceforward upon nothing save his love alone. Van O.

1. The danger of the Corinthian Church lay in their false security. They were tempted to think that all things were safe to do because all things were lawful. They were ready to rest satisfied with the knowledge that they were God's people and God's Church. Now the apostle shakes this sense of their safety by reminding them that the ancient Church of Israel fell although it had the same privileges therefore he infers that spiritual privileges are not perfect security.

2. The passing through the Red Sea was the Israelites' profession of discipleship to Moses. Then the die was cast, and thenceforward there was no return for them. One solemn step had severed them for ever from Egypt; and the cloud-guidance which then began kept the memory of this act before them by a constant witness in all their journeyings. So far, then, this is equivalent to baptism, which is discipleship: a sacrament or oath of obedience, the force of which is kept up and recalled by an outward sign. F. W. R.

3. The same spiritual meat. The "fathers" from the beginning had but one table, one feast, one bread. Sometimes it was typified by the flesh of the sacrifice; sometimes by the shew-bread; sometimes by the manna. But all these pointed to the one heavenly bread—Jesus, the Christ of God; to his broken body; to his flesh, which is meat indeed; to his whole person as the very and true bread of God, on which the Church has been feeding from the beginning, and will feed to the end. Bonar.

4. Spiritual Rock. Paul calls this mysterious fountain a spiritual rock, and the water which flowed from it spiritual water; and he calls them so, because they were designed to have a spiritual meaning, and to represent spiritual things—the one standing as an emblem of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the other shadowing forth those precious blessings of which he is the author. C. B.—That followed them. The rock did not literally follow them, as the rabbins have with dullness dreamed; but, go where they would, the wondrous waters from the rock flowed by their path and camp. Figuratively, therefore, it followed; the life of it streamed after them; they were never without its life-giving influence. As Christ said of the bread,

"This is my body," so Paul declares, "That Rock was Christ"; not that the bread was literally transformed into his body, or that the rock was changed into Christ; nor, again, merely that bread represented the body of Christ, or that the rock represented Christ, but this—that which is wondrous in the bread and rock, the life-giving power in both, is Christ. The symbol as a material is nothing; the spirit in it—Christ—is everything.

6-10. Four special sins of the Israelites are mentioned by Paul as corresponding to the circumstances in which he found the Corinthian Church: idolatry, impurity, doubt, and discontent. "Is God among us, or not?" said the people in the wilderness, tempting Jehovah. Think you, we shall be less punished than they, if we similarly tempt our God? This chapter gives the answer. Here, then, we meet a very solemn truth: the sacrifice of Christ does not alter God's will; it does not make sin a trifle; it does not make it safer to commit offenses. It does not abrogate but declares God's law. And these Corinthians were boasting of their privileges, vaunting their liberties, talking of rights instead of doing duties, speaking of freedom, brotherhood, and reason, and all the time the same God who judged the people in the wilderness was ruling them by the same unalterable laws. F. W. R.

11. For our admonition. Christianity is the goal and end of all earlier revelations, and no other revelation follows upon it. Herein is the right given to the Christian to consider himself as the goal to which revelation, in the whole previous course of its development, points and ministers. N.

12. Wherefore, taught by their examples, let him that thinks himself safe, by being in the Church and partaking of the Christian sacraments, take heed lest he fall into sin, and so destruction from God overtake him. Locke.—He who takes no heed at any time to strengthen his nature has no right to plead its weakness; he who is the slave of all common temptations has no right to say that this one temptation overcame him because of its exceeding greatness. Christ knows that we are weak, and he tells us what we are to do to become strong. If we will not obey him, and will not practice his appointed remedies, then, if we remain weak, it is our own fault; it is not only the sin that dwelleth in us which doeth the evil thing, but we ourselves are habitually consenting, and make sin's work altogether our own. T. A.

A child may play with fire, and that over a magazine of powder; but it is because he is a child. A man may play with temptations, do what he likes, rush with his powder-like nature into the flame; but it is because he is a childish man. W. I. B.—As long as there is fuel in the heart for a temptation, we can not be secure. He that has gunpowder about him had need keep far enough off from sparks; he that is either tender of his credit abroad or comfort at home had need shun the very shadow of sin; and he that would neither wound conscience nor credit, God nor the gospel, had need hate the garments spotted with the flesh. Brooks.—We must be always wakeful and on the lookout, and never deem ourselves secure; for there is no set time for the onset of him who is at war with us and is ready to attack us. Let us therefore be always thoughtful, always vigilant and prayerful; that so we may be able to remain unconquered, and, having escaped the devices framed by the enemy, be counted worthy of the loving-kindness coming from God, through the grace and compassions of his only-begotten Son. Chrys.

13. When Paul is endeavoring to strengthen the Corinthians against the trials they were exposed to, he sets out with assuring them "that no temptation had taken them but such as was common to man," as well knowing that, till he had convinced them of this, all other arguments would be ineffectual. P.—The sufferings and temptations of the godly are lightened by the consideration of this as their common lot, their highway, and not new in the person of any. If we trace the lives of the most eminent saints, shall we not find every notable step that is recorded marked with a new cross; one trouble following on another, as the waves do, in an incessant succession? L.

God will make a way to escape. This at least is certain, that whatever may be the corruption of our nature, whatever the power of pain to stagger our virtue or of pleasure to seduce it, it is impossible we can be so formed or so situated by a just and good God as to be under an absolute necessity of transgressing those laws which he has laid down for the regulation of our conduct. We may rest assured that he will give us powers, either natural or supernatural, to balance our defects. In the common trials of our virtue, the common efforts of human nature and the common influences of the Holy Spirit will be able to support us; "if any temptation take us more than is common to man," God will send us, provided we desire and endeavor to deserve it, more than common assistance; for his strength is made perfect in our weakness, and we may in that sense most truly say with the apostle, "that when we are weak, then in reality are we strong." P.—God will either keep his saints from temptations by his preventing mercy, or in temptations by his supporting mercy, or find a way for their escape by his delivering mercy. Mason.

We must not be disappointed, cast down, or disheartened, because we find our self-improvement very much slower than we expect or like. We must not complain if a temptation, which we have had much trouble with, becomes stronger instead of weaker; if we fall after we have begun to think ourselves tolerably safe; if we try all manner of helps and aids and find them not enough. We must not complain if we find that earnest and warm prayers are followed in a few hours by feelings so cold that we can hardly keep in the strait path for want of impulse to do so; if very determined resolutions gradually wear out until, when the moment comes for acting on them, we even forget that we made them. Such results we shall surely find, for our enemy can take many shapes and still retain his power, and all our best endeavors will never repel him. God only can really give the victory; and God assuredly will. But God will not give it in the precise way that we ask for it. And hence it is that, beyond all other graces, the grace of perseverance is the one to which victory is promised; that perseverance which enables us, in spite of disappointment in ourselves, and of seeing no fruit of all our endeavors, and of coldness in the heart, and of poorness in the devotions, still to continue in the path which he has commanded; that perseverance shall one day be acknowledged as a proof of our being his children. F. T.

15. Judge ye. Reason should have free course through the whole empire of religion—length, breadth, depth, height; it should not be hindered, but expedited; we should wish to give it wings; we should wish it to be as swift and as free in its movements as the heart ought to be in loving God, and the feet in running the way of his commandments. It is not the exercise of reason which is to be guarded against, but those perversions of reason which spring from pride, the spirit of sect, preconceived opinions, and depraved inclinations and habits. T. H. S.

16. Which we bless. Literally, for which we speak good words of praise and thanks, as is plain from chapter 11 : 24, where this blessing is interpreted by the giving of thanks. The phrase here denotes the whole communicants joining together in blessing God over the cup, for his mercy in redeeming the world, through the blood of Christ. For both Luke and Paul, in their account of the institution, express this part of the action by having given thanks. M.

The Communion of the body and blood of Christ. The great company of faithful Christians have fellowship, a joint and common interest, in the absent body and blood of Christ, as actually offered in sacrifice for their sins upon the cross. With the divine revenue of holy comfort, hope, and strength, which infallibly reaches them from their unseen treasury of blessings, they are sweetly satisfied. The covenant, by which they hold and enjoy their common interest in it, is in their actual possession. The great seal of that covenant, in the consecrated symbols of the Lord's Supper, is often exhibited to their eyes. And from this visible evidence, this sensible assurance that their title is good, that "he is faithful who hath promised," their faith gathers its richest income of present and of satisfying benefits. Thus it is that "the cup of blessing which we bless, and the bread which we break, are to them the communion of the very body and blood of Christ"; of the very sacrifice which was offered for their sins on the cross. J. S. S.—The word communion is properly "partnership"—"partnership in the blood of Christ"; all that the blood contains for the soul becoming ours—the whole blood becoming the property of each believer. All its blessings, the paid ransom, the canceled penalty, the forgiveness, the cleansing, the life, the joy, all becoming ours; we being partakers of Christ, partakers of his blood, partakers of his death and life. He then that takes that cup is committed to all that it symbolizes; he is counted as one with it; the possessor of its contents; the partaker of its fullness. He is to reckon himself one with Jesus in his death; and God reckons him such. Nothing less. He has the whole, or he has nothing!

17. Oneness with Christ and oneness with each other are embodied in these symbols. We are many, yet one; many members, yet one body and one head. All that he has is ours. His life, our life; his light, our light; his fullness, our fullness; his strength, our strength; his righteousness, our righteousness; his crown, our crown; his glory, our glory; his inheritance, our inheritance; for we are heirs of God, and joint heirs with Jesus Christ.

18-20. It is only in passing, and as an illustration of his argument on another subject, that the apostle introduces the Lord's Supper here. The oneness of the worshiper, even in a heathen temple, with the whole religion or system of worship, and with the false god into whose temple he comes—this is his theme. Strange that, in connection with a pagan altar and a temple of devils, he should be led to give us one of the most striking of his statements regarding the supper. He takes the cup of the Lord and the cup of devils, places them side by side, and shows us the one from the other. Bonar.—He had already counseled them to abstain from partaking of heathen sacrifices for the sake of love, lest their example might lead their weaker brethren to sin by violating their conscience; now he takes higher ground, and this is his argument. Every sacrificial feast in all religions is a kind of worship, in the same way as all who partook of Christian sacrifices were Christians, and all who took part in Jewish were Jews; so all who sat at meat in idolatrous feasts formed one society with idolatrous worshipers. F. W. R.

21. "Ye can not be partakers of the Lord's table and of the table of devils." That is, "fellowship with Christ and fellowship with devils, in the sacred rites performed to each, are utterly incompatible things; and partaking, not literally of the tables themselves, but of what is present on the tables of both, is an impious profanation of Christ's ordinance." J. S. S.

22. The heathen would reckon any one that ate of their sacrifice as a fellow-worshiper with them of a demon; hence this participation by Corinthian Christians would be taken as a sanction of heathenism. Thus these religious banquets being not only an injury to the Church, but also to the heathen, the apostle, indignant at this wrong, breaks out into forcible language, "Do we provoke the Lord to jealousy? are we stronger than He?" F. W. R.

Section 269.

1 CORINTHIANS X. 23-33; XI. 1-16.

23 ALL things are lawful for me, but all things are not expedient: all things are lawful for 24 me, but all things edify not. Let no man seek his own, but every man another's wealth.
 25 Whatsoever is sold in the shambles, that eat, asking no question for conscience sake: for 26 the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof. If any of them that believe not bid you to 27 a feast, and ye be disposed to go; whatsoever is set before you, eat, asking no question for 28 conscience sake. But if any man say unto you, This is offered in sacrifice unto idols, eat not for his sake that shewed it, and for conscience sake: for the earth is the Lord's, and the 29 fulness thereof: conscience, I say, not thine own, but of the other: for why is my liberty

80 judged of another man's conscience? For if I by grace be a partaker, why am I evil spoken 81 of for that for which I give thanks? Whether therefore ye eat, or drink, or whatsoever ye 82 do, do all to the glory of God. Give none offence, neither to the Jews, nor to the Gentiles, 83 nor to the church of God: even as I please all men in all things, not seeking mine own profit, but the profit of many, that they may be saved.

1 Be ye followers of me, even as I also am of Christ. Now I praise you, brethren, that ye
 2 remember me in all things, and keep the ordinances, as I delivered them to you. But I
 3 would have you know, that the head of every man is Christ; and the head of the woman
 4 is the man; and the head of Christ is God. Every man praying or prophesying, having his 5 head covered, dishonoureth his head. But every woman that prayeth or prophesieth with her head uncovered dishonoureth her head: for that is even all one as if she were shaven.
 6 For if the woman be not covered, let her also be shorn: but if it be a shame for a woman
 7 to be shorn or shaven, let her be covered. For a man indeed ought not to cover his head, forasmuch as he is the image and glory of God: but the woman is the glory of the man.
 8 For the man is not of the woman; but the woman of the man. Neither was the man 9 created for the woman; but the woman for the man. For this cause ought the woman to 10 have power on her head because of the angels. Nevertheless neither is the man without 11 the woman, neither the woman without the man, in the Lord. For as the woman is of the 12 man, even so is the man also by the woman; but all things of God. Judge in yourselves:
 13 is it comely that a woman pray unto God uncovered? Doth not even nature itself teach 14 you, that, if a man have long hair, it is a shame unto him? But if a woman have long 15 hair, it is a glory to her: for her hair is given her for a covering. But if any man seem to 16 be contentious, we have no such custom, neither the churches of God.

ONE of the saddest things about the Christian life is, that it seems to ourselves to be split up into two separate parts, which we find it very hard, if not altogether impossible, to unite. We feel as if we lived in two different worlds. We have our moments of devotion and our hours of utter worldliness. We begin, for instance, the day with thankful acknowledgment to God for his mercies; and, howsoever sincere that may be, we know too well that it is going to be followed by a day of unthankful reception of them. We kneel down in the morning and ask God to guide us, and then we go out into the world and take guidance of vanity and selfishness. In a word, on the clear mountain-top we stand in the light of God's face, and then we come down into the plain, and the earthly vapors shut out the blue. I suppose the best of us feel this apparently inevitable severing of our lives into two unlike portions. Is that distinction between sacred and profane a valid one? is there any reason why a man's prayers should be more devout than his business? is there any need why the sanctity of life should be curdled together, as it were, into Sundays and acts of special worship, and not be diffused through the whole of life? Are we living on one principle from Sunday morning to Saturday night; or are we having one principle for Sunday and another principle for Monday, one principle for the ordinary tenor of our uneventful days and another principle for the crises and the solemn times? Do you and I keep our religion as princes do their crown jewels, only wearing them on festive occasions, and have we another dress for week-days and working days? Do we keep our love of Christ in our pews; or do we take it out into the street and the marketplace with us, and work it out day by day, hour by hour, in patient endurance, in loyal love, in simple faith, finding that there is nothing little if Christ's name be crossed over it, and nothing too great if it be approached in his strength? A. M.

It is necessary for the understanding of this Epistle that we should remember that it is an answer to a letter received from the Corinthian Church, and therefore constantly alludes to topics in that letter.

23, 24. "(But some one will say again), 'All things are lawful for me.' Nay, but not all things are good; though all things are lawful, not all things build up the Church. Let no man seek his own, but every man his neighbor's good." C.

25-28. True Christian freedom shows itself in self-restraint and tender forbearance toward the weak. So Paul, in full agreement with the spirit of the synod at Jerusalem, earnestly dissuaded the Corinthian Gentile Christians from eating meat offered to idols, lest they should offend the conscience of a weak brother, for whom likewise Christ died; while yet he at the same time asserts, on the other hand, that "the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof," and that every kind of food is, in itself, good, if it be eaten with thanksgiving. P. S.

25. "Whatsoever is sold in the shambles, eat, asking no questions for conscience sake." You need not be troubled by the fact that the articles sold in the market have come from a temple, since their nature as food is unchanged; and, therefore, whether you wish to buy them for yourselves, or are invited to partake of them in the house of a heathen neighbor, you are not bound to inquire from whence they came. In this matter they were free to act as they pleased, and yet their liberty was not without limits, since in its exercise they must ever be regulated by Christian love. Accordingly Paul repeats to them what he had said to the Romans: "Let no man seek his own, but every man another's wealth; let every man please his neighbor for his good." "Take heed that this liberty of yours does not become a stumbling-block to the weak." From these authoritative expositions of the law of expediency, it would appear: 1. That it applies and can apply only to things which are essentially indifferent. They must be lawful, else they never can be simply inexpedient, because, if there exists in them necessarily an element of evil, they belong to the class of things which are unlawful everywhere and always, to all persons and at all times. 2. That it applies only to special cases, and comes into operation only under special circumstances. Abstinence from the meats in question was not a rule binding all Christians at all times, on the ground that their use tended to mislead weak consciences. It became obligatory only when it was morally certain that the use of them would cause some one weak brother to stumble. So Paul understood it, and on this principle he acted. 3. That it limits the liberty of Christians in lawful things to this extent only, viz.: that they do not put a stumbling-block or an occasion to fall in the way of others who are weaker or less enlightened than themselves. When our actions terminate upon ourselves, the law which governs them is of a higher and more imperative nature than that of simple expediency, because, in such cases, if there is a reason for our abstaining from certain courses, or from the use of certain things, we shall find, if we examine it closely, that this reason is one not of a temporary but permanent kind. The things themselves may be, indeed, per se lawful, but they are not to us. Forsyth.

27. When he says, "and ye be disposed to go," he well understands that there are some who will not be disposed. Kept back by no ascetic scruples or legal restrictions binding their consciences, they will be kept back by their very fullness and freedom and the uplifting sense of Christ which ennobles their life. They are free in a sense to do it, but they are also more free, too free to have any disposition that way. They are able to come down now and then it may be, and touch the plane of nature in ways of playfulness; but it will not be to launch themselves on tides of high excitement, and be floated clean away, but only to freshen a little the natural zest of things, and keep off the moroseness of a too rigid and total separation from the socialities and playtimes of the world. H. B.

29-31. "Now when I say conscience I do not mean thine own conscience, for thou knowest that the eating of such a dish is not a worshipping of the idol; but the conscience of the other, who views it in that light. Perhaps thou wilt reply, But why is my liberty ruled by another's conscience? If by the free gift of God, to whom the earth belongs, I be allowed to partake of all kinds of food, why am I spoken of as an evil-doer for eating that meat for which I give thanks to God? In answer I say, For this very reason, that ye are allowed to partake of all kinds of food, whether ye eat, or drink, or whatever ye do, ye are bound to do all to the glory of God, by doing it agreeably to his will." M.

By all who believe that there is any such thing as a moral authority for human life, that duty is a word with a meaning, and that responsibility is a fact, it will be granted that each of these three propositions is applicable to our intercourse and connections with each other: 1. That the moral significance of life is nowhere more vitally manifest than in what we do or fail to do for the characters of our neighbors. 2. That a large part of what is included in the term duty is what we owe to other men's welfare, or their goodness, which is the same thing. 3. That society presents a scene of personal responsibility, peculiar to itself, where the materials of judgment are always accumulating. F. D. H.

31. Whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God. For indeed it is our privilege to be with him ever, and to have him ever with us; whether we eat or drink, or whatever thing, grave or light, we may be engaged in. There is nothing strange, nothing profane, nothing presumptuous in praying that Christ may be with us in all those common works which our daily life here brings with it. T. A.—The reception of food is a common action—homely, trivial, having nothing dignified or sublime about it. The implication of the text, then, is that in our common and trivial actions there is room and scope for glorifying Almighty God. In one word, we may either go through common life in a common way, tying up our religion to public worship on Sundays and private prayer on week-days, or we may go through common life with an uncommon motive—the thought of God, and the desire of pleasing and serving him in all things. E. M. G.—As in their work, so in their refreshments and rest, Christians may pursue all for him, whether they eat or drink, doing all for this reason, because it is his will; and for this end, that he may have glory; bending the use of all their strength and all his mercies that way; setting this mark on all their designs and ways, this for the glory of my God, and this further for his glory. This is the art of keeping the heart spiritual in all affairs, yea, of spiritualizing the affairs themselves in their use that in themselves are earthly. This is the elixir that turns lower metal into gold, the mean actions of this life, in a Christian's hands, into obedience and holy offerings unto God. L.—The work of our sanctification consists simply in receiving, from one moment to another, all the troubles and duties of our state in life as veils under which God hides himself and gives himself to us. Every moment brings some duty to be faithfully performed, and this is enough for our perfection. The moment which brings a duty to be performed, or a trouble to be borne, brings also a message declaring to us the will of God. The secret of belonging wholly to God is simply this : to serve him in all that comes to you, in all that you have to do. An.

32. Give offence neither to the Jews, nor, etc. To the unbelieving Jews, by giving them occasion to think that Christians are permitted to worship heathen idols ; to the unbelieving Gentiles, by giving them occasion to think that you allow their idolatry by partaking of their sacrifices ; to weak members of the Church of God, by drawing them through your example to eat of things offered to other idols, of the lawfulness whereof they are not fully satisfied. Locke.

33. Good pastors ought to desire in such sort to please men as that they may make the affection felt for them a kind of path along which they may lead their hearers' hearts to love the Creator. This is well expressed by Paul, "Even as I please all men in all things"; yet again he says, "If I yet pleased men, I should not be the servant of Christ." So Paul pleases men and does not please them ; because in the very fact of his pleasing them he desires, not that he himself should please them, but that the truth should please them by his means. Gregory the Great.

In this chapter (11) we meet two extravagant abuses of Christian truth : first, concerning the conduct and deportment of Christian women (1-16), and next, respecting the administration of the Lord's Supper. F. W. R.

2. It is customary with Paul to recognize whatever is praiseworthy in the church to which he is writing. In this appears his wisdom as a spiritual guide. The confidence of men is far more easily won and a hearing secured for whatever one has to say in the way of admonition and rebuke, if it appears that he nowise overlooks or undervalues what is good in them, that he does not willingly find fault, but is ready to acknowledge every real excellence with cordial approbation. Good and bad, moreover, stand frequently in close connection with each other. The good lies at the foundation, but the evil mingles its disturbing influence with the good, and hence it is through the latter that we can best reach and remedy the former. It is in the clear perception of this relation, and in the skillful use of it for the correction of error, that Paul manifests his wisdom. Of this a striking example is furnished in this Epistle. N.

3. The doctrine which acts as pedestal to the column is that of Christ's union as head with the believer. "The head of every man is Christ." Never was this precious doctrine more nobly unfolded or more urgently pressed than in the writings of Paul himself. The acts of the Redeemer are for the redeemed. He took their nature, assumed their liabilities, answered for their delinquency, procured their pardon, accomplished their justification, and abides in connection with them for all the manifold ends of their salvation. For them he was born, for them he lived, for them he died, for them he rose, for them he ascended, for them he intercedes and reigns. He is made to each of them Wisdom, Righteousness, Sanctification, and Redemption. The funded treasury of his merits, his wisdom and his might, are theirs. J. W. A.

3-15. Paul had taught them that in Christ Jesus all national, social, sexual distinctions disappeared : "In him is neither Jew nor Greek, neither bond nor free, neither male nor female." Certain Christian women laid eager hands on this principle, and so mishandled it as to occasion a public scandal. Paul had taught the spiritual equality of man and woman ; he had also taught the social subordination of the woman to the man. But these eager converts had not minds large enough to hold and reconcile both these great principles : they seized impetuously on that which fell in with their wishes and let the other go. And in our day there are men as well as women who find it difficult to reconcile Paul's two principles, who are disposed to object, "If in spiritual nature, relation, responsibility, women are on an equality with men, how can they be subordinate to them?" To any such objectors it might be enough to reply : "Christ is the coequal Son of the Father, the 'fellow' of the Lord of Hosts ; yet, in the complex, mysterious relations of the Blessed Trinity, Christ is the subordinate and dependent Son"; for here is an admitted case in which equality of nature and subordinate position coexist. Coz.—It is the doctrine of Paul that, as Christ is dependent on God, and man is dependent on Christ, so is woman dependent on man. Paul perceived that the law of Christian equality was quite consistent with the vast system of subordination running through the universe : "But I would have you know that the head of every man is Christ ; and the head of the woman is the man ; and the head of Christ is God"; which two things we see he distinctly unites in verses 11 and 12 when he says, "Nevertheless, neither is the man without the woman, neither the woman without the man, in the Lord. For as the woman is of the man, even so is the man also by the woman ; but all things of God." He asserts subordination in one sense, and denies it in another ; and therefore bids the foolish question of "Which is the greater?" to cease for ever ; for he distinguishes between inferiority and subordination, that each sex exists in a certain order, not one as greater than the other, but both great and right in being what God intended them to be. F. W. R.

Woman proves her equality with man, not by rebelling against her subordinate position in the social order, but by cheerfully accepting it as God's ordinance for her, and by discharging its duties with an ability equal or superior to that shown by her husband in his different sphere. The Corinthian women, or some of them, did not see that. They thought to assert the equality of the sexes by thrusting themselves into the habits and duties of the masculine sex to the neglect of their own, by praying and prophesying in church instead of ruling their households. As a sign of their enfranchisement from the degrading bonds of heathenism, as a proof that they were the equals of men, they appeared in public unveiled, and so violated the decorum of their sex as then understood; in short, they became bad as women that they might prove themselves as good as men. The honor of the Christian community was at stake. Only women convicted of adultery had their hair shorn; only women of notoriously abandoned life dispensed with a veil. The Greek women, the honorable women, invariably put on a veil, or drew their peplum or shawl over head and face when they left their homes. The heathen were quick to misconceive any departure from custom, any innovation on rule on the part of the Church. And had the Christian women gone unveiled, when the absence of the veil was the open stamp of harlotry, we can easily conceive what their neighbors would have thought of them, what a fatal obstacle would have been thrown in the path of the infant Church. It was no mere question of maxims and rules, therefore, with which Paul had to deal; it was a question of principle—of principles vital and profound. And hence it is that he argues so gravely and weightily on what might seem a matter of small moment. Hence he appeals to nature, to Scripture, to Christian doctrine, for arguments on points which seem so trivial as whether a man should or should not have his hair cut, whether a woman should or should not wear a veil. Take the simplest of his arguments—his appeal to nature. Man is by nature unveiled, has short hair; woman is veiled with her long hair. The divine intention is thus revealed. In handling and attiring the body we are to take the suggestions of nature as ordinances of God; we are to carry out the divine intentions indicated by our physical structure: man is to go unveiled; woman is to use or to imitate the natural veil which God has given her. The Greeks and Romans

did thus interpret and obey the voice of nature. And therefore the apostle might well appeal to what "nature taught." His Scriptural appeal is to the verses in Genesis which describe the creation of man and woman, and the relation in which they were appointed to stand (vs. 7-9). Man, said Moses, was made "in the image of God"; therefore, adds Paul, man is a "glory" of God. Hence he ought not to veil the head which bears an impress so divine, the face which reflects so excellent a glory. But "the woman is the glory of the man"; she was taken out of his side—not from the rude clay, but from clay already attempored by human life and heat; not from any remote or uncomely member of man's body, but from his very heart, from the very seat of life. Therefore she is his "glory"; she represents what is finest in him and most exquisite, what is highest and best. Nevertheless, the apostle insists (v. 8) she was taken from man, not man from woman; she was (v. 9) created for man, not he for her. And this derived origin indicates her dependent condition. Although she is his glory, because she is his glory she is to defer and minister to him from whom she sprang, just as the highest spirits are those who serve most and best. Coz.

5. This passage does not necessarily sanction women speaking in public, even though professing miraculous gifts; he simply records what took place at Corinth, without expressing an opinion upon it, reserving the censure of it till chapter 14: 34, 35. Fausset.

10. To the Hebrews, unshorn hair was the sign of strength or power. And the unshorn hair of the woman is "the power," or the symbol of the power, which her service requires. This I take to be the apostle's thought. And does not nature itself confirm his thought? Is not a woman's hair a strength to her as well as a glory? Coz.—"Power" would be more intelligently expressed "the token of power," i. e., the covering, implying that she is under subjection, and thus preserving comeliness in the sight of the holy angels who are present in the Christian assemblies. A.

16. "But if any one thinks to be contentious in defense of such a custom, let him know that it is disallowed by me, and by all the churches of God." C.—In closing his argument, besides asserting his own decision, he appeals to the universal custom prevalent among the churches; confirming all by apostolic authority and established order. B.

Section 270.

1 CORINTHIANS xi. 17-34.

- 17 Now in this that I declare unto you I praise you not, that ye come together not for the 18 better, but for the worse. For first of all, when ye come together in the church, I hear 19 that there be divisions among you; and I partly believe it. For there must be also heresies 20 among you, that they which are approved may be made manifest among you. When ye 21 come together therefore into one place, this is not to eat the Lord's supper. For in eating every one taketh before other his own supper: and one is hungry, and another is drunken.
 22 What? have ye not houses to eat and to drink in? or despise ye the church of God, and shame them that have not? What shall I say to you? shall I praise you in this? I praise you not.
 23 For I have received of the Lord that which also I delivered unto you, That the Lord 24 Jesus the same night in which he was betrayed took bread: and when he had given thanks, he brake it, and said, Take, eat : this is my body, which is broken for you : this do 25 in remembrance of me. After the same manner also he took the cup, when he had supped, saying, This cup is the new testament in my blood : this do ye, as oft as ye drink it, in 26 remembrance of me. For as often as ye eat this bread, and drink this cup, ye do shew the 27 Lord's death till he come. Wherefore whosoever shall eat this bread, and drink this cup 28 of the Lord, unworthily, shall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord. But let a man 29 examine himself, and so let him eat of that bread, and drink of that cup. For he that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh damnation to himself, not discerning 30 the Lord's body. For this cause many are weak and sickly among you, and many sleep.

 31 For if we would judge ourselves, we should not be judged. But when we are judged, we are 32 chastened of the Lord, that we should not be condemned with the world. Wherefore, my 33 brethren, when ye come together to eat, tarry one for another. And if any man hunger, 34 let him eat at home ; that ye come not together unto condemnation. And the rest will I set in order when I come.

THE sacrament of the Lord's Supper, when the Church is kept pure by a faithful preaching of Christ crucified—the full and uncorrupt gospel—and when her ministrations are blessed with the influences of the overshadowing and life-giving Spirit, is an ordinance in which the Christian comes into closest communion with his Saviour, and feels his love for him kindling into its intensest glow ; in which, too, he comes into holiest communion with his fellow-Christians of all ages and nations, and feels himself most inseparably knit to them in “the communion of saints,” in the union of the great mystical body of Christ ; and in which he realizes a peculiar strengthening and refreshing of his soul in all her divine and heavenly graces of faith and courage, humility and purity, deadness to the world, and desires after heaven. Through the divinely ordained symbol of the sacrifice on the cross, faith feeds on all the benefits of Christ's passion, enters into the depths of that union which subsists between each member of the body and its head, and draws a happy immortality from the Fountain of Life. J. S. S.

The Lord's Supper is a scene of solemn and affecting remembrance, and a source of most impressive thought and feeling. It is the place of renewed vows, renewed mercies, renewed and renewing grace, compassion and forgiving love on Christ's part, and renewed penitence and faith on ours. It is a landing-place of rest, refreshment, survey, and setting forth again upon the Christian journey. It is an ordinance for gratitude and love enkindled and increased, and strength administered, as well as sins deplored. It is a mount of vision, where the glass is held to the eye of faith, and we may take a view of our fair and bright inheritance in heaven. G. B. C.

18. Divisions. Whatever alienates the affections of Christians from one another constitutes schism in the sense of the apostle ; for this strikes directly at the vitals of Christianity, since it is in the union of affection among Christians that the spirit, the life, and the power of religion are principally placed. Schism, then, is the sin of doing anything to alienate men's hearts from each other, whatever be the occasion or the means of the estrangement. And a sin it is of a magnitude and enormity which few can estimate. It is the very opposite of charity ; and in saying this we arraign it upon the most solemn and the most capital charge which any indictment can prefer. J. A. J.—During the present disjointed state of things nothing remains but for every one to whom the care of any part of the Church of Christ is intrusted to exert himself to the utmost in the promotion of vital religion, in cementing the friendship of the good, and repressing, with a firm and steady hand, the heats and eruptions of party spirit. Were our efforts uniformly to take this direction, there would be an identity in the impression made by religious instruction ; the distortion of party features would gradually disappear, and Christians would everywhere approach toward that ideal beauty spoken of by painters, which is combined of the finest lines and traits conspicuous in individual forms. Since they have all drunk into the same spirit, it is manifest nothing is wanting but a larger portion of that spirit, to lay the foundation of a solid, cordial union. It is to the immoderate attachment to secular interest, the love of power, and the want of reverence for truth, not to the obscurities of revelation, we must impute the unhappy contentions among Christians—maladies which nothing can correct but deep and genuine piety. The true schismatic is not so properly the person who declines a compliance with what he judges to be wrong, though he may be mistaken in that judgment, as the man who, like the author before us, sedulously employs every artifice to alienate the affections of good men from each other. R. Hall.

19. Heresies. The term heresy signifies primarily choice, then party, sect. It is commonly used in the bad sense, implying willfulness on the side of the individual, a spirit of arrogant innovation and party zeal. In the New Testament the term frequently occurs, and in various connections, but almost always involving some bad sense. It is used of the religious parties among the Jews, as the Sadducees (Acts 5 : 17), the Pharisees (15 : 5 ; 26 : 5) ; of the Christians in general, who were for a long time called by the Jews in contempt "the sect of the Nazarenes" (Acts 24 : 5, 14 ; 28 : 22) ; and of parties within the Christian Church (1 Cor. 11 : 19 ; Gal. 5 : 20). P. S.

20. The Lord's Supper was evidently to be a solemn commemoration and recognition of the redemption and deliverance of mankind by the death of Christ, as the Feast of the Passover was of the deliverance of the Israelites from the destroying angel. Nor is this all ; for as the Jews were accustomed in their peace-offerings to eat a part of the victim, and thus partook of the sacrifice, so they would perceive that in this new institution the eating of the bread and drinking of the wine was a mark and symbol of their participating in the effects of this new peace-offering, the death of Christ, whose body was broken and whose blood was shed for them on the cross. They would also see that this supper of our Lord was from that time to be substituted in the room of the Passover. P.

The Lord's Supper is called a sacrament, that is, a sign and an oath. An outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace ; an oath by which we bind our souls with a bond unto the Lord. It is called the Lord's Supper, because it was first instituted in the evening, and at the close of the Passover Supper, and because we therein feed upon Christ, the Bread of Life. It is called the Communion, as herein we commune with Christ and with his people. It is called the Eucharist, a thanksgiving, because Christ, in the institution of it, gave thanks, and because we, in the participation of it, must give thanks likewise. It is called a feast, and by some a feast upon sacrifice (though not a sacrifice itself), in allusion to the custom of the Jews feasting upon their sacrifices. Buck.

21, 22. The Church of Corinth had introduced what was called a love-feast, in which the churches met together, previous to the reception of the Lord's Supper, to partake of a common meal, rich and poor bringing their own provisions. Beautiful as the idea was, it was liable to great abuse. In order to rectify the abuses which had grown out of these love-feasts, the apostle recalls to their remembrance the reasons for the original institution of the Lord's Supper, and from them deduces the guilt and responsibility of their desecration of that ordinance. He says that it was meant as a memorial of the Redeemer's sacrifice. F. W. R.

23-26. Three of the writers of the Gospels record the facts of its first institution, and of its being enjoined on the disciples as a memorial of Christ, and as a sacred symbol of his atoning sacrifice. Paul here records the special revelation to him of the same facts. These records show that its Institutor, and his first ministers, considered it an ordinance in which true Christians only are to commune happily together in love, and profitably together by faith, upon the consecrated symbols of their Saviour's body and blood ; that, having previously, by "repentance toward God and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ," become participants in the pardon of sin, and in the hope of eternal life, as revealed in the gospel, such Christians come together at the Lord's Supper to express their love for Christ and their faith in him ; and, in the exercise of these graces, to be refreshed and strengthened in the new life mightily, feeding in spirit on "the true bread which came down from heaven." J. S. S.

Looking at this ordinance we may distinguish four leading ideas : The memorial idea. "Do this in remembrance of me." The love which brought salvation, and the way by which salvation came, are to be kept fresh in our minds by the periodic observance of the ordinance which commemorates Christ's death. The symbolical idea. As baptism teaches by symbol the doctrine of depravity and the necessity of regeneration, so the impressive ordinance of the supper speaks to us of guilt and of the atonement. The social idea. It is the "Lord's table" which is spread, the "Lord's Supper" of which we partake. It is a communion of Christians with their Lord and with one another. The sacramental idea. This ordinance, besides being a memorial service and symbolical of precious truth, is really a means of grace to those who receive it in faith ; in a real though not in a bodily sense Christ is present, and in a spiritual though not in a corporeal manner believers do feed upon him to their spiritual nourishment and growth in grace. F. L. P.

Christ is really present to his people in this sacrament, not bodily, but in spirit ; not in the sense of local nearness, but of efficacious operation. They receive him not with the mouth, but by faith ; they receive his flesh and blood, not as flesh, not as material particles, not as human life, not the supernatural influence of his glorified body in heaven, but his body as broken and his blood as shed. The union thus signified and effected is not a corporeal union, not a mixture of substances, but a spiritual and mystical union due to the indwelling of the Holy Spirit. The efficacy of this sacrament as a means of grace is not in the sign, nor in the service, nor in the minister, nor in the word, but in the attending influence of the Holy Ghost. C. H.—The holy Communion was meant to be an abiding sign of Christ's love to us, that as we received into our bodies the bread and wine, which are the signs of his body and blood, so he would enter into our spirits by his Spirit, and so become partaker in us, that we might become partakers in him. T. A.—We come to Christ for life, and to the holy Communion with life. We come to Christ for forgiveness, and to the holy Communion with forgiveness, if we come to it aright, for the strengthening and refreshing of our souls by the body and blood of Christ, as our bodies are by the bread and wine. Food and strength are for the living and not for the dead. A dead thing can not get strength and refreshment. It must first have life. The sinner, by grace, gets life in Christ and from Christ, and has Christ for his life; and in the blessed sacrament obtains by the same grace, from Christ, and not from the sacrament, strength and refreshment for the soul. The God of all grace works in the hearts of his believing people, in this and all his other ordinances, richly, to their souls' good. Gregg.

We feel what a tie there is to bind each of us to his brother when we come to the table of our common Lord. So far, the Lord's Supper is but a type of what every Christian meeting should be. Never should any of us be gathered together on any occasion of common life, in our families or with our neighbors, we should sit down to no meal, we should meet in no company, without having Christ also in the midst of us, without remembering what we all are to him, and what we each therefore are to our brethren. T. A.

These hands which take the body and blood of Christ, how holy they ought to be. They shall not withhold anything from Christ which he requires of us, nor be shut against the needy; they shall work no ill to a neighbor, keep back no just due; they shall be diligent in business, as the hands of Christ must have been when he worked at his trade and dignified our labor; they shall strike no passionate blow; they shall use severity at proper times, sustained by divine authority; they shall shed kindness and blessings on others; they shall write no letters which the eye of Christ might not be permitted to read; they shall receive no gains on which we can not ask his blessing. N. A.

26. Till he come. The rite was not a memorial of death simply, but of death conquered by life. The seal of the efficacy of the death of Christ was given in the resurrection, and the limit of the commemoration of his passion was looked for in his return. B. F. W.—The memorial of the cross is also the promise of the glory; and they who at the Lord's table on earth love to show forth their Lord's death till he come, are surely more likely than others to be looking forward to the glorious moment when they will be called to sit down to the marriage supper of the Lamb. A. W. T.

Notice here the many words which are connected with "the Lord" by the apostle: The Lord's body, verse 29; the Lord's blood, verse 27; the Lord's bread, verse 27; the Lord's cup, verse 27; the Lord's death, verse 26; the Lord's supper, verse 20. For in this ordinance Christ is all and in all; everything here speaks of Jesus, and he speaks in everything; he is the Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, the first and the last. Bonar.

Christ instituted two outward rites. There could not have been fewer, and they could not have been simpler; and look at the portentous outgrowth of superstition, and the unnumbered evils, religious, moral, social, and even political, which have come from the invincible tendency of human nature to corrupt forms, even when the forms are the sweet and simple ones of Christ's own appointment. What a lesson the history of the Lord's Supper, and its gradual change from the domestic memorial of the dying love of our Lord to the "tremendous sacrifice," reads us as to the dangerous ally which spiritual religion—and there is no other religion than spiritual—enlists when it seeks the help of external rites! A. M.

27-30. The occasion on which he spake is well known. The grossly "carnal" Corinthians had fallen into the practice of making the Lord's Supper a common meal, or, something worse, an occasion of excessive sensual indulgence. They paid no attention to it as a divinely ordained commemoration of the death and passion of the Lord Jesus Christ. They "distinguished" not between this and an ordinary feast: they ate, drank, and were drunken. They "discerned not the Lord's body," in that they treated the consecrated bread and wine, which were its symbols, as though they were a profane feast. They had lost sight of the true character and design of the sacrament, and had gone to such "excess of rioting," that, as a special judgment, some of them were seized with "weakness and sickness," and many of them were fallen "asleep," either in literal death or in awful spiritual insensibility. They were "guilty of the body and blood of the Lord," by heaping contempt on that sacred ordinance in which they were represented. Contempt of the symbol is contempt of the thing symbolized. Contempt of the representative is contempt of the being represented. Thus the body of Christ was dishonored by the abuse heaped on its memorial. Thus "the King of Saints" himself was insulted by the slight cast on his divinely appointed representative. This, plainly, is the whole of the apostle's meaning. J. S. S.

In verse 29, "damnation" should be "judgment"; and in verse 34, "condemnation" should be written "judgment." In verse 31, "if we would judge ourselves" should be "if we duly discerned ourselves." The verb is the same as in "discern not" in verse 29, and should have been carefully kept identical. A.

32. It is not an easy matter to be drawn from the love of this world, and this is that which God mainly requires of his children. And if in the midst of afflictions they are sometimes subject to this disease, how would it grow upon them with ease and prosperity? When they are beaten from one worldly folly or delight, they are ready to lay hold upon some other, being thrust out from it at one door to enter at some other. Thus, it is clear, there is great need of afflictions, yea, of many afflictions, that the saints be chastened by the Lord, that they may not be condemned with the world. L.

Section 271.

1 CORINTHIANS xii. 1-31.

1 Now concerning spiritual gifts, brethren, I would not have you ignorant. Ye know
2 that ye were Gentiles, carried away unto these dumb idols, even as ye were led. Where-
3 fore I give you to understand, that no man speaking by the Spirit of God calleth Jesus
4 accursed: and that no man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost. Now
5 there are diversities of gifts, but the same Spirit. And there are differences of administra-
6 tions, but the same Lord. And there are diversities of operations, but it is the same God
7 which worketh all in all. But the manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit 8 withal. For to one is given by the Spirit the word of wisdom; to another the word of 9 knowledge by the same Spirit; to another faith by the same Spirit; to another the gifts of 10 healing by the same Spirit; to another the working of miracles; to another prophecy; to 11 another discerning of spirits; to another divers kinds of tongues; to another the interpre-12 tation of tongues: but all these worketh that one and the selfsame Spirit, dividing to every 13 man severally as he will. For as the body is one, and hath many members, and all the 14 members of that one body, being many, are one body: so also is Christ. For by one Spirit 15 are we all baptized into one body, whether we be Jews or Gentiles, whether we be bond or 16 free; and have been all made to drink into one Spirit.

14 For the body is not one member, but many. If the foot shall say, Because I am not the 15 hand, I am not of the body; is it therefore not of the body? And if the ear shall say, 16 Because I am not the eye, I am not of the body; is it therefore not of the body? If the 17 whole body were an eye, where were the hearing? If the whole were hearing, where were 18 the smelling? But now hath God set the members every one of them in the body, as it 19 hath pleased him. And if they were all one member, where were the body? But now are 20 they many members, yet but one body. And the eye cannot say unto the hand, I have no
21 need of thee: nor again the head to the feet, I have no need of you. Nay, much more 22 those members of the body, which seem to be more feeble, are necessary: and those mem-
23 bers of the body, which we think to be less honourable, upon these we bestow more abun-
24 dant honour; and our uncomely parts have more abundant comeliness. For our comely
25 parts have no need: but God hath tempered the body together, having given more abundant 26 honour to that part which lacked: that there should be no schism in the body; but that 27 the members should have the same care one for another. And whether one member suffer, 28 all the members suffer with it; or one member be honoured, all the members rejoice with 29 it. Now ye are the body of Christ, and members in particular.

28 And God hath set some in the church, first apostles, secondarily prophets, thirdly 29 teachers, after that miracles, then gifts of healings, helps, governments, diversities of 30 tongues. Are all apostles? are all prophets? are all teachers? are all workers of miracles?
31 Have all the gifts of healing? do all speak with tongues? do all interpret? But covet earnestly the best gifts: and yet shew I unto you a more excellent way.

As warmth is inseparable from fire and brightness from light, so are the qualities of hallowing and giving life, of goodness and rectitude, inseparable from the Spirit. It is He that fills angels and archangels, hallows powers, gives life to all. Distributed to creatures, and variously shared by each, he is nowise diminished by those that share him. To all he gives the grace which proceeds from him, but he is not spent on his receivers; on the contrary, while they that take him are filled, he himself lacks nothing. He illuminates all men for the knowledge of God ; he inspires prophets ; he gives wisdom to lawgivers, perfects just men, gives dignity to the self-controlled, works gifts of healing, gives life to the dead, releases the fettered, adopts the aliens into sonship. This he works through the birth from above. Through him the weak become strong, and the poor rich, and the unskilled in argument are wiser than the wise. He abides in heaven, and fills the earth, and is everywhere present, and nowhere circumscribed. He dwells entire in each one, and is entire with God. He does not administer his gifts ministerially, but distributes his graces with sovereign power. For he divides to each severally as he wills. Basil.

The Church may well be compared to a garden variegated with flowers of every species and clime ; to an anthem, in which the highest and deepest tones blend in wonderful harmony ; to a body, whose members have each its particular form and function, yet are ruled by the same head, permeated by the same blood, and subservient to the same end. In this very diversity of divine endowments must we adore the inexhaustible wisdom and grace of the Lord. The unbiased contemplation of this unity in diversity and diversity in unity should free us from all exclusiveness and bigotry, and raise us to a genuine liberality and catholicity of thought and feeling. P. S.

3-6. In this chapter Paul sets himself to discuss spiritual gifts and inspiration. First, he lays down a broad general principle respecting spiritual inspiration ; secondly, he determines the place and value of different degrees of spiritual inspiration. He lays down the general principle respecting inspiration in the third verse : "No man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost." This made the broad separation between the Christian Church and the Gentile world. F. W. R.

4. Diversities of gifts. Gregory the Great says : "The Almighty has acted with the souls of men as he has with the different countries of the earth. He might have given fruits of all kinds to every land ; but, if every land did not require the fruits of another, there would be no fellowship maintained with the others. Hence it comes to pass that to one he gives what the other has not, and the latter supplies what the former wants, and so the separated lands are united by a communication of gifts. And, like different countries, the souls of saints are related to productions—they are all united together in one love." Thus Gregory points out how the inequality and diversity among men is necessary and ordained by God ; that to wish to make all things externally equal would be a mutilation of nature and a destruction of divine arrangement ; but that the love that proceeds from the gospel equalizes all from within, as all the inequalities founded in nature, or springing out of the relations of life, ought to be materials for the expression and preservation of love. N.

But the same Spirit. There is an essential difference in all lives, and there is in them also, by the gift of God, an essential unity. There is a difference in them because there is a unity ; because, that is, they are not bounded by that which falls under our present notice, which is fragmentary, imperfect, half suppressed, but pass on to the more immediate presence of God, where all that has been blessed by his Spirit coexists in absolute harmony and power. B. F. W.

7. While the Spirit is of one nature, yet many are the excellences which in the name of Christ he works out. For he uses one man's tongue to utter wisdom, illuminates another's soul with prophecy, to another gives ability to interpret the divine Scriptures. One man's self-control he strengthens, another he teaches how to give alms, another to discipline himself, another to despise the interests of the body ; another he prepares for martyrdom ; differently in each case, but not diverse from himself, as it is written, "But the manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal." Cyril of Jerusalem.—The loftiest gifts, the most conspicuous position, have no other purpose than that which the lowliest powers in the obscurest corner are meant to subserve. The one distributing Spirit divides to each man severally as he will ; and whether he endows him with starlike gifts, which soar above and blaze over half the world with luster that lives through the centuries, or whether he set him in some cottage window to send out a tiny cone of light that pierces a little way into the night for an hour or two and then is quenched—it is all one. The manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man for the same purpose—to do good with. And we have all one office and function to be discharged by each in his own fashion, namely, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Christ Jesus. A. M.

12. The whole human body is admirably arranged for growth and vigor. Every member and joint contributes to its healthful and harmonious action. All depend on the head with reference to the most important functions of life, and all derive their vigor from that. So it is in the Church. It is well arranged for growth and vigor, and it is beautifully organized in its various members and officers. It depends, moreover, on Christ as the head, to sustain, invigorate, and guide it. A. B.

13. Baptized. There is an inward work on the soul—a work of power and love, of quickening and life-warm energy, of transforming, yet of ordinary grace—which is called a baptism, doubtless because the baptism by water is its appointed symbol. This inward work of the Spirit, whenever effected through the word of God, and the holy light which this word sheds around the mind, may, with truth and force, be called a baptism. Now, the whole of this connection is figurative speech; that is, the literal human body—animated, of course, by the living human soul—is used as a strong figure of the mystical body of Christ, filled with that Holy Spirit by whom its members are cemented into indissoluble union. Hence, doubtless, the baptism spoken of is that inward baptism of the Holy Ghost, which has its appointed symbol indeed in the baptism by water, but which, as we have so often seen, has no connection with it as its operated result. The true force of the passage may be thus expressed in paraphrase: “By one divine Spirit, all real Christians, of whatever nation or name, are closely united as members in that one spiritual body, of which Christ is the head; and this work of the Spirit may be called a baptism, because it has its appointed symbol in that primary Christian ordinance.” J. S. S.

13. By one Spirit into one body. Union in Christ they have that are indeed Christians; this they pretend to have who profess themselves Christians. If natural friendship be capable of that expression, one spirit in two bodies, Christian union hath it much more really and properly. For there is, indeed, one Spirit more extensive in all the faithful; yea, so one spirit, that it makes them up into one body more extensive. They are not so much as divers bodies, only divers members of one body. L.

14. There are different members, and all have not the same office. Some are there to teach—some to counsel and administer—some to tend the young—some to visit the sick-bed—some to conduct the temporal affairs of the Church—some to be liberal givers as God has prospered them—and some, without any formal mode of action, come under this description, which applies to them all, “Sons of God, without rebuke, shining as lights in the world, holding forth the word of life.” It is very beautiful to see how the God, who has bound his world into a grand harmony by its very diversity, has arranged for this same end in his Church, by giving the members their different faculties of work—how the pure light that comes from the sun breaks into its separate hues when it touches the palace-house of Christ with its varied cornices and turrets till every color lies in tranquil beauty beside its fellow. If it is not so it should be so, and as the Church grows it will be so. Use and ornament, the corner-stone and the cope-stone, shall both be felt to have their due place. Ker.

17. Not only is the life of the body one thing, in whichever of the members it operates, but also the members conspire together to one end. In fetching and reaching anything, the design is formed by the brain; the object is seen by the eye; the feet are made to walk in that direction; the hands subsequently are raised to grasp the object. Combination for one purpose is quite as obvious in the whole procedure as the interpenetration of the entire body by one life. E. M. G.

20, 21. The impression which the apostolic Epistles give us of a Christian congregation is that of a body so organized as that each and every member is made useful to the whole body, and the particular gift which God bestows upon the weakest and most insignificant is so appreciated and applied, that “the head” or “the eye”—the most intelligent or most discerning—can not say to that weak member, “I have no need of thee.” N. M.

22. As the apostle has spoken in the whole chapter of the gifts of the Holy Spirit, since it is with reference to these that he distinguishes the members of the Church as strong and feeble, we may present the idea of the apostle in this form. The gifts of the Holy Spirit which are the most feeble are also the most necessary. The gifts that are more feeble are humility, by which a believer abases himself before God and regards others as more excellent than himself; fidelity, which will not be unjust in the smallest any more than in the greatest things; purity of manners and of thought, which keeps undefiled the temple where the Holy Spirit deigns to dwell; truth, which would not for the greatest bribe open its lips to the slightest falsehood; contentment, which bears all losses without a murmur, because its real treasure can not be taken from it; activity, which remembers that the kingdom of God consists not in words but in deeds; charity, not charity factitious, borrowed, learned by heart, but a true love, a tenderness of soul, which alternately pities and consoles, soothes and besecches, which can not revile or despise, which bears all things, excuses all things, which rejoices not in iniquity but rejoices in the truth. A. V.

24. To regard the business attaching to any station of life as insignificant is as unreasonable as it is unscriptural. Paul says of the human body, that God has “given honor to those members which lacked.” The same may be said of society. Its whole fabric and framework is built up of humble duties accurately fulfilled by persons in humble stations. The Scripture, with that wonderful penetration into the thoughts of man which characterizes its every page, has taken care to set the seal of dignity and sacredness upon those callings and employments which are lowest in the social scale. E. M. G.—If I am faithfully serving Christ, does it really so much matter whether my hand holds a scepter, a pen, or a spade—whether I touch thousands every day or only shillings and pence—whether I meet many people or only few—whether my house is large or small—whether my name is famous or utterly unknown? It is but “a little while,” and the stir and tumult of life, be it in high or low degree, will be over, the drudgery all gone through, the commonness ended in the shining of eternal sublimity. Not where I am, but what I am, and, still more, what I am becoming, is the thing! Not what I do, but how I am doing it! Not high or low in earthly place and estimate, but high or low in purpose, tone, temper! If anything of nobler outward aspect can be inserted into your life, well. If you can have the seeming commonness associated and relieved with something visibly greater and better—some new task, endeavor, friendship, possibility—well. But if not, we say again, call not that life which God in his infinite wisdom has appointed for you, which by his great redeeming act he has purified, which from the roll of his providence is unfolding itself under his very eye, which is quick with the stirrings of his Spirit, which has the seeds of immortal glory in its bosom—call it not common. It is great, unless you make it little; it is good, unless you make it evil. A. R.

26. The spirit and the law of the life of Christ is to be that of every member of the Church, and the law of the life of Christ is that of sympathy. F. W. R.—And this living sympathy is in every living member of the body of Christ toward the whole and toward each particular part. This makes a Christian rejoice in the welfare and good of another as if it were his own, and feel their griefs and distresses as if himself were really sharer in them; for the word comprehends all feeling together, feeling of joy as well as of grief. And always where there is most of grace and of the Spirit of Jesus Christ there is most of this sympathy. When the heart can unfeignedly rejoice in the Lord's bounty to others, and the luster of grace in others far outshining their own, truly it is an evidence that what grace such a one hath is upright and good, and that the law of love is engraven in his heart. And where that is there will be likewise a compassionate, tender sense of the infirmities and frailties of their brethren. L.

27. Under this striking and beautiful symbol of the body is set forth the unity, the harmony, the proportionate and cooperative efficiency of the Church of Christ. That equality of the brotherhood which our Lord laid down as a fundamental principle in the constitution of his Church does not imply equality of function or of official place and work. In primitive times, when miraculous gifts were widely shared by the Church, there were marked diversities in those gifts, and in the official position of persons thus endowed. And now the equality of the brotherhood does not displace the divine law of arrangement, distribution, adaptation in the body. For the Church is not a society, it is a body; and the equality of its members consists first in the fact of membership in Christ, their common head; next in community of privileges; next in dependence upon one another for sympathy and support; next in coöperation toward the same end, under the authority and direction of the one head. And the humblest may now obtain the greatest gifts, which in the next chapter the apostle defines to be faith, hope, charity. J. P. T.

28. The miraculous gifts imparted to many in the early Church are carefully ranked and marked by the hand of the apostle as inferior to those gifts which were “for edification and exhortation and comfort.” “And God hath set some in the Church, first apostles, secondarily prophets, thirdly teachers, after that miracles, then gifts of healing, helps, governments, diversities of tongues.” Here miracle-working, healing, and speaking with divers tongues are set as inferior gifts to those whereby men were constituted teachers or prophets. Arthur.—All these are engaged in the work of the ministry, though in different departments. Together they constituted the ministry by which Christ meant to establish and edify the Church; but the offices of prophets and apostles were not designed to be permanent. A. B.

Prophets, teachers. All offices, whether for the government or edification of the body, were considered as charisms—gifts of the Spirit. Persons who were designated by their peculiar natural powers, as quickened and directed by the Spirit, for the discharge of their functions, were appointed to fulfill them. Among the gifts of the Spirit was that of teaching. There was a class of persons who showed themselves specially adapted to speak in a moving and instructive way, and these were recognized as having a divine call to this service. They were not elders, though elders might teach, and late in the apostolic age teaching came to be considered a necessary part of an elder's work. But teaching was free in the apostolic churches, in the sense that whoever felt himself impelled by an inward impulse to address his brethren might do so at the proper time in the service. The gift of prophecy was not a foretelling of future events, but rather a fervid outpouring of Christian truth, it might be in the form of exhortation. The “teacher” expounded doctrine in the exercise of reflection, and as a fruit of the study of the Old Testament Scriptures, though under an illumination from above. The utterances of the “prophets” were more improvised, and thus adapted to seize on the attention and thrill the mind even of a pagan auditor who chanced to enter the Christian assemblies. The addresses of the “teacher” were in the form of didactic instruction; those of the “prophet” were hortatory, or at least predominantly emotional. These last might spring from an extravagant zeal or enthusiasm, and contain an admixture of hurtful error. Hence there were persons competent to discern spirits, or to discriminate between what should be considered divine truth and what should be rejected.

Miracles. Including the power to heal diseases without the intervention of the ordinary means of cure. Illustrations of the exercise of these powers are presented in the book of Acts; but they were not specially called into activity in the assemblies for worship.—Thus, in the apostolic church, all the functions of government, as well as of teaching, were in the hands of those who were conscious of acting as the organs of a Power above themselves, by whom they were singled out, each of them for his particular work. It was a community lifted up to this high pitch of earnestness. It was, to use the apostle's simile, a body, every member of which served every other, and was served in turn by all. G. P. F.

Other gifts specially mentioned as charisms are the gift of government and the gift of ministration. By the former, certain persons were specially fitted to preside over the Church and regulate its internal order; by the latter, its possessors were enabled to minister to the wants of their brethren, to manage the distribution of relief among the poorer members of the Church, to tend the sick, and carry out other practical works of piety. C.

31. Covet the best gifts. The same apostle who so earnestly urged contentment with the gifts we have, and forbade contemptuous scorn of others with feeble gifts, bids us yet to aspire. Be contented, yet aspire; that should be the faith of all, and the two are quite compatible. And there arises from such a belief the possibility of generous admiration; all the miserable shutting-up of ourselves in superciliousness is done away. Desirous of reaching something higher, we recognize love and what is above ourselves; and this is the condition of excellence, for we become that which we admire. All gifts are to be cultivated; let no Christian despise them. Every accomplishment, every intellectual faculty that can adorn and grace human nature, should be cultivated and polished to its highest capability. Yet these are not the things that bring us nearer God. "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." "If we love one another, God dwelleth in us, and his love is perfected in us." You may have strong, eagle-eyed faith; well, you will probably be enabled to do great things in life, to work wonders, to trample on impossibilities. You may have sanguine hope; well, your life will pass brightly, not gloomily. But the vision of God as he is, to see the King in his beauty, is vouchsafed not to science nor to talent, but only to purity and love. F. W. R.

Section 272.

1 CORINTHIANS xiii. 1-13.

1 THOUGH I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal. And though I have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries, and all knowledge; and though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and have not charity, I am nothing. And though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing. Charity suffereth long, and is kind; charity envieth not; charity vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up, doth not behave itself unseemly, seeketh not her own, is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil; rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth; beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things. Charity never faileth: but whether there be prophecies, they shall fail; whether there be tongues, they shall cease; whether there be knowledge, it shall vanish away. For we know in part, and we prophesy in part. But when that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away. When I was a child, I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child: but when I became a man, I put away childish things. For now we see through a glass, darkly; but then face to face: now I know in part; but then shall I know even as also I am known. And now abideth faith, hope, charity, these three; but the greatest of these is charity.

CHARITY involves the highest affection of the soul, and directs that affection with a proportionate ardor, and an absolute continuance toward all moral beings. It is piety toward God. It is a constraining philanthropy toward man. It reaches to all that lives around us. It loves ourselves, and we ought to be loved. And this is the ultimate glory of character. It is the parent of all other virtues, containing them within it. It is the sum of all other virtues, for "the greatest is charity." Humility, truthfulness, patience, magnanimity, the chasteness of temper that makes the soul white, the spirit of forgiveness that makes the soul Godlike, every excellence that exalts, every trait that adorns, is the child of benevolence. And yet this is simple as light, as air! R. S. S.

Hold fast charity, on which all the secrets of Scripture depend; so will you hold fast what you have learned, and also what you have not yet learned. For if you know charity, you know something on which that also depends which perhaps you know not; and in what you understand in Scripture charity is patent, in what you do not understand charity is latent. Accordingly he who holds fast charity in his conduct holds both what is patent and what is latent in the divine discourses. Wherefore follow after charity, the sweet and salutary bond of souls, without which the rich man is poor, with which the poor man is rich. Charity is patient in adversities, temperate in prosperity, strong in grievous sufferings, cheerful in good works; most secure in temptation, most expansive in hospitality; most joyous among true brethren, most patient among false ones. In Abel it is acceptable through sacrifice, in Noah fearless amid the deluge, in Abraham's wanderings most faithful, in Moses most forbearing amid injuries, in David's tribulations most gentle. It is free-spoken in Paul for rebuke, humble in Peter for submission; human in Christians for confessing, divine in Christ for pardoning. But what can I say of charity that is greater or richer than those praises of it which the Lord utters by the mouth of the apostle when he points to the "far-surpassing way"? How great is charity! The power of prophecy, the basis of knowledge, the fruit of faith, the riches of the poor, the life of the dying. Aug.

THE previous chapter discusses the gifts of the Spirit, this contrasts them with the grace of charity or love; but the last verse of the former is the link between both chapters: "Covet earnestly the best gifts; and yet show I unto you a more excellent way." Now the more excellent way is charity. He who treads the brilliant road of the highest accomplishments is, as a man, inferior to him who treads the path of love. To the apostle's mind there was emptiness in eloquence, nothingness in knowledge and even in faith, uselessness in liberality and sacrifice where love was not. And none could be better qualified than he to speak. None taught like him the philosophy of Christianity. None had so strong a faith or so deep a spirit of self-sacrifice. In no other writings are we so refined and exalted by "the thoughts which breathe and words that burn." And yet, in solitary preëminence above all these gifts, he puts the grace of love. F. W. R.

The beautiful superstructure of philanthropy, which the apostle has raised in this chapter, has for its foundation a supreme regard for the great and blessed God. The utmost kindness and sympathy, the most tender compassion united with the most munificent liberality, if it do not rest on the love of God, is not the temper here set forth—is not the grace which has the principle of immortality in its nature, and which will live and flourish in eternity when faith and hope shall cease. For want of this vital and essential principle of all true religion, how much of kindly feeling and active benevolence is daily expended, which, while it yields its amiable though unrenewed professor much honor and delight, has not the weight of a feather in the scales of his eternal destiny.

1. Sounding brass. Should a man be invested with these stupendous endowments, and employ them in the service of the gospel; still, if his heart were not a partaker of love, he would be no more acceptable to God than was the clangor of the brazen instruments employed in the idolatrous worship of the Egyptian Isis, or the noise of the tinkling cymbals which accompanied the orgies of the Grecian Cybele.

2, 3. Though one were gifted with prophecy so as to explain the deepest mysteries of the Jewish or the Christian systems, and, in addition, possessed with miraculous faith by which the most difficult and astonishing changes would have been effected, he was nothing, and less than nothing, without love. "And though I give my body to be burned," i. e., as a martyr for religion. Whether such a case as this ever existed we know not; it is not impossible; but if it did, not the tortures of an agonizing death, nor the courage that endured them, nor the seeming zeal for religion which led to them, would be accepted in lieu of love. J. A. J.—I relieve no man upon the rhetoric of his miseries, nor to content mine own commiserating disposition; for this is still but moral charity, and an act that oweth more to passion than reason. He that relieves another upon the bare suggestion and bowels of pity doth not this so much for his sake as for his own; for by compassion we make others' misery our own, and so by relieving them we relieve ourselves also. Brown.

4. Suffereth long. The word signifies "to have a long mind," to the end of whose patience provocations can not easily reach. It does not mean patience in reference to the afflictions which come from God, but to the injuries and provocations which come from man, a disposition which under long-continued offenses holds back anger, and is not hasty to punish or to revenge. Its kindred property is nearly allied to it, "is not easily provoked," or "is not exasperated." Kind. Kindness is anxious not to give offense; it is delicately tender in reference to the feelings of its object, and would not unnecessarily crush the wing of an insect, much less inflict a wound upon a rational mind. It is active in conferring benefits—watches for an opportunity to afford assistance, and is not satisfied unless it can do something to increase the general stock of comfort. Envieth not. Envy causes us to feel uneasiness at the sight of another's possessions or happiness, and makes us dislike him on that account. Of all base passions, this is the basest. It is unmingled malignity; the most direct contrariety of love. Envy can not even offer the excuses which many vices sometimes bring forward: anger pleads the provocation it has received, but envy has received no offense; lust and intemperance plead the gratification which their objects yield, and robbery holds up its gain, but envy gains nothing but misery, and converts the happiness of which it is the witness into wormwood and gall for its own cup, and transvenoms the honey of another man's comfort into the poison of asps for its own bosom. It is a source of eternal vexation—an instrument of self-torment—a rottenness in the bones—a burning ulceration of the soul—a crime which, partaking of the guilt, partakes as largely of the misery of hell. J. A. J.

4, 5. "Charity is not puffed up." This seems rather an attribute of humility than of charity. Again: "Charity doth not behave itself unseemly"; i. e., shows taste and tact in finer points of conduct. This sounds rather like courtesy than like charity. But the inspired apostle is not wandering from his point. Love has the closest connection with humility and courtesy, so that perfect love can never exist without either. Every breach of love in the world is due more or less to pride. Whence come all wranglings, jars, and discords, but from a secret feeling that a certain precedence and certain rights are our due, and a determination always to stand upon those rights, and never to waive that precedence? Strike at the root of this feeling in the heart, and you strike at the root of every quarrel; or, in other words, secure humility in any mind of man, and you secure love, at least on its negative side. The case is the same with courtesy. Perfect love would involve perfect courtesy, that is to say, a nice sense of propriety in our intercourse with others, and a delicacy of feeling toward them. So far as any one is defective in this perfect courtesy, he wants one of the finer features of love. E. M. G.

5. Seeketh not her own. The essence of man's sin, the sum of his moral depravity, is to love himself supremely, to seek himself finally and exclusively, to make self, in one shape or another, the center to which all his busy thoughts, anxious cares, and diligent pursuits constantly tend. Self is the great idol which mankind are naturally disposed to worship, and selfishness the grand interest to which they are devotedly attached. But the grace of God so subdues this disposition that it is no longer the ascendant of the mind, and plants in the heart the principle of benevolence—a principle which, as it leads us to love God supremely, and our neighbor as ourselves, is the direct contrary of selfishness.

Thinketh no evil. Like a good spirit, it is ever opposing the advice and counteracting the influence of envy, revenge, or avarice. It would make the miserable happy and the happy still happier. It retires into the closet to project schemes for blessing mankind, and then goes out into the crowded regions of want and wretchedness to execute them; it deviseth good on its bed, and riseth in the morning to fulfill the plans of mercy with which it had sunk to rest.

7. Charity is not fickle, unsteady, and easily discouraged; not soon disheartened, or induced to relinquish its object; but is persevering, patient, and self-denying in the pursuance of its design to relieve the wants, assuage the sorrows, reform the vices, and allay the animosities of those whose good it seeks. J. A. J.—We ought not to drive when we find we can not lead, nor wax fretful and impatient of delays which are inevitable, nor lose temper over great things or over trifles, for that will show that we ourselves are growing weaker, nor impute malign motives to others, nor even to think ungenerous or uncharitable thoughts concerning them or their action, but rather seek to settle our strength in this—in the universal charity which "beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things," and then, as the result, achieveth all things. A. R.

8. Charity never faileth. Yes, see its eternity, its immortal vigor and freshness. For the door of heaven itself is thrown open, and lo! charity is there, as she was for ever, in the bosom of God—now in the hearts of his redeemed people. All personal accomplishments, intellectual masteries, miraculous exploits, prophecies, tongues, earthly knowledge, are passing away; the brightest lights go out, the finest brain is broken, the most eloquent voice is still. They "fail," they "cease," they "vanish away." They are all "in part," and are "done away," "when that which is perfect is come." Half blind, and groping, we see "as through a glass darkly." How true that is! The skies are clouded. Our very eyes are weak, and ache with straining to see. But all that lovely air is clear; and when the purer eyes of the spiritual body are opened, without dimness, doubt, or uncertainty, in the wondering fullness of open vision, the children of Christian charity shall see face to face, and in the "love that passeth knowledge" know as they are known. F. D. H.

9. Prophecy gives us light, that the Church may not lose its hope in the dark hours of its discipline. But the light reveals neither the length of the way nor the severity of the trials nor the exact nature or extent of the final triumph, for such full knowledge would prevent those influences with which the present state of things acts on character, and which are better than knowledge. He who gains character out of the uncertainties of life gains everything. He has learned in the dark not only those qualities of character which make him a good actor in these earthly scenes and which generally insure success, but he has learned also how to depend on God, to trust in his providence, to act with him in his plans, and to secure his coöperation. He is thus fitted for eternal life, for its employment, for its revelations. He has gained from his condition here what God meant he should. Soon this earthly darkness shall pass away; soon a boundless field of knowledge be open to him; soon perfect certainty be within his reach. He now knows as he is known. Is not this gain? T. D. W.

10. Perfect is come. Looking at man we seem to see a vast collection of little beginnings, attempts, failures; like a plantation on a bleak and blasted heath. And the progress in whatever is valuable and noble, whether in individuals or communities, is so miserably difficult and slow. So that "the perfectibility of man," in the sense in which that phrase has been employed, stands justly ridiculed as one of the follies of philosophic romance. Then how delightful it is to see revelation itself pronouncing as possible, and predicting as to come, something "perfect" in the condition of man! That which is in part shall be done away. Imagine the emerging from this dark world into light! what a dismissal from our spirits, what a vanishing away of the whole systems of our little notions, our childish conceptions! And yet there will not be an entire contempt thrown upon the retrospect, for it will be understood how those little notions, that feeble light, that partial revelation, were the right training for the infancy and childhood of the human soul. Let us, then, be thankful that we do know, though but in part, and earnestly apply and improve what we are permitted to know. Let us be thankful, too, that one point of that very knowledge is, that its imperfection will at length be left behind. J. F.

11. It is easier to be always childish than to be always childlike. The immaturity and heedlessness of youth bear carriage better than the more precious vintages of that sunny land—its freshness of eye and heart, its openness of mind, its energy of hand. Even when these are in any measure retained—beautiful as they are in old age—they are but too apt to be associated with an absence of the excellences more proper to the later stages of life, and to involve a want of patient judgment, of sagacious discrimination, of rooted affections, of prudent persistent action. Beautiful indeed it is when the grace of the children and the strength of the young men live on in the fathers, and the last of life incloses all that was good in all that went before. But miserable it is, and quite as frequent a case, when gray hairs cover a childish brain, and an aged heart throbs with the feverish passion of youthful blood. A. M.

12. Paul was fully conscious that, when he should be raised to the full vision of the life above, that which he knew of divine things in this life must be cast aside by him, as the mature man casts aside the conceptions of childhood. The twilight of the earthly life of faith did not satisfy the aspirations of his soul, which thirsted after knowledge; and he longed to pass into that pure day of heavenly clearness, where our knowledge of God and divine things will be inward, immediate, a direct perception of that which is present, a knowing as we are known. N.

What an idea does it give us of the infinitude of knowledge yet to be obtained, when we are informed that the Bible itself, even the New Testament—that book of books, of which it is said it has God for its author, truth without any mixture of error for its contents, and salvation for its end—is but a book for children, a work for saints in their infancy, a mere elementary treatise on the subject of eternal truth, written by the finger of God for his family during their education and novitiate on earth. Our minds could no more bear to look upon the unmitigated glory of divine truth than the eye of an infant could sustain the unsoftened effulgence of the mid-day sun. The study, the discovery, the enjoyment of truth will form one of the chief felicities of the heavenly state; but what must that knowledge be which is to afford something new and interesting through eternity? how can this be obtained by man in the infancy of his existence upon earth? No wonder, then, that we walk at present amid shades and glimmerings! J. A. J.

Face to face we shall know. Adoration is the gate of knowledge. And when this gate of the soul is fully opened, as it will be when the adoring grace is complete in our deliverance from all impurity, what a revelation of knowledge must follow. Having now a desire of knowledge perfected in us that is clear of all conceit, ambition, haste, impatience, the clouds under which we lived in our sin are for ever rolled away, and our adoring nature, transparent to God as a window to the sun, is filled with his eternal light. No mysteries remain but such as comfort us in the promise of a glorious employment. Every object of knowledge, irradiated by the brightness of God, shines with a new celestial clearness and an inconceivable beauty. The resurrection morning is a true sun-rising, the in-bursting of a cloudless day on all the righteous dead. They wake transfigured at their Master's call, with the fashion of their countenance altered and shining like his own. H. B.—The veil that hides from us the all-glorious Father of spirits shall one day be withdrawn. The spiritual eye shall be quickened to look into the heart and life of the universe. The intercepting medium of sense shall be swept away, and the soul of the redeemed laid bare to the ineffable brightness and beauty of God streaming full-orbed around it. Caird.

As we are known is a note of similitude, not of equality. The light of a candle as truly shines as the light of the sun, but not with that extent and splendor. We shall have such a perfect knowledge of God as our minds can receive and our hearts desire. We shall then see what we now believe concerning the glorious nature of God, his decrees and counsels, his providence and dispensations. The sublimest doctrine of the Christian religion, above the disquisition and reach of reason, is that of the sacred Trinity, upon which the whole economy of the gospel depends. In assenting to this, faith bows the head and adores. In the state above, where reason is rectified and enlarged, we shall understand that from eternity God was sole existing, but not solitary; that the Godhead is not confused in unity nor divided in number; that there is a priority of order, yet no superiority, among the sacred persons, but they are all equally possessed of the same divine excellences and the same divine empire, and are the object of the same adoration. Bates.

13. Abideth faith, hope, charity. Could there in the region of spirit be found a brighter triad than those with which the apostle closes and crowns his noble eulogy on charity? Exquisite picture! On the right hand, Faith clinging to the cross of salvation; on the left, Hope leaning on the inflexible anchor; and in the center, Charity, bearing in hand the burning heart, devoted as a daily sacrifice to the God of love! And now these three are here below the abiding companions of the Christian, amid all that changes and withers around him. They can abide, since they form the unchanging characteristic of every believer. They must abide, or all our Christianity would become form without life. They shall abide, because they are at once so sublimely Godlike and so truly human. Faith may have to wrestle with darkness; hope, with doubt; charity, with resistance; but, where Christ really lives in the heart, they can never disappear. Van O.

The greatest. Faith has its excellency in this, hope in that, and love in another thing. Faith will do that which hope can not do, hope can do that which faith can not do, and love can do things distinct from both their doings. Faith goes in the van, hope in the body, and love brings up the rear; and thus now abideth faith, hope, and charity. Faith is the mother-grace, for hope is born of her, but charity floweth from them both. Bun.—Love shall remain. Yea, not only shall it remain, but the narrow brook which in this life flowed from deeply hidden fountains will in that life become a wide stream. Here love could be preserved only while the eye of faith held the invisible world directly before itself. Shut for an instant this internal eye, look at nothing but the visible world, and thou wilt love only what thou seest. Ah! why dost thou hang solely upon creatures of the earth, and long after them; why but because thine eye of faith is not open, and thou seest not the invisible glory of the Father's image? Couldst thou see this, thou must love it also; to see the invisible and to love him is the same thing. But when there shall be no more need of this intellectual exertion, when the thick cloud of the earthly vale shall no longer press upon the eye of faith, when the very object in which we here faintly believe shall stand constantly before our vision, oh, how easy will it then be to love! A. T.

Section 273.

1 CORINTHIANS XIV. 1-40.

1 FOLLOW after charity, and desire spiritual gifts, but rather that ye may prophesy. For 2 he that speaketh in an unknown tongue speaketh not unto men, but unto God: for no man
 3 understandeth him; howbeit in the spirit he speaketh mysteries. But he that prophesieth 4 speaketh unto men to edification, and exhortation, and comfort. He that speaketh in an 5 unknown tongue edifieth himself; but he that prophesieth edifieth the church. I would that ye all spake with tongues, but rather that ye prophesied: for greater is he that prophesieth than he that speaketh with tongues, except he interpret, that the church may receive 6 edifying. Now, brethren, if I come unto you speaking with tongues, what shall I profit you, except I shall speak to you either by revelation, or by knowledge, or by prophesying, 7 or by doctrine? And even things without life giving sound, whether pipe or harp, except 8 they give a distinction in the sounds, how shall it be known what is piped or harped? For 9 if the trumpet give an uncertain sound, who shall prepare himself to the battle? So likewise ye, except ye utter by the tongue words easy to be understood, how shall it be known 10 what is spoken? for ye shall speak into the air. There are, it may be, so many kinds of 11 voices in the world, and none of them is without signification. Therefore if I know not the meaning of the voice, I shall be unto him that speaketh a barbarian, and he that speak-

12 eth shall be a barbarian unto me. Even so ye, forasmuch as ye are zealous of spiritual gifts, 13 seek that ye may excel to the edifying of the church. Wherefore let him that speaketh in 14 an unknown tongue pray that he may interpret. For if I pray in an unknown tongue, my 15 spirit prayeth, but my understanding is unfruitful. What is it then? I will pray with the 16 spirit, and I will pray with the understanding also: I will sing with the spirit, and I will 17 sing with the understanding also. Else, when thou shalt bless with the spirit, how shall he 18 that occupieth the room of the unlearned say Amen at thy giving of thanks, seeing he un-19 derstandeth not what thou sayest? For thou verily givest thanks well, but the other is not 20 edified.

18 I thank my God, I speak with tongues more than ye all: yet in the church I had rather 19 speak five words with my understanding, that by my voice I might teach others also, than 20 ten thousand words in an unknown tongue. Brethren, be not children in understanding:
 21 howbeit in malice be ye children, but in understanding be men. In the law it is written,
 22 With men of other tongues and other lips will I speak unto this people; and yet for all that 23 they will not hear me, saith the Lord. Wherefore tongues are for a sign, not to them that 24 believe, but to them that believe not: but prophesying serveth not for them that believe 25 not, but for them which believe. If therefore the whole church be come together into one 26 place, and all speak with tongues, and there come in those that are unlearned, or unbe-27 lievers, will they not say that ye are mad? But if all prophesy, and there come in one 28 that believeth not, or one unlearned, he is convinced of all, he is judged of all: and thus are 29 the secrets of his heart made manifest; and so falling down on his face he will worship
 30 God, and report that God is in you of a truth. How is it then, brethren? when ye come 31 together, every one of you hath a psalm, hath a doctrine, hath a tongue, hath a revelation, 32 hath an interpretation. Let all things be done unto edifying.

27 If any man speak in an unknown tongue, let it be by two, or at the most by three, and 28 that by course; and let one interpret. But if there be no interpreter, let him keep silence 29 in the church; and let him speak to himself, and to God. Let the prophets speak two or 30 three, and let the other judge. If any thing be revealed to another that sitteth by, let the 31 first hold his peace. For ye may all prophesy one by one, that all may learn, and all may 32 be comforted. And the spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets. For God is 33 not the author of confusion, but of peace, as in all churches of the saints. Let your women 34 keep silence in the churches: for it is not permitted unto them to speak; but they are com-
 35 manded to be under obedience, as also saith the law. And if they will learn any thing, let 36 them ask their husbands at home: for it is a shame for women to speak in the church.
 37 What? came the word of God out from you? or came it unto you only? If any man think 38 himself to be a prophet, or spiritual, let him acknowledge that the things that I write unto 39 you are the commandments of the Lord. But if any man be ignorant, let him be ignorant.
 40 Wherefore, brethren, covet to prophesy, and forbid not to speak with tongues. Let all 41 things be done decently and in order.

THE Corinthians had no just ideas of the dignity and greatness of the divine life; they did not understand how those singular gifts in which they exulted were bestowed upon them for the benefit of others, not for their own personal glorification, and how they were to be exercised, therefore, with solemnity, wisdom, and great conscientiousness. The Christian Church became a theatre of display; and the Christian life, instead of being something serious and earnest, a work and a warfare, a building to be erected by strenuous exertion, an agony and struggle for life and death—instead of this, it put on the appearance of a boisterous holiday, and was as little dignified as a plaything or a song. But, worse than this, with the immaturity, vanity, and folly of boys, there mingled at Corinth the passions of men. They could not all be first; some must listen if others speak; where some lead, others must follow. But this is difficult where all are ambitious; and hence there were “envyings” and “strifes” “jealousies” and “divisions.” The apostle reasons with the Corinthians. He tells them that “gifts” are a solemn trust, and bring with them a solemn responsibility; for that “the ministrations of the Spirit are given to every man for the profit of others.” He insists, therefore, that “everything should be done unto edifying,” that the Church may be benefited, and not that the actor or speaker may be glorified. He ridicules their ambition in all wishing for the best gifts, as if all the members of the body wished to be the eye, which, of course, would be the destruction of the body itself. He mourns over their strifes, their conceit, their jealousies and envyings of each other; and, looking upon these things as sure signs of ignorance and immaturity, of the want of an enlarged, well-informed mind, and of a properly disciplined and purified heart, he embodies his feelings in the words, "Be not children in understanding"—mere boys, without deep and comprehensive views of duty. "In malice," indeed, and all foolish and angry passions, I wish you were even like "babes" who have not yet manifested these dispositions at all; but "in understanding," in wisdom and knowledge, in mastery of yourselves, and in calm devotedness to the great business of the Christian life, I wish you to be men—men not only in the sense of having arrived at full age, but of having attained maturity of character. T. B.

1. This verse contains a résumé of all that has been said in the twelfth and thirteenth chapters. And we observe that charity holds the first place, and then spiritual gifts follow in the second. And of spiritual gifts, some for certain reasons—as, for instance, prophecy—are preferable to others. Charity implies a certain character; but a gift, as that of tongues, does not. This distinction explains at once why graces are preferable to gifts. Graces are what the man is; but enumerate his gifts, and you will only know what he has. You can not contemplate the grace separate from the man; he is lovable or admirable, according as he has charity, faith, or self-control. And hence the apostle bids the Corinthians undervalue gifts in comparison with graces: "Follow after charity." Rather that ye may prophecy. Prophecy was a gift eminently useful; it was the power of expounding the will and the word of God. The deep insight into truth, the happy faculty of imparting truth: these two endowments together made up that which was essential to the prophet of the early Church. F. W. R.

2. In the gift of tongues, the high and ecstatic consciousness in respect to God alone predominated, while the consciousness of the world was wholly withdrawn. In this condition, the medium of communication between the deeply moved inward man and the external world was wholly wanting. What he spoke in this condition, from the strong impulse of his emotions and inward views, was not a connected discourse, nor an address adapted to the wants and circumstances of others. He was wholly occupied with the relation of his own soul to God. The soul was absorbed in adoration and devotion. Hence to this condition are ascribed prayer, songs of praise to God, and the attestation of his mighty deeds. Such a one prayed in spirit; the higher life of the soul and spirit predominated in him. When, therefore, in the midst of his peculiar emotions and spiritual contemplations he formed for himself a peculiar language, he was wanting in the power so to express himself as to be understood by the greater number. N.

5. Paul gives the preference to the gift of prophecy, which addressed itself directly and intelligibly to the congregation; whereas the Corinthians were disposed to overrate the gift of tongues, as it led to a refined egoism and indulgence in a spiritual intoxication of feeling. P. S.

19. The apostle considered that gift most desirable by which men might most edify one another. And hence that noble declaration of one of the most gifted of mankind, "I had rather speak five words with my understanding, that I might teach others also, than ten thousand words in an unknown tongue." Our estimate is almost the reverse of this. We value a gift in proportion to its rarity, its distinctive character, separating its possessor from the rest of his fellow-men. Your lofty, incommunicable thoughts and aspirations, and contemplative raptures—in virtue of which you have estimated yourself as the porcelain of the earth, of another nature altogether than the clay of common spirits—tried by the test of charity, what is there grand in these if they can not be applied as blessings to those that are beneath you? The most trifling act which is marked by usefulness to others is nobler in God's sight than the most brilliant accomplishment of genius. To teach a few Sunday-school children, week after week, commonplace, simple truths, persevering in spite of dullness and mean capacities, is a more glorious occupation than the highest meditations or creations of genius which edify or instruct only our own solitary soul. Gifts that are showy and gifts that please—before these the world yields her homage, while the lowly teachers of the poor and the ignorant are forgotten and unnoticed. Only remember that, in the sight of the everlasting Eye, the one is creating sounds which perish with the hour that gave them birth, the other is doing a work that is for ever—building and forming for the eternal world an immortal human spirit. F. W. R.

20. They who are children in understanding are proportionably apt to be men in malice; that is, in proportion as men neglect that which should be the guide of their lives, so are they left to the mastery of their passions; and as nature and outward circumstances do not allow these passions to remain as quiet and as little grown as they are in childhood—for they are sure to ripen without any trouble of ours—so men are left with nothing but the evils of both ages, the vices of the man and the unripeness and ignorance of the child. T. A.—The understanding needs to be opened and cultivated, the passions grow of themselves. The one requires to be encouraged and stimulated, the others to be repressed and restrained. The consequence is, that in early life, before the higher parts of humanity can have been ripened by knowledge and experience, the inferior parts are strong and active, as by the force of an internal impulse. Hence we have the phenomena that so often distinguish immaturity of character—folly, vanity, conceit, selfishness, ignorance, indiscretion, the want of common sense, the absence of large knowledge, of just views, of intelligent apprehension of the ends and duties of life, of all those things, in fact, which make up that moral "understanding" in which the apostle wished the Corinthians to be men, but which is seldom found to be the characteristic of youths or boys. T. B.—But too many are children in inconstancy, affection to sensible things, and love of toys; but how few are such in innocency, simplicity, ignorance of evil, and docility! Q.

23. There is great danger in ungoverned feeling; and hence religious life may degenerate into mere indulgence of feeling, the excitement of religious meetings, or the utterance of strong emotion. In this sickly strife life wastes away, and the man or woman becomes weak instead of strong. What a lesson! These divine, high feelings in the Church of Corinth, to what had they degenerated! Loud, tumultuous, disorderly cries, such that a stranger coming in would pronounce of the speakers that they were mad! F. W. R.

27. To the gift of tongues is immediately attached that of interpretation. It is the gift of translating the language of ecstasy or of the Spirit into the language of the ordinary consciousness, and bringing it down to the comprehension of the whole congregation. For this reason Paul requires this gift as the complement to that of tongues; as by it alone the latter is made edifying to the hearers and conducive to the general good. 31. To prevent disorder and abuse the apostle directs, as in the case of speaking with tongues, that the prophets should prophesy not all at once, but one after another, that all may receive instruction and exhortation. 34. Every public act of this kind implies for the time being a superiority of the speaker over the hearers, and is also contrary to true feminine delicacy. Christianity has, indeed, vastly improved the condition of woman. It has brought the highest blessings of heaven within her reach. But it has not, in so doing, abolished the divine order of nature which restricts her to the sphere of private life. Here, in the quiet circle of the family, woman has the freest scope for the display of the fairest virtues. P. S.

37. Now, as in those apostolic days, he which is spiritual can show that he is so only "by acknowledging that the things which" those appointed teachers "wrote to us are the commandments of the Lord"; for the gift of the Holy Ghost to others is not a gift whereby they originate the knowledge of new truths, but a gift whereby they recognize and apprehend the old unchanging mystery, still receiving afresh the one revelation of Christ, ever approaching, never surpassing the comprehensive but immovable boundaries of the faith once delivered to the saints. This is the gift, the only gift, which we desire for our Church and for ourselves; for it is one which makes the written word a living word, which fills a church with joy, and seals a soul for glory. T. D. B.

40. Under this dispensation, worship is to be presented in spirit and in truth, not with many outward visible signs as under the law, but with two simple ordinances; the whole subject to the law of Christ, with the general rules given afterward by his apostles, ordaining that all things should "be done decently and in order," and "for the edifying of the church." J. A.—Some power the Church has in rites of decency and expediency and order, by virtue of this general canon (though it carries the face of a restraint rather than an allowance, and does not so much enlarge as moderate church-power), but, in the main matters, the Church can only declare laws, not make them; and, though in matters indifferent she can direct to what is suitable to order and decency, yet these directions should be so managed that they do not take away the nature of the thing, for though Christian liberty be restrained it must not be infringed. It is the sin of antichrist to usurp an authority over the Church of God; and it is the very spirit of antichristianism to give laws to the conscience. T. M.

Section 274.

1 CORINTHIANS XV. 1-34.

1 MOREOVER, brethren, I declare unto you the gospel which I preached unto you, which also
2 ye have received, and wherein ye stand; by which also ye are saved, if ye keep in memory
3 what I preached unto you, unless ye have believed in vain. For I delivered unto you first 4 of all that which I also received, how that Christ died for our sins according to the Scrip-
5 tures; and that he was buried, and that he rose again the third day according to the Scrip-
6 tures: and that he was seen of Cephas, then of the twelve: after that, he was seen of above
7 five hundred brethren at once; of whom the greater part remain unto this present, but some 8 are fallen asleep. After that, he was seen of James; then of all the apostles. And last of 9 all he was seen of me also, as of one born out of due time. For I am the least of the 10 apostles, that am not meet to be called an apostle, because I persecuted the church of God.
11 But by the grace of God I am what I am: and his grace which was bestowed upon me was 12 not in vain; but I laboured more abundantly than they all: yet not I, but the grace of God 13 which was with me. Therefore whether it were I or they, so we preach, and so ye be-14 lieved.

12 Now if Christ be preached that he rose from the dead, how say some among you that 13 there is no resurrection of the dead? But if there be no resurrection of the dead, then 14 is Christ not risen: and if Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith is 15 also vain. Yea, and we are found false witnesses of God; because we have testified of God 16 that he raised up Christ: whom he raised not up, if so be that the dead rise not. For if 17 the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised: and if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain;
18 ye are yet in your sins. Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished. If 19 in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable.

20 But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the firstfruits of them that slept.
21 For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead. For as in 22 Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive. But every man in his own order.
23 Christ the firstfruits; afterward they that are Christ's at his coming. Then cometh the 24 end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when he shall 25 have put down all rule and all authority and power. For he must reign, till he hath put 26 all enemies under his feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death. For he hath 27 put all things under his feet. But when he saith all things are put under him, it is mani-28 fest that he is excepted, which did put all things under him. And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subject unto him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all.

29 Else what shall they do which are baptized for the dead, if the dead rise not at all? why
 30 are they then baptized for the dead? and why stand we in jeopardy every hour? I protest
 31 by your rejoicing which I have in Christ Jesus our Lord, I die daily. If after the manner 32 of men I have fought with beasts at Ephesus, what advantageth it me, if the dead rise not?
 33 let us eat and drink; for to-morrow we die. Be not deceived: evil communications cor-34 rupt good manners. Awake to righteousness, and sin not; for some have not the knowledge of God: I speak this to your shame.

DEATH separates us. The saints cease from their beneficent service. The prophets do not live for ever. Can we bear it? In imagination—thank God, not otherwise—we can put ourselves out into that bleak desert, a Christless world. We ask there, and then ask here, Will these graves ever open? Shall I see the face of my mother, my child, my friend, whose spirit was rich in the gifts and graces of God? See it in an eternity of blessed, unbroken, undivided life? I know I shall. Jesus Christ has come, has died, has risen from the dead. Because he lives, his followers, one with him, shall live also. The resurrection is not only his. It is the resurrection of every believer on earth. The life-power is common to both. It is within the Christian heart. When the undying Christ liveth in us, we can never die. Be his, and you are already immortal, mortality being swallowed up of life. The glorious expectation enlarges itself. In the day of his appearing you shall appear, and with him. We know not what we shall be, but we know that we shall be like him. F. D. H.

CHAPTER 15 is reserved for the treatment of a great foundation doctrine of Christianity, the Resurrection of the Body. Seeing that this doctrine was repudiated by some at Corinth, it became necessary that it should be thoroughly expounded, as to its grounds, its analogies, its necessity. And thus we obtain one of the grandest and most precious portions of the apostolic writings. For record of the appearances of the Lord after his resurrection, for cogent argument binding his resurrection to ours, for assertion and implication of the great doctrine of his inclusive humanity, for revelation of holy mysteries imparted by special inspiration, for triumphant application of the phenomena and analogies of nature, no extant writing can compare with this chapter in its value to the Church, its power of convincing the mind and awakening Christian hope, its far-seeing confutation of the cavils and scoffs of all after-ages against the doctrine of the resurrection. A.

The First Epistle to the Corinthians—written before the earliest gospel—exhibits the resurrection as already part of an apostolical creed. According to Paul, the resurrection then rested upon the testimony of more than two hundred and fifty still living eye-witnesses. According to Paul, the resurrection is the very corner-stone of the whole fabric of Christian teaching. According to Paul, if the resurrection could be disproved, the apostles had propagated a lie in the name of God, and the idea that God had pardoned sin was an empty delusion. This unchallenged Epistle, you will observe, as no other book in the New Testament, rests the doctrine of the resurrection upon its historical base, and pursues it to its extreme theological consequences. In the light of this great truth we behold the whole multitude of the glorified and risen dead gathered at length beneath the throne of their risen Redeemer; and in them, according to no merely idealistic representation, but as an objective and literal fact foretold by the apostle, death is swallowed up by the victory of Triumphant Life. H. P. L.

1. The gospel which I preached. All along, the apostle refers to what the Corinthians knew; to what he had "preached" among them; what they had "received" and "believed," and "in which they stood." This personal, oral teaching of his, of which he reminds them, had commenced about five or six years before, and had continued for about two years; for three or four years he had been absent from Corinth. During the whole of that time the Corinthians, so far as we know, had not in their possession a single apostolic writing, except, it might be, copies of the Epistles to the Thessalonians, which Paul wrote from Corinth soon after his settlement there, and with which his course of sacred authorship began. Though the Corinthians, however, had no Christian books, they had the Christian truth. They had no New Testament, but they had the ideas it was one day to contain. They had no written evangel, but they had the gospel itself; they "knew" it and "believed" it. Paul appeals to that knowledge and belief. He refers to the fact of his vocal instructions and living ministry.

3, 4. The substance of Paul's testimony was that the Christ died for our sins—was buried and revived. To these two things, which the apostle asserted and testified of Christ, everything in theology, religion, and morals—everything belonging to spiritual truth, human duty, hopes and prospects—may be referred. God, law, sin, penalty, divine government, future retribution, merciful arrangement, with all kindred and correlative truths, gather round the first; spiritual life, sonship, salvation, access to God, worship, song, favorable help, religious virtue, light in darkness, hope in death, faith apprehending and laying hold of "the things not seen"—these and all similar beliefs, experiences, and affections grow out of the second. Well considered, it ceases to be wonderful that Paul should compress into these two things the sum and substance of all he taught; that through them he expected to meet and to help humanity, to infuse into it a spiritual and divine life—"the life of God in the soul of man." T. B.

5. He was seen of Cephas. What passed then is hidden from all eyes. The secrets of that hour of deep contrition and healing love Peter kept secretly curtained from sight in the innermost chamber of his memory. But we may be sure that then forgiveness was sought and granted, and the bond that fastened him to his Lord was welded together again where it had snapped, and was the stronger because it had been broken, and at the point of fracture. A. M.—The Lord appears to the fallen Simon, and shows himself thus also in his second life the Saviour of sinners. He appears to Simon, first of all the apostles. Thus he is then really the Chief Shepherd of the sheep, who hath brought back with him from the dead the faithful shepherd heart.

7. Most probably the James here meant is the same who wrote the general Epistle, the brother of the Lord, held in high honor in the apostolic Church. He was thus one of those brethren who at one time did not believe on Jesus. The Saviour repays the life-long misjudgment of his brethren after the flesh by a special revelation to the eldest of them! What then took place between Him and James is surrounded with the veil of secrecy; enough: he casts the honest doubter down at his feet, and forthwith raises him to arise as witness of his resurrection. Not only Peter the penitent sinner, but also James the honest doubter, he sought out in their solitude. He wins those who thus grope about in twilight, if only they have a sincere desire after higher light in the soul. He who deliberately will not believe, ends, alas, by not being able to believe; yet—as we see in the case of James—to the upright ariseth light in the darkness. Van O.

10. More abundantly than they all. We are astonished at the amount accomplished by a man, a single man. The wonderful activity of our apostle imparts to him a kind of omnipresence in all the Roman Empire, over the vast extent of which the name of Paul projects everywhere its immense shadow. What would have been the changes in the history of the world if this single man had not been born? Without Paul, who can estimate the immense results of this change in the maxims, the morals, the literature, the history, the entire development of the race? Monod.—Work you, and God is working in you mightily. Labor more abundantly than they all, and God's grace is laboring in you. You are not to wait for God, but to work; for God is beforehand with you all the while. You are to wait upon God, but you are not to wait for God before you obey his command to work, for God is already waiting for you, and always working. Work while the day lasts, work in reliance upon God, work in expectation of a glorious harvest, and the more you work, and the more earnestly you work, the easier it will be, and by and by your reward and your rejoicing shall be great in the Lord. G. B. C.—With what grand confidence, then, may the weakest of us go to his task. We have a right to feel that in all our labor God works with us; that in all our words for him it is not we that speak but the Spirit of our Father that speaks in us; that if humbly and prayerfully, with self-distrust and resolute effort to crucify our own intrusive individuality, we wait for him to enshrine himself within us, strength will come to us, drawn from the deep fountains of God, and we, too, shall be able to say, "Not I, but the grace of God in me." How this sublime confidence should tell on our characters, destroying all self-confidence, repressing all pride, calming all impatience, brightening all despondency, and ever stirring us anew to deeds worthy of the exceeding greatness of the power which worketh in us! A. M.

Verse 11 concludes what is preliminary to the main discussion, namely, that the message respecting the death and resurrection of Christ was taught unanimously by all the apostles, and was by them received as the foundation of their faith. "So ye believed." Thus ye put confidence in it; that is, in this message ye received Christianity. Ruckert.—In verses 12-19, Paul's object is to unsettle that unbelief in the resurrection of the dead by heaping one upon another the conclusions to which, if fully and legitimately carried out, that unbelief would lead. W. H.

12. How say some no resurrection. It is an appeal to men on their own principles. They believed one thing, that Christ rose, they denied another thing, the resurrection of man from death; but the belief of the first carried with it the second, the denial of the second destroyed the first. An argument this which would not be felt by philosophers who denied both things, but which, in respect to the men in question, admitted of no reply, and was adapted to excite the most serious apprehensions. As an appeal to their understanding, it convicted them of inconsistency and absurdity; as an appeal to their faith, it revealed to them issues which they had not considered and did not foresee. Putting together the different topics which the apostle rapidly touches—looking at their combined force as linked together in his cumulative argument—the result would seem to be this: That the error combated, if logically carried out, would just destroy Christianity altogether—destroy it in its facts, its doctrines, its hopes, and its evidence. T. B.

14. Our preaching. This preaching related to Christ, the reconciler of man with God, the liberator from the guilt of sin, the author of the right to eternal life for those united to him, and the founder of the Church of God, which embraces all nations without distinction. Paul avers that this preaching would be useless if Christ were not risen. If the work of redemption had not been accomplished, then the merits of Christ would have been of no service whatever, and the proclamation of his grace, failing in objective truth, would have been a declaration of falsehood.

15. False witnesses. False testimony is the crime which is forbidden in the decalogue; how much more if this testimony relate to what God has done? The expressions are finely chosen so as to place the crime in as clear a light as possible. "We are found false witnesses." We are not only such, but we are discovered to be such; we stand in that position. "False witnesses," not deluded but deceivers—those who testify that they have seen what they have not seen. "False witnesses of God." Ruckert.—They affirm an impossibility. And they affirm that God did it! that he did what he did not do; "that he raised up Christ, whom he raised not up." This pretended "testimony" could not, under the circumstances, be a mistaken opinion, an innocent mental error. It was a falsehood. We told a lie. We were "false witnesses"—false witnesses for God! the God of our fathers, whom we had been taught to reverence as "the God of truth"; by whom "words" and "actions" are "weighed"; whose "eyes behold" and approve the "upright"; and who "hates every false way!" T. B.—Yea, and among these men branded thus as false witnesses, if Christ did not really rise, Paul himself must be reckoned. That he should ever have such a brand affixed to him, that he should ever once be thought of as an impostor or deceiver, is there not something in the very manner of Paul's speech here that tells us how monstrous to himself, and surely as incredible to others, the very supposition seemed? W. H.

16. This argument is founded on the union between Christ and his members: they so share his life that because he lives for ever they must live also; and conversely, if we deny their immortality, we deny his. C.

Is not Christ raised. But who is Jesus, if his sepulchre remains closed and he lives in no other manner than all the God-fearing dead? In no case the only Son of God, in the scriptural sense of the word, but a man of like passions as we, incapable even as the least of his brethren to subdue the united power of sin and death. Even less the faithful and true witness; because, if his unequivocal predictions concerning his resurrection have remained absolutely unfulfilled, there is no reason why men should thenceforth give unconditional credence to his word. Least of all, the absolutely sinless one; because, having died and remained in death, he may indeed on the cross have borne the penalty of our sins, but can not possibly have atoned for them. But thus neither is he the Redeemer, the Saviour of those lost but for him; and those who, with the hymn upon their lips, "Jesus lives, and we with him," bravely face eternity, are indeed the simplest of the simple. Van O.

17. Christianity is nothing else than the fact and the message that in the death of Christ the sin of the world is expiated and taken away, and in his resurrection a new life of the spirit and of glory is restored. Christ, the crucified and risen, is the foundation of the Christian Church. If Christ is not risen, it is not this or that point in Christianity, but Christianity itself, that goes. An.

18. The dying believer sleeps in Jesus. How incomparably refreshing this language of Paul, "they which are fallen asleep in Christ"! What a fragrance exhales from the sacred urn! How does it embalm the very bodies of those whom we have given in charge to Christ! They sleep in Jesus. It is in his arms they have fainted away, and he holds, sustains, and embraces them. This, which seemed a calamity, is foreseen and contemplated in the covenant. Their very dying has a connection with the blessed Saviour, for it is joined to his dying. J. W. A.

If there be no resurrection of the dead, then they "who have fallen asleep in Christ" have perished. In other words, the best, the purest, the noblest of the human race have lived only to die for ever. For even our adversaries will grant us this, that since the days of Christ there have been exhibited to the world a purity, a self-sacrifice, a humility such as the world never saw before. Earth in all its ages has nothing which can be compared with "the noble army of martyrs." Now you are called upon to believe that all these have perished everlastingly; that they served God, loved him, did his will, and that he sent them down like the Son of God into annihilation! You are required to believe that the pure and wise of this world have all been wrong, and the selfish and sensual all right. F. W. R.

19, 20. We not only sacrifice everything for nothing, but the sublime virtue which we suppose is promoted within us, why even that is a dream and a delusion! We are not made for it; we are not God-born, and can not be God-like, if we were only created to perish. And that is all, "if there be no resurrection of the dead." In this way, in effect,

Paul appeals to his own conduct, and to that of others like him, as a proof of the depth and intensity of their convictions in respect to the certainty of a future life. His asserted experience gave a character and weight to his words that made them a "testimony"; his consciousness of his veracity as a witness, and his confidence in the hopes that animated and upheld him, justified to himself the grand burst of feeling with which—waving off the sophistries of science, and presenting the truth as the explanation of his conduct—he uttered what embodied, in one pregnant sentence, the two ideas which had all along been interwoven into the texture of his argument: "But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the firstfruits of them that sleep." T. B.

20. If those portions of the evangelic history which reach to the moment of the death of Christ are, in a critical sense, of the same historic quality as those which run on to the moment of his ascension, and if the former absolutely command our assent, if they carry it as by force, then, by a most direct inference, "is Christ risen indeed," and become the first-fruits of immortality to the human race. Then is it true that, "as in Adam all die, so in Christ shall all be made alive." No narrative is anywhere extant comparable to that of the days and hours immediately preceding the crucifixion; and the several accounts of the hurried events of those days present the minute discordances which are always found to belong to genuine memoirs compiled by eye-witnesses. The Last Supper and its sublime discourses, the agony in the garden, the behavior of the traitor, the scenes in the hall of the chief priest, and before the judgment-seat of the Roman procurator, and in the palace of Herod, and in the place called the Pavement, and on the way from the city, and the scene on Calvary, are true, if anything in the compass of history be true. I. T.

The Lord is risen indeed! Such, we are told, were the joy-inspiring words with which each Lord's-day morning, as they met for worship, the early Christians were wont to salute one another. And when we count over, as brought out in this wonderful chapter, all the benefits and blessings which that rising of the Lord secured, could they, we ask ourselves, have fixed upon a fitter phrase to express at once how rich their heritage, how full their joy, how bright their hope, how firm the foundation of their trust? W. H.—If Jesus Christ risen is indeed the object of our faith, then our religion is not merely the critical study of an ancient sacred literature. It is a vitally distinct thing from that. It is the communion of our spirits with a divine and everlasting being. Jesus Christ risen from his grave, arrayed in his glorious manhood, is seated on the throne of heaven. He is the mid-point, the center of the great empire of living souls. He is in communication, constant and intimate, with myriads of beings to whom, by his death, and by his triumph over death, and by his enduring and exhaustless life, he is made wisdom and righteousness and sanctification and redemption. Yes, to believe in the risen Jesus is to live beneath a sky which is indeed bright. This is to believe that he is alive for evermore, and that he has the keys of hell and of death. H. P. L.—Now Jesus lives, and the resurrection is at the same time the amen of God and the subject of hallelujah to redeemed humanity. And this hallelujah shall never cease; for here triumphs, last and most glorious of all, the victory of life over death. Sing then now, O my soul, the psalm of life in this valley of the shadow of death! Arise with the Prince of Life to a new life, in which the old power of sin and death is overcome; and journey onward dauntless toward thine own grave, lighted on the way by the glory of Christ's resurrection! Van O.

22. The cause of death is Adam, and we die in him; therefore Christ, whose office is to restore what we lost in Adam, is to us the cause of life, and his resurrection is the foundation and pledge of ours. As the one was the original of death, so the other is of life. The apostle pursues the same comparison in the fifth chapter to the Romans, with this difference, that there he treats of spiritual life and death, but here of the resurrection of the body, which is the fruit of spiritual life. Calv.—As in Adam all die (his natural descendants are involved in his condemnation) even so in Christ shall all be made alive; that is, all that are spiritually united to him shall partake of his glorious resurrection. This glorious life is not given to all, but only to those who are united to him. As Adam, the principle of the carnal, corrupt nature, derives guilt and death to all his progeny, so Jesus Christ (who is opposed to him), the head and prince of the renewed state, communicates life and glory to his people. Bates.—The substitution of the suffering Christ for the perishing sinner arose directly out of the terms of the incarnation. The human nature which our Lord assumed was none other than the very nature of the sinner, only without its sin. The Son of God took on him human nature, not a human personality. As human nature was present in Adam when by his representative sin he ruined his posterity, so was human nature present in Christ our Lord, when, by his voluntary offering of his sinless self, He "bare our sins in his own body on the tree." Christ is thus the second Head of our race. Our nature is his own. He carried it with him through life to death. H. P. L.

As certainly as all men died in Adam, so certainly shall all saints be made alive in Christ. Weare to believe the one as steadfastly as we believe the other. We have perfect evidence that all men die a natural death. On an equally solid foundation rests the proof of the restoration to life of all who believe in Jesus. The nature of the argument is such as not to admit the allusion to the wicked. The apostle is comparing Adam and Christ as the heads or representatives of two races or series. In consequence of the sin of Adam all men die a natural death. Through Christ the bodies of all, that is of all believers, shall be made alive. Adam is placed at the head of one series or race. All his descendants suffer by virtue of their connection with him. Christ is the leader of another series, not identical in number with the other, for it is expressly limited. In the very next verse we read, "Each in his own order, Christ the first-fruits, afterward they who are Christ's at his coming." The wicked are not Christ's; they do not belong to him. Christ is the first-fruits of all who sleep in him. The wicked are never said to fall asleep in Jesus. B. B. E.

24. What strictly belongs to the discussion is ended, for there is nothing more said of the resurrection. But the spirit of the apostle having once mounted up to that time when the resurrection has passed, or is about to take place, and the great spectacle has presented itself to his vision, then he feels constrained to finish the picture fully to that point, where all thought ceases, where all our imaginations fade away in the shoreless sea of eternity. Then the end! Not the end of all existence, but the end of this world as at present organized, the moment of the completion of all those things which belong to the divine plan of redemption, the end of time and the beginning of eternity, of which the apostle can say nothing further than "thus we shall be ever with the Lord." Ruckert.—At the end the work given him to do shall have been finished. Those given him by the Father shall have been found out, redeemed, sanctified, saved, and gathered all together into one; their enemies, even death itself, shall have been subdued; and the whole scheme of providence shall have been developed and wound up. The mediator shall then appear and give in to the Father a full account of his mediatorial undertaking, presenting to him the kingdom in that state of consummation to which he shall then have brought it, and receiving from him a clear testimony of his approbation. This is perfectly consonant with the idea that the Son shall retain and exercise his mediatorial authority over his own proper kingdom for ever. "This kingdom," says Theophylact, "he delivers to his Father by achieving and accomplishing the purposes of it." We may add the language of Calvin, who says, "He only intends that in that perfect glory the administration of the kingdom will not be the same as it is at present." W. S.

26. Christ is the Master and Lord of Death; he commits to his custody the bodies of his saints. As a shepherd keepeth watch over his flock by night, so is the "last enemy" compelled to watch over the dust of the holy dead; so is he stationed and commanded to serve, that they may be safe and undisturbed during their season of rest, and be raised again when the morning dawns! When that morning cometh, Death, having delivered up his trust, shall himself die; or, rather, he shall be destroyed and perish. Life will be conferred in every sense in which it will be possible. The gospel reveals not merely the immortality of the spirit, but the immortality of humanity; our whole nature, "body, soul, and spirit," shall be purified and perfected, and endowed with endless and incorruptible life! T. B.

27. The words, "he hath subjected all things under his feet," are borrowed from Ps. 8 : 7, and thus God is to be understood in the otherwise very remarkable omission of the subject. The "subjection" is nothing else than the act of the divine will, by which the Son is clothed with the power and the right to rule over all, and to subdue all enemies, as Jesus says of himself, "All power is given unto me in heaven and on earth." Ruckert.

29. The punctuation should stand thus: "Else what shall they do which are baptized for the dead? If the dead rise not at all, why are they then baptized for them?" A.—The following is the commentary of Ambrose: "Paul, in order to show that the doctrine of the resurrection was perfectly established, quoted the example of those persons who were so secure of a future resurrection that they were even baptized for the dead if one died before having received that rite, fearing either that the deceased would not rise at all or only to condemnation. Thus a living man was baptized in the name of the dead. Whence Paul subjoins, 'Why are they baptized for them?' By this example, he did not approve their custom, but by it he wished to show how firm was the faith in a resurrection." Paul speaks of a usage which was perfectly well known to the Corinthians, while contemporary notices of it are wanting to us. In favor of the interpretation above maintained, we have the very important consideration that every word is taken in its natural sense, and thus the exposition originates from the words themselves. Most, if not all, the other modes of solution do violence, in a greater or less degree, to some one if not to all the words in the clause. B. B. E.

30, 31. A second argument, which has no connection with verse 29, except what exists in the kindred nature of the object. The exertions of the Corinthians in their baptism for the benefit of others were futile if there were no resurrection; so likewise would the labors and sacrifices of the apostle and his associates be folly if there were no resurrection. Ruckert.

31. By your rejoicing. This should read, "by the glorying which I have of you." A.—I die daily. Jesus Christ has not abolished our sufferings and our mortality, but he has made them what they never could have been without him, a bitter dew which develops and matures in our souls the blessed germ of faith. A. V.—Were this crucial test of discipleship the willing surrender of self in all its forms, its will, its pleasure, its righteousness, insisted on in the Church as it is in the gospel, we fear it would be found that the offense of the cross had not ceased. But, on the other hand, were all who are Christ's to show the holy triumph there is in giving up all for him, the deep joy in being partakers of his sufferings, the blessed life that comes through daily death in him, how powerfully would the ancient glory of the cross be vindicated. A. J. G.

32. The punctuation should stand, "What doth it profit me? If the dead rise not, let us eat and drink." A.—We must take the expression figuratively, as referring to some collision with hostile and infuriated men, not less painful to him—in some instances scarce less perilous—than if he had been cast among those hungry monsters from the desert, beneath whose bloody fangs so many of the earliest martyrs died. W. H.—If the future life were no Christian doctrine, then the whole apostolic life, nay, the whole Christian life, were a monstrous and senseless folly. For Paul's life was one great living death; he was ever on the brink of martyrdom. Figuratively, speaking popularly, "after the manner of men," he had fought as with wild beasts at Ephesus. Grant an immortality, and all this has a meaning; deny it, and it was in him a gratuitous folly. And again, if the soul be not immortal, Christian life, not merely apostolic devotedness, is "a grand impertinence." "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die," was the motto and epitaph of Sardapalus; and if this life be all we defy you to dis-prove the wisdom of such reasoning. How many of the myriads of the human race would do right for the sake of right, if they were only to live fifty years and then die for evermore? Besides, with our hopes of immortality gone, the value of humanity ceases, and people become not worth living for. We have not got a motive strong enough to keep us from sin. Christianity is to redeem from evil; it loses its power if the idea of immortal life be taken away. No! If there be in us only that which is born of the flesh, only the mortal Adam, and not the immortal Christ, if to-morrow we die, then the conclusion can not be put aside, "Let us eat and drink, for the present is our all." F. W. R.

Let but the day come when it shall be fearlessly and commonly professed that "Death is annihilation," and that therefore the pleasures of appetite, graced by intelligence, are the whole portion of man, and this horrible opinion shall quickly become parent to a giant cruelty, loftier in stature, and more malign than any the earth has hitherto beheld. Even the most sanguinary superstitions have had some profession of sanctity to maintain; a reserve, a saving hypocrisy, a balance of sentiments, which has set bounds to their demand of blood. But atheism is a simple element; it has no restraining motive, and must act like itself, with a dreadful ingenuousness. And with what vehemence of spite shall this monster, should he ever win the scepter of the world, turn and search on all sides for the residue of those who, by their testimony in favor of the future life, sicken his gust of pleasure, and make pallid his joyous and florid health. I. T.

33, 34. Here we have the conclusion of the discussion whether the dead are raised, together with a delineation of the moral corruption to which skepticism, on this subject, would lead, coupled with a solemn warning. The discussion is conducted before the whole, in order to confirm the believers, to restore the wavering to confidence, to confute the opponents, and, if not to convert them, at least to render them harmless. Ruckert.

Section 275.

1 CORINTHIANS XV. 35-58.

35 But some man will say, How are the dead raised up? and with what body do they come?
36 Thou fool, that which thou sowest is not quickened, except it die: and that which thou 37 sowest, thou sowest not that body that shall be, but bare grain, it may chance of wheat, or 38 of some other grain: but God giveth it a body as it hath pleased him, and to every seed his own body.

39 All flesh is not the same flesh: but there is one kind of flesh of men, another flesh of 40 beasts, another of fishes, and another of birds. There are also celestial bodies, and bodies terrestrial: but the glory of the celestial is one, and the glory of the terrestrial is another.

41 There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars: for one star differeth from another star in glory.

42 So also is the resurrection of the dead. It is sown in corruption; it is raised in incorrup-43 tion: it is sown in dishonour; it is raised in glory: it is sown in weakness; it is raised in 44 power: it is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body. There is a natural body, 45 and there is a spiritual body. And so it is written, The first man Adam was made a living 46 soul; the last Adam was made a quickening spirit. Howbeit that was not first which is 47 spiritual, but that which is natural; and afterward that which is spiritual. The first man 48 is of the earth, earthy: the second man is the Lord from heaven. As is the earthy, such 49 are they also that are earthy: and as is the heavenly, such are they also that are heavenly.
 50 And as we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly.
 51 Now this I say, brethren, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; nei-52 ther doth corruption inherit incorruption. Behold, I shew you a mystery; We shall not 53 all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last 54 trump: for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall 55 be changed. For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on 56 immortality. So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall 57 have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is 58 swallowed up in victory. O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? The 59 sting of death is sin; and the strength of sin is the law. But thanks be to God, which 60 giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ. Therefore, my beloved brethren, be 61 ye stedfast, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know 62 that your labour is not in vain in the Lord.

HERE, on a lowly bed, in an English village by the sea, fades out the earthly life of one of God's humblest but noblest servants. Worn with the patient care of deserted prisoners and malefactors in the town jail for twenty-four years of unthanked service, earning her bread with her hands, and putting songs of worship on the lips of these penitent criminals—she is dying; and as the night falls some friend asks,
 "What shall I read?" The answer of the short breath is one firm syllable, "Praise!" To the question, "Are there no clouds?" "None; he never hides his face. It is our sins which form the cloud between us and him. He is all love, all light." And when the hour of her departure was fully come,
 "Thank God, thank God!" And there, in his princely residence, surrounded with the insignia of power, but in equal weakness before God, expired a guileless statesman, nobleman by rank and character, calmly resigning back all his power into the Giver's hands, saying, at the end, "I have been the happiest of men, yet I feel that death will be gain to me, through Christ who died for me." Blessed be God for the manifold features of triumphant faith! that he suffers his children to walk toward him through ways so various in their outward look: Sarah Martin from her cottage bed, Earl Spencer from his gorgeous couch, little children in their innocence, unpretending women in the quiet ministrations of faithful love, strong and useful and honored men whom suffering households and institutions and churches mourn—all bending their faces toward the Everlasting Light, in one faith, one cheering hope, called by one Lord, who has overcome the world, and dieth no more! The sun sets; the autumn fades; life hastens with us all. But we stand yet in our Master's vineyard. All the days of our appointed time let us labor righteously, and pray and wait, till our change come, that we may change only from virtue to virtue, from faith to faith, and thus from glory to glory! F. D. H.

IN following the train of argument contained in this chapter it must be clearly kept in remembrance that the error combated by Paul was not the denial of immortality but the denial of a resurrection. The ultra-spiritualizers in Corinth did not say, "Man perishes for ever in the grave," but, "The form in which the spirit lives shall never be restored." F. W. R.

35. Having now sufficiently considered the question respecting the fact of a resurrection, the apostle proceeds to the second inquiry respecting the man-ner of it, and the condition of the bodies which shall be raised. The transition to this point he effects by raising an objection, "but here some one may say." We may conclude that the mode, the how, occasioned the principal difficulty to the speculating Corinthians; that the inconceivableness, the impossibility of the resuscitation of a dead and wasted corpse was perhaps the great stone of stumbling. Two questions are suggested. In the first place, how are the dead raised, and secondly, with what bodies do they come forth from the tomb? In the following verses the apostle gives the answer. Ruckert.

36. The emphasis should be laid on "thou" before "sowest." This would be effectually provided for if we rendered "that which thou thyself sowest." A.

37-44. The apostle distinctly states—it is indeed the only piece of positive information that he conveys—that the body which is to be raised is not to be the same body as was buried. It is to be as different from it as the seed which corrupts beneath the sod is from the blade and stem and leaf and flower and fruit which spring out of it. And why should it be thought wonderful that out of death a new life should spring, when we have in nature before our eyes such wonderful transformations in the vegetable and the insect worlds? Why should it be thought a wonderful thing that the new body, with which the soul in its new estate is to be clothed, should be a very different kind of body from what it wore before, when we have before us thus in nature such an endless variety of bodies of all kinds, as if in the exuberance of his creative power the Almighty delighted to spread out innumerable specimens of diversity, in form and qualities and functions, in the bodies celestial and terrestrial which his hand hath formed. Has that abounding, overflowing energy of the Great Creator expended, exhausted itself in things as they now are? Are no further, no higher illustrations and exhibitions of itself to be made in that new stage and state of things toward which our present mundane economy is progressing? If so great a change is coming as that these heavens and this earth are to undergo some mighty revolution, and to be transformed into the new heavens and new earth, wherein righteousness is to reign with undivided empire, might we not expect that the redeemed, ennobled, purified spirits that are to dwell upon that new earth and beneath those new heavens shall be wedded to corporeal frames of a constitution very different from that of our earthly bodies? And so the apostle teaches us it is to be: the weakness, the dishonor, the corruptibility of the present body to be exchanged for the power, the glory, the incorruptibility of a body so very different from the present, that to express that difference the apostle has to make use of language bordering upon the self-contradictory, and to call it, as distinguished from the existing one, a spiritual body. W. H.

38. Though the kernel die, be buried, and meet with all this change in these things, yet none of them can cause the nature of the kernel to cease; it is wheat still. Wheat was sown, and wheat arises; only it was sown dead, dry, and barren wheat, and riseth living, beautiful, and fruitful wheat. "God giveth it a body as it pleaseth him; but to every seed his own body." Bun.—The bodies of believers are lost only in the sense in which seed is lost which we cast into the ground. It returns to dust; but the day is coming when it shall be raised and glorified. It is the day when our Lord shall bring with him all those who sleep in Jesus. They are as safe as the very angels. Their bodies in the tomb, their souls in paradise. J. W. A.

43. The body is sown in dishonor. When laid in the grave it is disfigured. With the principle of life its comeliness has also departed. But it shall be raised in glory. It shall shine forth like the sun in the kingdom of its Father. The most lofty and unattainable ideal of beauty which ever floated before the vision of the great masters of poetry and painting will doubtless fall far short of that which shall be realized when this mortal shall put on immortality. B. B. E.—Glory is the sweetness, comeliness, purity, and perfection of a thing. The light is the glory of the sun, strength is the glory of youth, and gray hairs are the glory of old age. That is, it is the excellency of these things and that which makes them shine. Therefore, to arise in glory, it is to arise in all the beauty and utmost completeness that is possible for a human creature to possess, in all its features and members inconceivably beautiful. Bun.—To the Christian, death is the liberation of the life-principle for an untold career of power and glory. The utmost grandeur of existence is opened to him whose "life is hid with Christ in God." Where science speaks of improvement, Christianity speaks of renovation; where science speaks of development, Christianity speaks of sanctification; where science speaks of progress, Christianity speaks of perfection. And where, in the whole vocabulary of science, are terms to match these three—incorruption, glory, power? J. P. T.

44. The natural body is such as is appropriate to the psyché, the animal soul, the life, anima, as it occurs in the three terms, 1 Thes. 5 : 23. The natural body is fitted to be an abode and an instrument for this animal life, being earthly and sensual like this life. Thus, also, the spiritual body is such as is fitted to the pneuma, the higher, the spiritual nature of man, being such in its material and its form as qualifies it to serve the spirit in its destined higher and nobler existence, which first begins in perfection when the spirit is released from the body of death (Rom. 7 : 24), and at the same time from the psyché, the animal life, which is probably regarded by the apostle as not destined to a continued existence. A clear description of such a body Paul was as little able to give as we ourselves. He naturally contemplated it as made of finer and more delicate materials than this earthly body. Besides this mere comparative indication of resemblance, he has asserted nothing in respect to its nature. Paul contents himself with a single thing, which he makes it necessary for man to believe, namely, that the new life is a purer, better life than this present one; it is a life of the spirit. Ruckert.—As the soul, with all those instincts, appetites, capacities, desires, which fit it for the present scene of things, has got in this body of flesh and blood an instrument admirably adapted to its uses and ends, so he affirms shall the regenerated spirit be yet supplied with an instrument of its own, still more fully and exquisitely adapted to its higher, future, eternal life. There is the soul-body now; there shall be that spirit-body hereafter.

45. Our soul-being, or our natural being, he traces up to our first parent, derived from him by inheritance; our spiritual being he traces up to Jesus Christ, derived from him in an altogether different way. The first man Adam was made a living soul, and such a living soul as he got from his Creator, and turned it into by transgression, he has transmitted to all our race. The last Adam—the second great head or center of our humanity—is a quickening Spirit. W. H.

45-47. All that the first Adam had brought upon us of ignominy, degradation, and death, the second Adam took upon himself, and by taking it he put it for ever away. Sin had made human nature corrupt and foul, and the sinless Man cleansed it from the awful taint. Death had made man his prey, and set up, as it seemed, a universal empire, and the human Lord of Life broke in pieces that dread dominion. He did not merely reverse the sentence of death by an arbitrary annulling of it, but he did so by the actual victory of life over death, in the same nature which had become subject to death. The Life of God in man vanquished death; it was impossible that that life could be holden of death. The first Adam was made "a living soul," and therefore could only transmit to his posterity the natural life, tainted with sin, and containing in it the seed of death. The second Adam was "a quickening spirit," having life in Himself, and of power to impart that life to others: because the first Adam was "of the earth, earthly"; the second Adam was "the Lord from heaven." Perovne.

49. We shall bear the image of the heavenly. It is a part of the plan of redemption that the bodies of believers shall rise. The mission of the Son of God will not be complete till every one of his followers shall have a glorified body like that of the risen Redeemer. He can not witness the full travail of his soul till the sea has given up her dead, till every tomb, where were deposited the remains of the feeblest of his disciples, has restored its trust, till those little ones, millions of whom fell asleep in his dear arms, shall spring to new life in their Father's house. There is no land of forgetfulness. The grave is vital now. It is a region of soft and pleasant slumbers. There is an almighty and an omniscient Watcher over all these sleepers. B. B. E.

If, even upon the rude materials which such hearts as ours present, that holy image of Jesus has begun to be formed, then let us be assured that, as fully and as perfectly as we ever bore the image of the earthy, the image of the heavenly shall yet be borne by us; for, though we know not what we shall be hereafter, we do know this, that when he shall appear we shall then be like him, for we shall see him as he is, body, soul, and spirit, all then transformed, transfigured, this very dull, opaque, corporeal frame wrought into the same image, radiant with the same glory, the whole man raised up to meet the Lord at his coming, and, by that seeing of him as he is, to be translated into his likeness. W. H.

50. It is nowhere asserted in the New Testament that we shall rise again with our bodies. Unless a man will say that the stalk, the blade, and the ear of corn are actually the same thing with the single grain which is put into the ground, he can not quote Paul as saying that we shall rise again with the same bodies. Nothing can be plainer than the expression which he uses, Thou sowest not that body that shall be. He says also, with equal plainness, of the body, It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body; there is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body. These words require to be examined closely, and involve remotely a deep metaphysical question. In common language, the terms body and spirit are accustomed to be opposed, and are used to represent two things which are totally distinct. But Paul here brings the two expressions together, and speaks of a spiritual body. Paul therefore did not oppose body to spirit; and though the looseness of modern language may allow us to do so, and yet to be correct in our ideas, it may save some confusion if we consider spirit as opposed to matter, and if we take body to be a generic term, which comprises both. A body, therefore, in the language of Paul, is something which has a distinct individual existence. Paul tells us that every individual, when he rises again, will have a spiritual body; but the remarks which I have made may show how different is the idea conveyed by these words from the notions which some persons entertain, that we shall rise again with the same identical body. Paul appears effectually to preclude this notion, when he says, Flesh and blood can not inherit the kingdom of God. Burton.—In opposition to a gross identification of the present body with the resurrection body, which lies at the ground of the objection urged, Paul asserts a distinction between the two—a distinction, however, which does not exclude the identity of the fundamental substance or germ. Amid the constant change in our bodies, there is something fixed, which makes us recognizable as the same from the cradle to the grave—something which gives form, feature, and organization to this ever-moving current of matter which is momentarily condensed into what we call our bodies. And what is this but the plastic principle of life which is ever shaping the materials which nature gives it for its own uses, and in accordance with an inward law which molds us after our kind. Lange.

51. All be changed. The better life, which the dead in Christ are living now, leads on to a still fuller life when they get back their glorified bodies. The perfection of man is body, soul, and spirit. That is man, as God made him. The spirit perfected, the soul perfected, without the bodily life, is but part of the whole. For the future world, in all its glory, we have the firm basis laid that it, too, is to be in a real sense a material world, where men once more are to possess bodies as they did before, only bodies through which the spirit shall work conscious of no disproportion, bodies which shall be fit servants and adequate organs of the immortal souls within, bodies which shall never break down, bodies which shall never hem in nor refuse to obey the spirits that dwell in them, but which shall add to their power, and deepen their blessedness, and draw them closer to the God whom they serve and the Christ after the likeness of whose glorious body they are fashioned and conformed. "Body, soul, and spirit"—the old combination which was on earth is to be the perfect humanity of heaven. A. M.

We learn that the intermediate state of the believer between death and the resurrection is not in all respects absolutely perfect. Doubtless it is a state of unmingled enjoyment. The separated spirit is in that condition which Paul denominates "far better." In one sense it may be perfectly happy. Its existing capacities for enjoyment may all be filled. But still, in another sense, it has not reached its goal. It is not clothed upon with its spiritual body. It has not received its last accession of delight. It must be reunited to its transfigured companion before the measure of its joys shall be perfectly full. It can not, indeed, be imagined, that the soul is unhappy, that through anxiety it suffers any degree of disquiet or pain. We may rather suppose that it is in a state of calm expectation and hope; that it looks forward with pleasing anticipations to the period when it shall enter its new home, fitted up with divine skill for its reception. Thus this anticipation itself, or as it might be called, in one sense, imperfection, becomes a source of delight, while still a richer experience awaits it when the corruptible body shall put on incorruption. B. B. E.

52. The last trump. The word "last," as Billoth has correctly remarked, does not mean that there are to be several blasts of a trumpet on the final day, and that this was the last which should be blown, but simply that it would be the trumpet of the last day, after which no more would be heard. Then follow the resurrection and the transformation of the living, the certainty of which is again declared by the remark, that it was necessary that the corruptible should put on incorruption, and the mortal, immortality. Ruckert.

53. It is HUMAN NATURE, in its essential elements, that is to inherit eternity; not an ethereal rudiment, just saved from the wreck of the former fabric, and just serving to connect, as by a film of identity, the earthly with the heavenly state. It is THIS MORTAL that must put on Immortality; the very nature now subject to dissolution is to escape from the power of death and to clothe itself in imperishable vigor. Do we want at once confirmation and exemplification of this doctrine? We have both in the resurrection of the Lord. I. T.—Let us therefore look upon this flesh, not so much with contempt of what it was and is, as with a joyful hope of what it shall be. And when our courage is assaulted, with the change of these bodies from healthful to weak, from living to dead, let us comfort ourselves with the assurance of this change from dust to incorruption. We are not so sure of death as of transfiguration. "All the days of our appointed time we will therefore wait, till our changing shall come." Bp. H.

54. The man, in dying, begins to be what he fully is when he is dead, "dead unto sin," dead unto the world, that he may "live unto God," that he may live with God, that he may live really. And so we can look upon that ending of life and say: "It is a very small thing; it only cuts off the fringes of my life; it does not touch me at all." It only strips off the circumferential mortality, but the soul rises up untouched by it, and shakes the bands of death from off its immortal arms, and flutters the stain of death from off its budding wings, and rises fuller of life because of death, and mightier in its vitality in the very act of submitting the body to the law, "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." Men speak about life as "a narrow neck of land betwixt two unbounded seas": they had better speak about death as that. It is an isthmus, narrow and almost impalpable, on which, for one brief instant, the soul poises itself; while behind it there lies the inland lake of past being, and before it the shoreless ocean of future life, all lighted with the glory of God, and making music as it breaks even upon these dark, rough rocks. Death is but a passage. It is not a house, it is only a vestibule. The grave has a door on its inner side. We roll the stone to its mouth and come away, thinking that we have left them there till the resurrection. But, when the outer access to earth is fast closed, the inner portal that opens on heaven is set wide. Death is a superficial thing, and a transitory thing—a darkness that is caused by the light, and a darkness that ends in the light—a trifle, if you measure it by duration; a trifle, if you measure it by depth. The death of the mortal is the emancipation and the life of the immortal! A. M.

55-57. The discussion is concluded. The apostle has arrived at the point when his spirit, standing at the portals of eternity, can think of nothing more than that for it finiteness and mortality have ceased. His own soul is now full of the elevation and glory of the object, and as a fine conclusion there flows from his pen a brief but striking triumphal song. Ruckert.—The sight of these millions of the changed and the raised of that resurrection-day standing up clothed with incorruption and immortality, rescued fully and rescued forever from the dominion of sin and death, the thought that he too and all those who already were one with him in Christ should be sharers in the triumph of that day, swell the apostle's breast with the present sense of victory. With brightening eye, elastic tread, and tones that tell of triumph, he turns upon the tyrant death and exclaims, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?" No idle challenge this; no empty vaunt; no making light of death by one who knows not what death truly is, what makes it not only a sad thing but a terrible thing to die. In the very height and rapture of his triumph over the last enemy, he is calm enough between the challenge and the thanksgiving to interject the statement, "The sting of death is sin, and the strength of sin is the law." The deep consciousness of transgression, not simply the remembrance of individual, distinct acts of guilt, but the agonizing, overwhelming consciousness of an unclean heart, an ungodly life, the going into the divine presence with all that accumulated weight of a lifetime's iniquity upon the soul—this it was that in Paul's judgment gave its true sting to death, made it an appalling thing to die—not the pains of dissolution, not the tearing away from all the well-known and familiar things of life, not the darkness and the loneliness of dying. The barbed and venomous dart which death holds in his hand, and which he is ready, if the poison be not beforehand taken out of it, to thrust stingingly, witheringly, consumingly into the soul, is sin. W. H.

57. The penitent at first may mournfully say, "The sting of death is sin—the strength of sin is the law"; 'Oh, wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me' from this double destruction?"—but, becoming a believer as well as a penitent, and awaking up to the apprehension of the gospel and the hope it inspires, his tone changes from mourning to music, from despair to exultation, as he bursts forth: "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? Thanks be unto God that giveth me the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ." True, 'the sting of death is sin, and the strength of sin is the law,' but Christ by his atonement takes away, for every penitent that believeth on him, the sting from death and the strength from sin, by procuring for him pardon, in harmony with the principles of that law which is itself the strength of the one, and which causes it to become the sting of the other." T. B.—Therefore it is a victory not won by the believer himself, not achieved by the strength of his own will or the power of his own faith, for which Paul here gives thanks—it is a victory given, won by another, won by our great Lord and Master for us over death and the grave; when by becoming sin for us he drew its poison out of that sting of death, and stripped it of its power to inflict the second death upon the soul; when by putting himself under the law, magnifying it both in its precept and in its penalty, he made it to be a just thing in God to justify all who believe in him, and turned the very law that gave its strength to sin into a bulwark of defense securing the safety of the redeemed—won by him when he burst the barriers of the tomb, writing deliverance for our race upon his empty sepulchre, and in his own resurrection securing that of all his followers. And it is both a present and a future victory thus won for us by Christ; a present victory—Paul speaks of it as such when he thanks God for the gift of it even here and now—yet a victory to be only consummated when this mortal shall have put on immortality. W. H.—Such are the prerogatives and splendors in store for us: immediately beyond the grave a disembodied life of holiness and bliss in the presence of our Lord, and on the morning of the resurrection a reëmbodied life in the new Jerusalem. And may this crowning vision of glory never fail us under any burden of sorrow, in any weariness of labor, in any sharpness of conflict. Let us keep clean the feet which aspire to the golden streets, and keep clean the hands which would grasp the palm-branches of that final triumph. R. D; H.

58. An exhortation to steadfast confidence on the one side; on the other, to inflexible loyalty. "Therefore, my beloved brethren," thus he concludes, "be ye steadfast, unmovable," that is to say, in your most holy faith, in which ye are strengthened anew. Steadfast against yourselves, immovable against influence from without which might undermine and shake you. And not merely steadfast in the fiercely contested confidence of faith, but inflexibly loyal to our earthly and heavenly calling: "Always abounding in the work of the Lord." The task may be difficult, the strength small, the resistance great, the temptation to stop in the middle of our course almost irresistible, yet it is only to him that endureth to the end that the crown of life is promised, and no fidelity shall fail wherever it is known, by well-assured belief, that labor in the Lord can not possibly be vain. 1 CORINTHIANS xvi. 1-24.

1 Now concerning the collection for the saints, as I have given order to the churches of 2 Galatia, even so do ye. Upon the first day of the week let every one of you lay by him in store, as God hath prospered him, that there be no gatherings when I come.

3 And when I come, whomsoever ye shall approve by your letters, them will I send to 4 bring your liberality unto Jerusalem. And if it be meet that I go also, they shall go with 5 me. Now I will come unto you, when I shall pass through Macedonia: for I do pass
 6 through Macedonia. And it may be that I will abide, yea, and winter with you, that ye
 7 may bring me on my journey whithersoever I go. For I will not see you now by the way;
 8 but I trust to tarry a while with you, if the Lord permit. But I will tarry at Ephesus until 9 Pentecost. For a great door and effectual is opened unto me, and there are many adver-
 10 saries. Now if Timotheus come, see that he may be with you without fear: for he work-
 11 eth the work of the Lord, as I also do. Let no man therefore despise him: but conduct him 12 forth in peace, that he may come unto me: for I look for him with the brethren. As touching our brother Apollos, I greatly desired him to come unto you with the brethren: but his will was not at all to come at this time; but he will come when he shall have convenient time.

13 Watch ye, stand fast in the faith, quit you like men, be strong. Let all your things be 14 done with charity. I beseech you, brethren, (ye know the house of Stephanas, that it is 15 the firstfruits of Achaia, and that they have addicted themselves to the ministry of the 16 saints,) that ye submit yourselves unto such, and to every one that helpeth with us, and 17 laboreth. I am glad of the coming of Stephanas and Fortunatus and Achaicus: for that 18 which was lacking on your part they have supplied. For they have refreshed my spirit 19 and your's: therefore acknowledge ye them that are such. The churches of Asia salute you. Aquila and Priscilla salute you much in the Lord, with the church that is in their 20 house. All the brethren greet you. Greet ye one another with an holy kiss. The saluta-22 tion of me Paul with mine own hand. If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be 23 Anathema Maran-atha. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. My love be with 24 you all in Christ Jesus. Amen.

SPIRITUAL indolence is, in these times, the worst enemy the Church has to encounter. It is not that men openly reject and make war upon her, but that they drowsily sleep around her altar. It is that men are content with such paltry satisfactions and tinsel comforts as the senses can bribe them with, heedless of the inward instincts that claim communion with the skies. It is that eternity has no awfulness to them, life no depth of meaning, enjoyment no obligations, bereavement no solemnity, suffering and sorrow no prophetic suggestions of an hereafter, the soul no aspirations, conscience no echo of God, Christ no enrapturing beauty in his holiness, the resurrection no pledge of heaven. It is that men can stretch themselves on their couches of ease, and slumber amid the sublimest mysteries and most stirring revelations of Providence. What we need, then, to bring back the Church to her life is to awake and arise, to hearken and watch, to wait on the Holy Spirit, to snatch the film from our eyeballs, to lift our waiting souls to God like flowers parched with drought to the rain, to breathe in his blessed life, to be regenerated and consecrated by his inspiration of love communicated through Jesus Christ our Lord. Where the Church lives—where it holds its Master's spirit and truth, not as the mortuary of a deceased and buried benefactor, but as the inbreathing of a present inspiration—it will never suffer its members to sit idly with folded hands, looking lazily out on the white fields of harvest, where no reaper's sickle rings against the wheat, but it will send them forth to work, nerved with an impulse that no disappointment can palsy, no misgivings keep back. F. D. H.

THE way in which Paul in this chapter enters on new ground is very characteristic of the abrupt style of the Epistle. The solemn topic of the resurrection is closed, and now the apostle gives directions respecting a certain charitable collection to be made by the Corinthians, in conjunction with other Gentile churches, for the poor at Jerusalem and in Judea. We have here an illustration of one peculiar use of Scripture. The event recorded here has long since passed; the temporary distress spoken of here was long since relieved; even the apostle himself has written simply and entirely for his own time. And yet the whole account is living, and fresh, and pregnant with instruction to us to-day. We find that which was written for a church at Corinth contains lessons for the Church of all ages.

1. The collection for the saints. The Jewish converts in Jerusalem, being excommunicated and persecuted, were in great distress, and Paul summoned the Gentile converts in Achaia, Galatia, and at Rome to alleviate their difficulties. Observe how all distinctions of race had melted away before Christianity. Christianity unites first to Christ, and then, through Christ, each to the other. So it was that Galatia and Corinth worked together for Jerusalem, inspired with a common sympathy, a common affection, and therefore the Galatians loved the Corinthians and the Corinthians the Galatians. F. W. R.—The churches of Galatia and Phrygia were the last churches which Paul had visited before the writing of this Epistle. He was now at Ephesus, and he came thither immediately from visiting these churches (Acts 18 : 23 ; 19 : 1). These, therefore, probably were the last churches at which he left directions for their public conduct during his absence. Paley.

2. "Gatherings" would better be expressed "collections," a word universally understood. The apostle sets his face peremptorily against the great sham of charity sermons, and will have no part in stimulating Christians up to their ordinary duty of almsgiving. A.

The first day of the week. Christ, in the interval between the resurrection and ascension, keeps day with his disciples, meeting them by a weekly manifestation of his presence, as if purposely to give them stated times. All the teachers after him made it a point, in the same manner, to institute a piety whose rule is order, and whose liberty itself is regularity. Thus John is in the Spirit, and meets the vision even of his prophecy on the Lord's day. Paul observes that day, and gives it as a good rule to lay by what may go for charity on that day, that so there may be order in charity. H. B.

This simple rule decides who shall give: "Every one of you," rich and poor. It tells when and how the consecration shall be made: "Upon the first day of the week." Upon the Christian Sabbath the laying aside was to be done, that out of it the Sabbath offering, which was an essential part of the Christian worship, might be made. It directs how much to give. "As God hath prospered him," or as God has made him able to give. The rule is altogether a plain one to the man in whose heart the love of Christ reigns supreme. There is need of no more specific legislation even touching the amount to be given. An.

The principle is to be systematic, regular, and methodical in our alms, instead of casual and impulsive. All that is necessary in order to this is a little time, a little trouble (very little of either), and perhaps a little moral courage. Let us first settle with our own minds, as in the sight of God, what proportion of our income is due to works of piety and charity. The proportion will vary much; for it is clear that the same proportion will be much more severely felt when subtracted from a very narrow income than when it is the mere exuberant overflow of a very large one. No one man can lay down a rule for another in this respect; the only point of importance is, that we would satisfy, not the expectations of others, but the requirements of an enlightened and a pure conscience in ourselves, or, in other words, the claims of God. The proportion having been settled, all that follows is more or less mechanical, and may be done with a very slight expenditure of time. E. M. G.

Instead of waiting for one stirring apostolic appeal, they were to make charity the business of their lives. Week by week they were to build up a sum for Paul to send to Jerusalem. This contribution, slowly, systematically gathered, was to be a matter of principle and not of impulse. It is possible that one burning speech of Paul's might have elicited a larger sum. But Paul preferred the effects of steady perseverance to those of vehement emotion. F. W. R.—Such a rule insured to the givers a gradual discipline in Christian benevolence which would be far more beneficial to them and a far greater test of character than one great effort of it. A great effort may be made in a moment of excitement, but continual little efforts can only be made on principle. E. M. G.

This systematic plan of Paul's costs something and teaches something. It teaches, first, the habit of a thoughtful life; it reminds us continually that there is something which is owed to God, and therefore is not our own. In this world we are recipients, the pensioners of our Father; and it is well that, by an outward system, we should train our inward spirit to the unforgetful thought of our debt to him. It is well that we should remember this, not to wake our fear of his austerity, but to kindle our gratitude in answer to his love. It teaches, secondly, self-denial. It gradually lays the foundation of a life of Christian economy, not that which sacrifices one pleasure for another, for this is but mere prudence, but that which abridges pleasure in order that we may be able to give to God.

The measure of liberality was "as God hath prospered him." Observe, Paul establishes a principle here, and not a rule. He lays down no rabbinical maxim of one tenth or one fourth. He leaves the measure of each man's charity to his own conscience. "Ask thyself," he says to each, "how much owest thou unto the Lord?" Men do not give as God hath prospered them, because they do not give systematically; that is, they who have the most are not they who give most, but the reverse. The reason of this strange difference is, that system is easier with little than with much. The man of thousands squanders. His luxury and his extra expenditure grow into necessities, and he then complains of his larger liabilities and establishment. Yet, withal, it would be a startling thing if well-meaning persons, who say they can not give, were only to compute how much annually is spent in that mere waste which the slightest self-denial would have spared.

5-10. He hoped to visit them, and to winter with them, but not yet, for he was to stay at Ephesus until Pentecost. He remained there, he says, "For a great door and effectual is opened unto me, and there are many adversaries." So it was not pleasure but duty which kept him there. Ephesus was his post, and at Ephesus he would stay. F. W. R.

10, 11. "If Timotheus come, let no man despise him." Why despise him? This charge is not given concerning any other messenger whom Paul sent: and, in the different Epistles, many such messengers are mentioned. Turn to 1 Tim. 4 : 12, and you will find that Timotheus was a young man, younger probably than those who were usually employed in the Christian mission; and that Paul, apprehending lest he should on that account be exposed to contempt, urges upon him the caution, which is there inserted, "Let no man despise thy youth." Paley.

12. Compare this passage with his earnest rebuke of the party of Apollos in the first chapter. On reading that, it might appear natural to say, "Oh, he can not bear a rival!" But behold, it was zeal for Christ, and not jealousy of Apollos. With Apollos he felt only hearty fellowship, for he greatly "desired him to come to them with the brethren." These are some of the fine touches by which we learn what that sublime apostle was, and what the grace of God had made him. We can but admire, too, the apostle's earnest desire to make Apollos stand well with the Corinthians. A meaner spirit, feeling that Apollos was a dangerous rival, would either have left his conduct unexplained, or would have caught at, and been even glad of, the suspicion resting on him: why did he stay away? But Paul would leave no misunderstanding to smolder. He simply stated that Apollos had reasons for not coming: "But he will come." This is magnanimity and true delicacy of heart. F. W. R.

13. Watch ye. Watch and pray against failures; but take heed of desponding under them. Be content to travel as you are able. The oak springs from the acorn; but does it become a tree at once? The mushroom springs up in a night; but what is a mushroom? Cecil.—Stand fast. There is a courage that springs from an unspotted conscience, and wins the triumphs of generous good-will; the courage that goes into and out of all companies, counting-houses, caucuses, and churches, with an uprightness not to be bent, whether you bring threats, or sneers, or golden baits to tempt it; a courage that lifts up an unblenched face in the most formidable array of difficulties, satisfied to stand on the platform of the New Testament, and on God's side, to listen to the encouragement of the beatitudes and to hold to the breastplate of righteousness. In the faith. Manliness without faith, at its best estate, is all frailty; at its surest strength, it is unsteadfast; at its fairest promise, it is treacherous; at its fullest joy, it is empty. No doubt, on the other hand, there is such a thing as religion without manliness, pietism and not piety. Religion without manliness acts as if Providence were a tyrant, the world a prison, and man a slave. Instead of holding its clear look up with conscious and grateful dignity to the light, and standing face to face with all the cheerful and solemn facts of life, and looking straight into the eyes of every creature, as faith gives it a supreme right to do, it creeps to the prayer-meeting abjectly, is half afraid to own its cause, and shows its meager mind by abusive and unilluminated criticisms. Why can not the disciples of Christ show the world specimens of human character, as broad in proportions, as free in outline, as magnanimous in temper, as sensible in practice, as appreciative in taste, as liberal in accomplishments, as they are superior by their celestial calling? F. D. H.

Quit you like men, be strong. Be men in knowledge, in faith, in self-denial, in endurance, in effort, in diligence, in perseverance, in love. That which contributes to your inward piety will secure your strength. No increase of outward labor, no pragmatism hurrying from toil to toil, no forwardness of mere act, no almsgiving or other beneficence, will certainly make you mighty men of God. All these may exist where grace is low or even absent. But devoted attention to the Word and prayer will do it; faith and vigilance and love will do it; communion with a dying Saviour will do it; the "unction from the Holy One" will do it. J. W. A.—Let not your biography be summed up: "He turned to God in his youth, he then became lukewarm, being engrossed in the cares and the business and the social demands of the world, and a short time before his death he saw his mistake, and felt that one thing was needful. For years his spiritual life was barely sustained by the prayers of friends and the weekly services of the sanctuary. He might have been a pillar in the Church, but he was only a weight." This be far from you. Oh, serve the Lord with gladness, be strong, quit yourselves like men, and abound in the work of the Lord! A. S.

19. Aquila and Priscilla. With Paul personal considerations were not lost in general philanthropy. It is common enough to be zealous about a cause, about some scheme of social good, and yet to be careless respecting individual welfare. But Paul's love was from Christ's own Spirit. It was love to the Church generally, and besides, it was love to Aquila and Priscilla. F. W. R.

22. There should probably be a full stop at "Anathema." Maranatha, "The Lord cometh," appears to have been a sort of Christian watchword, having no connection with the word before. Anathema, a curse, is Greek; Maranatha is Hebrew (Aramaic). It would be best to keep the former word in its Greek form, as being more generally understood by us, and to render the latter by, "The Lord cometh." A.—Anathema. Undoubtedly a curse, and may well awaken deep anxiety. It predicts the deepest misery; it includes absolutely every one who bears no love to Christ, although in the estimation of all he may be blameless. Maranatha. Jesus comes! Thus has the faithful Church exclaimed in joy through centuries, both to the believing and the unbelieving world. The promise of his coming is certain. It is guaranteed by the power, the majesty, the faithfulness of God, who never leaves his promise unfulfilled. His coming is inevitable for individuals and for all, for friends and foes, for time and for eternity. Oh, day of glory, when at last the veil shall be removed, and when the king shall be beheld in his full beauty by all such as love him with a pure heart fervently. But yet, oh, day of consternation and remorse, when all hidden things shall be revealed, all different fates decided, all doing and all leaving undone closed for eternity! Van O.

Section 277.

2 CORINTHIANS i. 1-14.

1 PAUL, an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God, and Timothy our brother, unto the 2 church of God which is at Corinth, with all the saints which are in all Achaia: grace be to 8 you and peace from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ. Blessed be God, even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of mercies, and the God of all com-4 fort; who comforteth us in all our tribulation, that we may be able to comfort them which 5 are in any trouble, by the comfort wherewith we ourselves are comforted of God. For as 6 the sufferings of Christ abound in us, so our consolation also aboundeth by Christ. And whether we be afflicted, it is for your consolation and salvation, which is effectual in the enduring of the same sufferings which we also suffer: or whether we be comforted, it is 7 for your consolation and salvation. And our hope of you is stedfast, knowing, that as ye are 8 partakers of the sufferings, so shall ye be also of the consolation. For we would not, brethren, have you ignorant of our trouble which came to us in Asia, that we were pressed out 9 of measure, above strength, insomuch that we despaired even of life: but we had the sentence of death in ourselves, that we should not trust in ourselves, but in God which raiseth 10 the dead: who delivered us from so great a death, and doth deliver: in whom we trust that 11 he will yet deliver us; ye also helping together by prayer for us, that for the gift bestowed 12 upon us by the means of many persons thanks may be given by many on our behalf. For our rejoicing is this, the testimony of our conscience, that in simplicity and godly sincerity, not with fleshly wisdom, but by the grace of God, we have had our conversation in the 13 world, and more abundantly to you-ward. For we write none other things unto you, than 14 what ye read or acknowledge; and I trust ye shall acknowledge even to the end; as also ye have acknowledged us in part, that we are your rejoicing, even as ye also are our's in the day of the Lord Jesus.

THE style of life that is wanted now, to gain for the ideas and the spirit of our common faith a fair and cordial reception, is a life that flows evermore from the divine spring of a living and personal communion with the Father, and goes to help every brother, and to bless every neighbor; that, while it is hid with Christ in God, walks among men with the tenderness and dignity of the Son of man; that asks no deference for its profession, but professes simply because it can not help telling its trust, owning its gratitude, honoring the Master; that by open and solemn reverence for the times and places of God's worship obeys the manliest of instincts; that finds an exercise for its Christian principle in all the companies, associations, resorts, employments of the world, and a temple for its praise in every scene of joy; that brings an added grace to all the innocent amenities and hopes of youth, and sets a more splendid crown on the saintly head of age; that sanctifies society and kneels in the closet; and that everywhere bears with it this meek, brave testimony, that "by the grace of God" it has had its conversation in the world. F. D. H.

THE CHARACTER AND OCCASION OF THIS EPISTLE.

If the First Epistle to the Corinthians is the most varied and comprehensive of Paul's letters, the Second is the most personal and impassioned. It is not systematic, argumentative, or expository, though full of matter and of force. Its distinctive merit is that, while everywhere exalting Christ, it shows us the man Paul of Tarsus, the follower of Christ, as he actually was in labors, anxieties, suspense, and suffering, how sensitive and emotional how tender and generous, and yet against false teachers how stern and resolute! It is not at all a treatise or essay constructed on a plan, but a warm outpouring of the apostle's heart. The letter was written in Macedonia, and very likely in the city of Philippi. D. F.

Paul had left Ephesus, where his First Epistle to the Corinthians had been written, and crossed over into Europe. The news of the effect of his former Epistle had been anxiously looked for by him, and he had sent Titus probably for the purpose of ascertaining it. At Troas, on his way from Ephesus, he had expected to meet Titus (2 : 13); and, not finding him there, he crossed into Macedonia, where the meeting took place, and the expected tidings were announced to him. The general reception given to his letter had been favorable, but all had not submitted themselves quietly to it. A.—The majority of the Corinthian Church had submitted to the injunctions of Paul, and testified the deepest repentance for the sins into which they had fallen. They had passed sentence of excommunication upon the incestuous person, and they had already contributed toward the collection for the poor Christians of Palestine. But there was still a minority whose opposition seems to have been rather embittered than humbled by the submission which the great body of the Church had thus yielded. They proclaimed in a louder and more contemptuous tone than ever their accusations against the apostle. They charged him with craft in his designs, and with selfish and mercenary motives; accused him of vanity and weakness; declared that he was continually threatening without striking, and promising without performing.

Titus, having delivered to Paul this mixed intelligence of the state of Corinth, was immediately directed to return thither—in company with two deputies specially elected, to take charge of their contribution, by the Macedonian churches (8 : 18, 22)—in order to continue the business of the collection. Paul made him the bearer of this second letter, which is addressed (still more distinctly than the First Epistle), not to Corinth only, but to all the churches in the whole province of Achaia, including Athens and Cenchræa and other neighboring towns, all of which probably shared more or less in the agitation which so powerfully affected the Christian community at Corinth. The twofold character of this Epistle is easily explained by the existence of the majority and minority which we have described in the Corinthian Church. Toward the former the Epistle overflows with love; toward the latter it abounds with warning and menace. The purpose of the apostle was to encourage and tranquilize the great body of the Church; but, at the same time, he was constrained to maintain his authority against those who persisted in despising the commands of Christ delivered by his mouth. It was needful also that he should notice their false accusations, and that he should vindicate his apostolic character by a statement of facts and a threat of punishment to be inflicted on the contumacious. C.

It was under these circumstances, and with these objects, that he wrote this Epistle, and with a view of breaking the severity which he was apprehensive of being compelled to employ against the rebellious (see 13 : 10) by, if possible, winning them over before his arrival. Hardly any of the Epistles is so various in character and style and so difficult to enter into and appreciate as this. "Consolation and rebuke, gentleness and severity, earnestness and irony, succeed one another at very short intervals and without notice." Of all the considerable Epistles in the New Testament, this, at first sight, and on our ordinary impression, contains the least matter of great and universal interest to the Christian Church. But first sight and our ordinary impression give way upon more mature examination. We shall find that—even exclusive of the very important passages which here and there meet us, full of weighty revelations and of comfort for all ages of the Church—in the midst of the personal portions we have continually precious texts of world-wide import occurring.

1. The Epistle opens with the customary greeting, the Apostle associating with himself Timothy, as he had done Sosthenes in the former letter. This mention of Timothy was opportune here, as we learn from 1 Cor. 4 : 17 that he had been sent to Corinth to "bring them to remembrance of the apostle's ways in Christ." These associations of others with himself are never allowed to interfere in the least degree with the individuality of the Epistles in which they occur. A.

3. Blessed be God. There is no mistaking what is the inner spirit of Paul, by watching the ready gushings of his soul, the sentiments that first spring to his tongue when it is set free. On his heart was the image of his King, the King of kings; penetrating all his powers was the spirit of that King, his heart glowed with love, his life was filled with service, and when he spoke his lips were filled with blessing. Father of mercies. The begetter of them, the fountain from which they all spring, Christ the channel in which they all run, flowing here, flowing there, irrigating a parched world like the streams of the East watering its arid plains. Father of mercies; no mercy in the earth of which he is not the Father. It is to be emphasized that it is as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ that He is presented to us as the Father of mercies, and also as the God of all comfort. J. D.

4. God had not failed him, but had matched his consolation to his servant's need with a redundancy which testified its source. Paul offers himself to their confidence, not as a self-cured physician, but as one whom God had first emptied and then filled with the fullness of his own effectual grace. The strength of his language is according to the depth from whence it comes, for he is speaking in the Holy Ghost; in the name of his Almighty Comforter he undertakes what God alone can truly do. Such is the rich fruit of an experimental faith, which out of weakness is made strong, not for himself only, but to bear in willing love the burdens of the weak. Bonar.—Christianity says, Your suffering blesses others; it teaches you sympathy, it gives them firmness and example, and reminds them of their frailty. How high a truth! for here is the law of the cross: "No man dieth to himself," for his pain and loss is for others, and, unconsciously to himself, brings with it to others joy and gain. F. W. R.

5. Suffering Christians are happy in the rich supplies of spiritual comfort and joy that in times of suffering are usual; so that, as their sufferings for Christ do abound, their consolations in him abound much more, as the apostle testifies. God is speaking most peace to the soul when the world speaks most war and enmity against it; and this compensates abundantly. The world can not but misjudge the state of suffering Christians; it sees, as Bernard speaks, their crosses but not their anointings. L. —As frankincense, when put into the fire, giveth the greater perfume; as spice, if it be beaten, smelleth the sweeter; as the earth, when it is torn up by the plough, becometh more fruitful; the seed in the ground, after frost and snow and winter storms, springeth the ranker; the nigher the vine is pruned to the stock, the greater grape it yieldeth; the grape, when it is most pressed and beaten, maketh the sweetest wine; linen, when it is washed, wrung, and benten, is so made fairer and whiter; even so the children of God receive great benefit by tribulation; for by it God washeth and cleanseth, schooleth and nutureth them, that so they may enter into their rest. Cawdray.

6. This is a very profound text. The thought, stripped of the warm and genial language in which the apostle clothes it, and put into modern phraseology, is this: God teaches Christian people through the experience of Christian ministers. If God afflicts one of his ministers, it is that he may instruct many through that single stroke of discipline, and bring lessons for the flock out of the trials of the pastor. If he comforts one of his ministers, it is that the man so comforted "may be able to comfort them which are in any trouble, by the comfort wherewith he himself is comforted of God." According to this view, the doctrine of Christ would come to the people through the experience of one, whose difficulties and trials were their own. And coming to them thus, it would surely come to them with a living power. "For as in water face answereth to face, so the heart of man to man." E. M. G.

7. Of the consolation. God puts us to the school of sorrow here, and gives us the opportunity of "suffering with Christ," that by the daily crucifixion of our old nature, by the lessons and blessings of outward calamities and change, there may grow up in us a still nobler and purer Divine life; and that we may so be made capable—more capable, and capable of more—of that inheritance for which the only necessary thing is the death of Christ, and the only fitness is faith in his name. A. M.

9. Sentence of death. The shadow of this great death was permitted to come over him, not only to demonstrate the power and faithfulness of God as his deliverer, but for the more effectual destruction of all self-reliant confidence, and a corresponding increase of positive and simple trust in God. Bonar.—There is nothing so hard to force upon the soul as the conviction that life is a real, earnest, awful thing. Only see the butterfly life of pleasure men and women are living day by day, hour by hour, flitting from one enjoyment to another; living, working, spending, and exhausting themselves for nothing else but the seen and temporal and unreal. And yet these are undying souls, with feelings and faculties which death can not rob them of; their chance swiftly passing, and no second chance for ever! F. W. R.

10. Delivered and doth deliver. Salvation, though a work wrought already for eternity, is the daily lesson of a growing faith. He that is our God is a God of salvation, and our changes are ordered for the proving of his many names. Sickness, privation, and trouble of any kind are permitted as occasions of sustaining and delivering love. Grace knows how to deliver even from those snares in which our own folly or carelessness may have entangled our feet.

11. Ye helping us. He disarms their un-friendliness by calling for their help; by making them his intercessors he tries the surest method of rekindling their waning love. And thus the partial estrangement of which he had complained in his former letter, and which lingered still, though in a less degree, would be replaced by a deeper and kindlier sympathy when God had shown himself attentive to their prayers on Paul's behalf. Bonar.

12. These words have the charm of life in them. They tell us how a man lived, not in smooth circumstances, in sunny weather, but how he lived when he was beset by many enemies, and girded round about by difficulties and sorrows; how he lived, not in conspicuous places merely, but everywhere, and through and through; how he lived, not for a short time, but always; for, manifestly, he is here giving information as to the settled principles and continuous moral character of his whole life. Here is the kind of life which each one of us should live or endeavor after as his own. A. R.

Our rejoicing. Not that we are to seek in ourselves for joy and peace when suffering under a consciousness of sin; not that we are to seek relief from the burden of guilt in our own virtues or graces; not that we are to look to our own works for justifying righteousness: in all these views of our case, we must rejoice only in the Lord; but, as those who are justified and at peace with God through Christ, we are to do the work of righteousness, which is peace, and enjoy the effect of righteousness, which is quietness and assurance for ever; we are to covet the rejoicing which Paul speaks of as arising from "the testimony of our conscience, that in simplicity and godly sincerity, not with fleshly wisdom, but by the grace of God, we have had our conversation in the world." There is the joy of justification and the joy of sanctification: one, the delight of being restored to God's favor by the work of Christ, and the other the joy of being restored to God's image by the work of the Spirit. J. A. J.

Testimony of conscience. It was not faultlessness Paul meant by the testimony of conscience, but integrity, moral earnestness in his work; he had been straightforward in his ministry, and his worst enemies could be refuted if they said that he was insincere. F. W. R.—"In simplicity" this man had lived and was living. The word means singleness—singleness of mind, purpose, character, life. The opposite of this is duplicity, doubleness in speech, behavior, heart. Linked with "simplicity" is "godly sincerity," which perhaps brings in no characteristically different element. For the two are much akin. The word sincerity means, literally, translucence, clearness of mind. Such is the sincerity of a devout soul. It is called "godly sincerity" (literally, "the sincerity of God"), either because it is like his own or because it comes directly from him into the heart and life of its possessor. It is sincerity which comes from God, who thus gives us of his own and makes us partakers of the Divine nature. In making us good, he makes us like himself. By his own holy and sincere spirit he fills us with "godly sincerity." A. R.—The kind of Christian action and Christian speech wanted for the best exhibition of Christian truth is that where the word and the deed just follow and obey the meaning of the soul; where the feeling or conviction of the truth exactly measures, spaces, and shapes the outward profession; where the disciple holds it an equal infidelity to pretend to more or to less faith than he possesses; where, in fact, the expression is not nicely regulated by a conscious reference to its external effect, as being exemplary, but by a spontaneous and irresistible impulse of a holy purpose in the breast. F. D. H.

But by the grace of God. By its cleansings, its kindlings, its renewings, its growths; by its whole drift and discipline; by its gentle commiserations and unrelenting severities; by its inward strengths drawn immediately from the immortal strength of God, and by its outward leadings and guidings through duties and difficulties and changing days—by this grace of God we live, we have "our conversation in the world." A. R.

Section 278.

2 CORINTHIANS i. 15-24; ii. 1-17.

15 AND in this confidence I was minded to come unto you before, that ye might have a second benefit; and to pass by you into Macedonia, and to come again out of Macedonia unto you, and of you to be brought on my way toward Judæa. When I therefore was thus minded, did I use lightness? or the things that I purpose, do I purpose according to the flesh, that with me there should be yea yea, and nay nay? But as God is true, our word toward you was not yea and nay. For the Son of God, Jesus Christ, who was preached among you by us, even by me and Silvanus and Timotheus, was not yea and nay, but in him was yea.

20 For all the promises of God in him are yea, and in him Amen, unto the glory of God by us. Now he which stablisheth us with you in Christ, and hath anointed us, is God; who hath also sealed us, and given the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts. Moreover I call God for a record upon my soul, that to spare you I came not as yet unto Corinth. Not for that we have dominion over your faith, but are helpers of your joy: for by faith ye stand.

1 But I determined this with myself, that I would not come again to you in heaviness.
 2 For if I make you sorry, who is he then that maketh me glad, but the same which is made
 3 sorry by me? And I wrote this same unto you, lest, when I came, I should have sorrow
 4 from them of whom I ought to rejoice; having confidence in you all, that my joy is the joy
 5 of you all. For out of much affliction and anguish of heart I wrote unto you with many 6 tears; not that ye should be grieved, but that ye might know the love which I have more 7 abundantly unto you. But if any have caused grief, he hath not grieved me, but in 8 part: that I may not overcharge you all. Sufficient to such a man is this punishment, 9 which was inflicted of many. So that contrariwise ye ought rather to forgive him, and 10 comfort him, lest perhaps such a one should be swallowed up with overmuch sorrow.
 11 Wherefore I beseech you that ye would confirm your love toward him. For to this end 12 also did I write, that I might know the proof of you, whether ye be obedient in all things.
 13 To whom ye forgive any thing, I forgive also: for if I forgave any thing, to whom I forgave
 14 it, for your sakes forgave I it in the person of Christ; lest Satan should get an advantage 15 of us: for we are not ignorant of his devices. Furthermore, when I came to Troas to 16 preach Christ's gospel, and a door was opened unto me of the Lord, I had no rest in my 17 spirit, because I found not Titus my brother: but taking my leave of them, I went from thence into Macedonia.

14 Now thanks be unto God, which always causeth us to triumph in Christ, and maketh
 15 manifest the savour of his knowledge by us in every place. For we are unto God a sweet 16 savour of Christ, in them that are saved, and in them that perish: to the one we are the 17 savour of death unto death; and to the other the savour of life unto life. And who is sufficient for these things? For we are not as many, which corrupt the word of God: but as of sincerity, but as of God, in the sight of God speak we in Christ.

THE same message comes to us all, offering us the same terms. Christ stands before each of us in the same attitude. And what is the consequence? A parting of the whole mass of us, some on one side and some on the other. "I, if I be lifted up," said He, "will draw all men unto me." The attractive power will go out over the whole race of his brethren; but in some hearts there will be no yielding to the attraction. Some will remain rooted, obstinate, steadfast in their place; and to some the lightest word will be mighty enough to stir all the slumbering pulses of their sin-ridden hearts, and to bring them, broken and penitent, for mercy to his feet. To the one He is "a savor of life unto life, and to the other a savor of death unto death." The broadest doctrine of the universal adaptation, and the universal intention too of the gospel as the "power of God unto salvation," contains hidden in its depths this undeniable fact, that, be the cause what it may (and I believe the cause lies with us), this separating, judging effect follows from all faithful preaching of Christ's words. He came to judge the world, "that they which see not (as he himself said) might see, and they which see might be made blind." And on the cross that process went on in two men, alike in necessity, alike in criminality, alike in this, that death's icy finger was just being laid upon their heart, to stop all the flow of its wild blood and passion, but different in this, that the one of them turned himself, by God's grace, and laid hold on the gospel that was offered to him, and the other turned himself away, and derided, and died. A. M.

15-19. Paul had intended to come to Corinth somewhat before the time when he was writing, and he had let the Corinthians know of his intention; but for reasons of sufficient weight he changed his intention, and so his opponents accused him of lightness, and with saying yea one day and nay another. He replies that the Son of God, the object of all his preaching, and, therefore, at once the orderer and the pattern of all his steps, was incapable of anything like vacillation. An unchangeable purpose could be read in the life and character of the Lord, and that purpose was the fulfillment of the promises of God—a fulfillment which God himself was ever working out in all Christians by the power of the Spirit, whereby we are all sealed as his. Paul could not be capricious because his Lord and Master could not, and because that Lord and Master had sent his Spirit into the hearts of his disciples to be their guide and strength.

20. The promises are yea. We doubt whether these promises have strength as well as truth, and whether they are not mocking voices calling us over mountains which we can never climb. And still to us there is the same answer, and that answer is the life of Christ. To every doubt about our duty, and about our Father's love, and about our own hope of reaching him, the life of Christ for ever answers "Yea," and for ever, "Amen." Yea, they are the promises of God; yea, they are certain to be fulfilled; yea, you shall have strength to share in their fulfillment. You may trust them when they call ; you may follow them where they lead ; you may hold by them in the darkness ; you may call upon their aid when you are defeated : for to all of them the life of Christ, the love and holiness that speak in his life and death, for ever say "Yea," and for ever, "Amen." This is the fixed purpose of Christ, to fulfill the promises of God ; and so the servants of Christ will reflect in their lives the same fixed purpose, which shall grow with their growth, and increase with their strength, and give steadiness to their youth, and energy to their manhood, and fire to their old age. For how can he vacillate or change who has the deep purpose of his life at once called into activity, and upheld with unchanging firmness, by the knowledge of the power of Christ ? F. T.

21. Christ, says Paul, was true ; and God has established us in Christ. Therefore, fickleness, duplicity, or deceit is impossible to us. Observe, too, that he does not assert his truth because of his apostleship, but because of his Christianity ; for he associates the Corinthians with himself—"us with you."

23. To spare you. Had Paul gone to Corinth while they were unrepentant, his apostolic duty would have required from him severe animadversion. Now, it was to spare them this that he changed his intention. It was no caprice, no fickleness, it was simply tenderness to them.

24. The mere priest wishes to save men by his own official powers and prerogatives, while the minister wishes to help them to save themselves. See how exactly this verse expresses the distinction between these two spirits : "Dominion over your faith" ; there is the very spirit of the priest. "Helpers of your joy" ; there is the spirit of the minister—a desire, not to be a ruler, but a helper ; not that he shall hold men up, but that they shall "stand." Whenever you find a man anxious and striving to make men independent of himself, yea, independent of all men ; desiring to help them, not to rest on his authority, but to stand on their own faith, that they may be elevated, instructed, and educated ; there you have the Christian minister, the servant, the "helper of your joy."

3. He distinctly says, he had written to pain them, in order that he might have joy. Very selfish, as at first it sounds ; but if we look closely into it, it only sheds a brighter and fresher light upon the exquisite unselfishness and delicacy of Paul's character. He desired to save himself pain, because it gave them pain. He desired joy for himself, because his joy was theirs. He will not separate himself from them for a moment : it is not I and you, but we ; "my joy is your joy, as your grief was my grief." And so knit together are we beloved—minister and congregation ! F. W. R.

4. Paul spake with tears ; nor is it easy to withhold such expressions of grief when a man reposes in the bosom of a church, bearing simply the name of Christian ; a stranger to its feelings, to its plans, and to its spiritual peace ; a man whose power is felt in the political and commercial world always ; in the religious world—never. A. B.

5. One of those cases where the delicacy of the apostle's blame has been obliterated by the translators. What he says is this, that the offender has not wronged him, but in a measure (he will not say this without qualification, lest he bear too hardly on him) all of them—the whole Corinthian Church. This meaning would be expressed thus : "But, if any hath caused sorrow, he hath not caused sorrow to me, but in part (that I press not too heavily) to you all." A.

6-11. The main defense of the apostle against the charge of fickleness in the non-fulfillment of his promise was, that he had abstained from going to Corinth in order to spare them the sharp rebuke he must have administered had he gone thither. A great crime had been committed ; the Church had been compromised, more especially as some of the Corinthians had defended the iniquity on the ground of liberty, and Paul had staid away after giving his advice, that not he, but they themselves, might do the work of punishment. He gave sentence—that the wicked person should be put away, but he wished them to execute the sentence. For it was a matter of greater importance to Paul that the Corinthians should feel rightly the necessity of punishment than merely that the offender should be punished. It was not to vindicate his authority that he wrote, but that they should feel the authority of right ; and the Corinthians obeyed. They excommunicated the incestuous person ; for the Epistle of the apostle stirred up their languid consciences into active exercise. Accordingly he applauds their conduct, and recommends them now to forgive the offender whom they had punished. The forgiveness of man is an echo and an earnest of God's forgiveness. Even the mercifulness of one good man sounds like a voice of pardon from heaven. The man whom society will not forgive nor restore is driven into recklessness. This is the true Christian doctrine of absolution, as here expounded by the apostle. The degrading power of severity, the restoring power of pardon is vested in the Christian community.

12, 13. Paul gives an additional proof that it was not forgetfulness of them which had made him change his mind : this proof was his unrest at Troas. While there one subject engrossed all his thoughts, the state of Corinth ; and the question, What would be the result of the letter he had sent ? At Troas he expected to meet Titus, who was bearing the reply; but, not finding him there, he could not rest, he could not take full comfort even from "the door which had been opened" for success. He left his work half finished, and he hastened into Macedonia to meet Titus. His argument therefore is, Did this look like forgetfulness? Did this make it probable that he "had used lightness or purposed according to the flesh"? Or did it show that he was absent unwillingly, putting force on himself, like a wise parent who refuses to see his child, though his heart is all the while bleeding at what he inflicts? This is the connection between the 12th and 13th verses. F. W. R.

14. Triumph in Christ. The words mean to lead captive in a triumph over the enemies of Christ. The metaphor is taken from the triumphal procession of a victorious general. God is celebrating his triumph over his enemies; Paul (who had been so great an opponent of the gospel) is a captive following in the train of the triumphal procession, yet (at the same time, by a characteristic change of metaphor) an incense-bearer, scattering incense (which was always done on these occasions) as the procession moves on. Some of the conquered enemies were put to death when the procession reached the Capitol. To them the smell of the incense was a savor of death unto death; to the rest who were spared, a savor of life unto life. The metaphor appears to have been a favorite one with Paul; it occurs again Col. 2: 15. C.

14-16. How finely characteristic of this apostle is the sudden rising out of his own distress into exultation over the gospel and the preciousness of Christ! Even that journey which Paul took in such depression of spirit was a triumphal march for the gospel, and spread a fragrant "savor of Christ," like the incense in the public procession of ancient conquerors. Sweet and life-giving was that savor to believers; unwelcome and so deadly to unbelievers. Thus the apostolic preacher felt himself to be lifted above the common range of things. He was on a mission of life or death in every place; and, far from viewing this as a function easily fulfilled, wondered and trembled at the charge—"And who is sufficient for these things?" D. F.

16. God's word has two edges; it can cut back-stroke and fore-stroke. If it do thee no good, it will do thee hurt; it is the savor of life unto life to those that receive it, but of death unto death to them that refuse it. Bun.—There is no more waste in preaching than there has been in making an atonement which is not received. The precious seed which, Sabbath after Sabbath, is thrown out upon the moral desert, which resists and sets at naught all the diligence of the husbandman, is not lost. It will bring forth fruit—the broad field, upon which at last shall be gathered the sublime, and awful, and mysterious, and stirring magnificence of the end, is white unto the harvest. Every grain is there giving produce; every particle of gospel truth springs up and waves on that awful field. E. M.—To all, God's universal love is ready to impart life, and earnestly that love desires that all should be helped through the preached word; but, nevertheless, those who refuse the love which speaks to them may not escape the power of God. Those who refuse to believe the word must stumble at it. They hinder, indeed, through their resisting obstinacy, the sanctifying of God within them, for He will drive no man to conversion; but the sanctifying of God on them they can not hinder. Because they do not choose to be softened and enlightened unto eternal life through his word, it has upon them a hardening operation unto death. Besser.

Who is sufficient? Our mission is to unfold the mysteries of God's word, to preach Christ, and to save souls from death. Waving the smoking censer, we stand between the living and the dead, between hell and heaven, seeking to intercept the downward progress of sinners to the one, and allure them up to the other. Every sermon we deliver tells upon the changeless destiny of those who listen to us. Eyes that gaze up into ours while we proclaim to them the salvation of Christ will soon see the Judge of all the earth. Who, then, is sufficient for a work so great, for responsibilities so overwhelming, save he who is filled with the Spirit? In vain our talents, our learning, our eloquence, our carefully prepared and gracefully delivered discourses—all, all will be fruitless without the unction and power of the Holy Ghost. Winslow.—Carry your poor inadequate resources to Christ! In his hands they become sufficient. He multiplies them. He gives wisdom, strength, all that fits for the task to which he calls us. Bring your little faith to him; he will increase it. Bring your feeble love to him and ask him to kindle it from the pure flame of his own, and he will make your heart burn within you. Bring your partial understanding of his will and way to him, and he will be to you wisdom. Bring all the poverty of your natures, all the insufficiency of your religious character, all the inadequacy of your poor work to your Lord. Feel it all. Let the conviction of your nothingness sink into your soul. Then wait before him in simple faith, in lowly obedience, and power will come to you equal to your desire and to your duties, and he will put his Spirit upon you, and will anoint you to proclaim liberty to the captives and to give bread to all the hungry. "Who is sufficient for these things" must ever precede, and will ever be followed by, "our sufficiency is of God." A. M.

17. Truth would be to some "the savor of death unto death"; for there can be no doubt that the faithful preaching of the gospel sometimes kills. And yet is this gospel which destroys a sweet and acceptable savor to God even in them that perish. An awful truth! The gospel preached in fidelity ruins human souls. A "banquet"!—oh! know ye what ye say? It is sometimes death to hear it! And yet we must not dilute it. How the apostle rejoiced in that day that he had been uncompromising, and firm, and true! "not dealing deceitfully with the Word of God." F. W. R.

Section 279.

2 CORINTHIANS iii. 1-18.

1 Do we begin again to commend ourselves? or need we, as some others, epistles of com-
 2 mendation to you, or letters of commendation from you? Ye are our epistle written in our 3 hearts, known and read of all men: forasmuch as ye are manifestly declared to be the epis-
 4 tle of Christ ministered by us, written not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God;
 5 not in tables of stone, but in fleshy tables of the heart. And such trust have we through 6 Christ to God-ward: not that we are sufficient of ourselves to think any thing as of our-
 7 selves; but our sufficiency is of God; who also hath made us able ministers of the new 8 testament; not of the letter, but of the spirit: for the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth 9 life. But if the ministration of death, written and engraven in stones, was glorious, so 10 that the children of Israel could not stedfastly behold the face of Moses for the glory of his 11 countenance; which glory was to be done away: how shall not the ministration of the 12 spirit be rather glorious? For if the ministration of condemnation be glory, much more 13 doth the ministration of righteousness exceed in glory. For even that which was made 14 glorious had no glory in this respect, by reason of the glory that excelleth. For if that 15 which is done away was glorious, much more that which remaineth is glorious. Seeing then 16 that we have such hope, we use great plainness of speech: and not as Moses, which put a 17 veil over his face, that the children of Israel could not stedfastly look to the end of that 18 which is abolished: but their minds were blinded: for until this day remaineth the same
 19 veil untaken away in the reading of the old testament; which veil is done away in Christ.
 20 But even unto this day, when Moses is read, the veil is upon their heart. Nevertheless 21 when it shall turn to the Lord, the veil shall be taken away. Now the Lord is that Spirit:
 22 and where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty. But we all, with open face beholding
 23 as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image from glory to glory, 24 even as by the Spirit of the Lord.

THE Christian is the world's Bible, and the only one it reads. If we take care that in this book be plainly shown the loving spirit, the grandeur, and the winning friendliness of Christ, then we shall see many hearts open to receive this actual testimony of Christian life. The strongest argument for the truth of Christianity is the man filled with the Spirit of Christ. The best means of bringing back the world to a belief in miracles is to exhibit the miracle of regeneration and its power in our own life. The best proof of Christ's resurrection is a living Church, which itself is walking in new life, and drawing life from him who has overcome death. Christlieb.—The living epistle needs no translation to be understood in every country and clime; a humble, gentle, holy, Christlike life preaches to the common ear all the world over. Let a man reveal his soul in the inarticulate speech of an earnest, pure, and truthful life, and this will be a language which the profoundest must admire, while the simplest can appreciate. The most elaborate discourse on sanctification will prove tame and ineffective in comparison with the eloquence of a humble, holy walk with God. Instruct your children in the knowledge of God's great love and mercy, but let them see that love cheering, animating, hallowing your daily life; describe to them the divinity and glory of the Saviour's person and work, but let them note how daily you think of Him, hear with what profoundest reverence you name His name, see how the sense of a divine presence sheds a reflected moral beauty around your own—and this will be a living and breathing theology to them, without which formal teaching will avail but little. Caird.

1-6. The close of the second chapter looked like boasting—it seemed like a recommendation of himself. In these verses he is replying to the possible charge. He declares that he wanted no commendation to them, no praise, no recommendatory letters (v. 1). Hence he infers that there was no vanity in his assertion, though it looked like a boast. For (vs. 5, 6) the trust he had was not in himself—the writer—but in Christ, the Spirit, the Author of the work. "Not that we are sufficient of ourselves to think anything as of ourselves; but our sufficiency is of God; who also hath made us able ministers of the New Testament." Then it is that from these words, "able ministers," he breaks off into a digression which occupies all the chapter, and is descriptive of the Christian ministry in contradistinction to the Jewish. F. W. R.

1. As some others. Turn to Acts 18 : 27, and you will find that, a short time before the writing of this Epistle, Apollos had gone to Corinth with letters of commendation from the Ephesian Christians; "and when Apollos was disposed to pass into Achaia, the brethren wrote exhorting the disciples to receive him." Here the words of the Epistle bear the appearance of alluding to some specific instance, and the history supplies that instance. Paley.

3. Epistle of Christ. In this dark world Christ's countenance shines through the spirit and life of his people. Here he has need of such witnesses. He needs vessels to bear his name about among men; and for this purpose he chooses earthen vessels, that the power may be known to be his own. The life of his own disciples is the epistle in which he desires to be read. The evidence with which he will convince the world is the walk of the people whom he has bought with his blood and renewed by his Spirit. Arnot.—What is any description of Christianity upon paper as compared to the living epistle which all men can read? We want Christian men and women, not their books or their money only, but themselves. The poor and needy ones who, in this great turmoil of life, have found no helper among their fellows; the wicked and outcast, whose hand is against every man's, because they have found, by dire experience of the world's selfishness, how every man's hand is against them; the prodigal and broken-hearted children of the human family, who have the bitterest thoughts of God and man, if they have any thoughts at all beyond their own busy contrivances how to live and how to indulge their craving passions—all these, by the mesmerism of the heart, and by means of that great witness, conscience, which God in mercy leaves as a light from heaven in the most abject dwelling on earth, can to some extent read the living epistle of a renewed soul, written in the divine characters of the Holy Spirit. They can see and feel, as they never did anything else in this world, the love which calmly shines in that eye, telling of inward light and peace possessed, and of a place of rest found and enjoyed by the weary heart! They can perceive the reality of the piety, which also reads to them in touching tones the glory of him who came to seek and save the lost; and their souls can not refuse some amen, however faint, echoed by their very misery, and from their yearnings for a good they have never known, to that earnest prayer of faith uttered, in the bonds of a common brotherhood, to one who is addressed as a common Father through a common Lord. N. M.

This third verse is one of those many passages of Scripture in which each of the persons of the blessed Trinity is represented as concurring and sharing in the work of grace upon the heart. The act of one is the act of all who are united in nature and purpose. But this work of sanctification is commonly ascribed in a peculiar manner to God the Spirit. It is his special office, to which he has voluntarily condescended in the economy of redemption, to create this abiding, soul-transforming principle of holiness in the soul. Goode.

5. Not sufficient of ourselves. When we fall back from the earnest longing for a consecrated life to the littlenesses and distractions and failures of each passing day, when we contrast the power of our creed, as an ideal, with the actual effect which it produces upon our habitual manner of acting and judging, it is impossible that we should not be filled with a profound distrust of ourselves. And indeed so it must be, so long as we look at ourselves. In that contemplation of self lies weakness without the prospect of support; failure without the promise of redemption. But, if it be well that we should learn by sad experience what we can not do by our own power, still to rest in this knowledge of despair is to renounce our birthright. Discomfiture and defeat are means by which God draws us closer to himself. Each fresh discovery of our helplessness, if we use the opportunity, reveals to us at the same time a present source of succor. We are alone, as it may seem, in the midst of the world, which moves on its way with irresistible force; we are beset and baffled by circumstances which lie wholly without our control; we dishonor and discredit by our faintheartedness the name which it is our privilege to bear; yet, even so, in isolation, in failure, in dejection, only let the thought of self perish, and we shall know that we are not desolate: our sufficiency is of God. B. F. W.—The belief of our dependence on God as the source of all spiritual strength grows with our Christian growth. The believer does not receive at his ingrafting into Christ a supply of vital energy sufficient to influence him in a holy manner all his life long. The branch must abide in the vine. New streams of grace must flow hour by hour; and, if this communication is interrupted, he begins to languish. This is the lesson we are constantly learning. J. W. A.

6. "Who hath made us able ministers" gives a wrong idea; it should be, "who hath enabled us as ministers," "given us power to become ministers," or "made us sufficient as ministers," keeping the same expression as has been used before. A.—In these words the great apostle affirms two most important truths. Vindicating his own position, but including, doubtless, with himself, all who share his ministry, he asserts at once its authority and its object; the commission by which it is empowered to act, and the essential quality of the religion it is constituted to diffuse. "God hath made us ministers"—such is the source of our qualification; "ministers not of the letter, but of the spirit"—such is the nature of the doctrine we have to declare. W. A. B.

"The letter" here, according to all the necessities of the context, is the law, called "the letter" because written on tables of stone; the whole dispensation, commanding and threatening—yet not quickening, of the Old Testament. This, as the apostle, in harmony with all his other teaching, declares, "killeth"; not merely negatively, in which it does not make alive, but positively; for, as Augustine admirably brings out, the true parallel and interpretation of the words are to be found in those other words of Paul, "I was alive without the law once," etc.; while "the Spirit" here is that dispensation of the Spirit of which he speaks (Rom. 8 : 1-11) as that in which, and in which only, resides the power of making men alive unto God. T.

8. The gospel is the word of the Spirit; his great instrument in the conversion of sinners to God. Hence this gospel, in opposition to the old dispensation (which only made known the terms of the law, and was therefore one of condemnation), is called "the ministration of the Spirit." This is its peculiar glory. The Spirit of Christ accompanies it to the hearts of his people, effectually renewing them thereby in the spirit of their minds, and working in them what it requires of them. And as this is the chief instrument employed by the Spirit 'n first regenerating believers, so also in carrying on the work of their sanctification throughout their earthly pilgrimage. Goode.

9. Ministration of condemnation. As a rule of life, without the atoning blood to pardon sin and without the grace of the Spirit to make obedience possible, the law had been but a ministration of condemnation. As a typical system, it had been destined to pass away on the appearance of the antitype which fulfilled it. In either respect it contrasted disadvantageously with the Gospel, which was at once endowed with perpetuity and a ministration of spiritual righteousness. H. P. L.

10. The law condemns and can not justify a sinner; the Gospel justifies and can not condemn the sinner that believes in Jesus. In the law God appears in terrible threatenings of eternal death; in the Gospel he manifests himself in gracious promises of life eternal. That presents to the view of the sinner a throne of judgment; this presents "a throne of grace." Every sentence of condemnation in Scripture belongs to the law; every sentence of justification forms a part of the Gospel. The law condemns a sinner for his first offense, but the Gospel offers him the forgiveness of all his offenses. Thus, in every point of difference, "that which was made glorious had no glory in this respect, by reason of the glory that excelleth." Colquhoun.

11. That which remaineth. The present reign of the Spirit is to close the period of our world's annals. Nothing of more palpable, imposing form is to come after it; nothing is to take its place; nothing is to intervene between it and the final judgment. We need not be told at this late day, and after all we have seen of the quiet, noiseless progress of truth and righteousness, that Christ's kingdom is not of this world. The only throne which the Redeemer is ever to set up on earth is a throne in the heart; and this is to be done so completely and universally under the present ministration of the Spirit that all shall know the Lord, from the least to the greatest. Magee.

12. Plainness of speech. Ours should be a ministry whose words are not compacted of baldness but boldness; whose very life is outspokenness and free fearlessness; a ministry which has no concealment, no reserve; which shrinks from the weakness of a mere cautiousness, but which exults even in failure, if the truth has been spoken, with a joyful confidence. For a man who sees into the heart of things speaks out not timidly, nor superstitiously, but with a brow unveiled, and with a speech as free as his spirit: "The truth has made him free." F. W. R.

13-16. Paul's immediate purpose seems to be to illustrate the frank openness which ought to mark the ministry of Christianity. He does this by reference to the veil which Moses wore when he came forth from talking with God. There, he says in effect, we have a picture of the old dispensation—a partial revelation, gleaming through a veil, flashing through symbols, expressed here in a rite, there in a type, there again in an obscure prophecy. Christianity is, and Christian teachers ought to be, the opposite of all this. It has, and they are to have, no reserve, no use of symbols and ceremonies to overlay truth, but an intelligible revelation in words and deeds, to men's understandings. But he gets far beyond this point in his uses of his illustration. It opens out into a series of contrasts between the two revelations. The veiled Moses.

represents the clouded revelation of old. The vanishing gleam on his face recalls the fading glories of that which was abolished; and then, by a quick turn of association, he thinks of the veiled readers in the synagogues, copies, as it were, of the lawgiver with the shrouded countenance; only too significant images of the souls obscured by prejudice and obstinate unbelief, with which Israel trifles over the uncomprehended letter of the old law. A. M.

14. Vail untaken away. More than fifteen centuries had passed since the revelation of Sinai, but in the days of Paul the face of Moses was still veiled from the eyes of Israel. The tallith, used during prayer and the reading of the law, still perpetuated the symbol in every synagogue. And that which met the eye too truly pictured the spiritual fact which the eye could not reach. H. P. L. —“He came unto his own, and his own received him not!” They, who through a long course of centuries had been educated into expectation of the ever-blessed Visitant, perverted the expectation, reading it by the corrupted glare of their own ambition; and, though miracles more wondrous than those of their greatest leaders were performed before their eyes—miracles that identified the Saviour with the Angel and Guide of their whole past history—yet the infidelity of the heart prevailed to poison the reason, and they rejected him! W. A. B.

16, 17. The darkness, however, was not to last. “When it [the heart of the people] shall turn to the Lord, the vail shall be taken away.” This was the promise. It is explained by the assertion that, “where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty.” For the Spirit of the Lord dwells with all who are really converted to Christ, since “the Lord is that Spirit.” In other words, to possess the Lord Jesus Christ is to possess the Holy Ghost, who is the minister and guardian of Christ’s presence in the soul. The immediate and practical conclusion is, that to be converted to Jesus Christ is to have escaped from the veil which darkened the spiritual intelligence of Israel. The converting Spirit is the source of positive illumination; much more therefore does he give freedom from the veil of prejudice which denies to Jewish thought the exercise of any real insight into the deeper sense of Scripture. That sense is seized by the Christian student of the ancient law, because in the Church of Jesus Christ he possesses the Spirit, and “where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty.” Freedom is not an occasional largess of the divine Spirit. It is the invariable accompaniment of the Spirit’s true action. It is the very atmosphere of his presence. Wherever he really is, there is also freedom. This liberty comes with the gift of truth; it comes along with that gift of which in its fullness the Eternal Spirit is the only giver. He gives freedom from error for the reason; freedom from constraint for the affections; freedom for the will from the tyranny of sinful and human wills. Such freedom is, in fact, a creation of grace: the sons of God alone enjoy it. H. P. L.

18. The original word in this passage, in the opinion of Locke, Macknight, and others, should be rather translated “reflecting as a mirror,” instead of “beholding as in a mirror.” Both meanings may be united. The mirrors of the ancients were made of polished steel, and reflected therefore upon the countenances of those who looked upon them a luminous effulgence, or glory. The apostle beheld as in the mirror of the Scriptures the glory of Christ, and this glory shone upon the face of the apostle. Moses veiled the glory which had shone upon his face. The apostle, on the contrary, would not veil his face; but by contemplating more and more the glory of Christ, endeavored to diffuse the knowledge of that glory to the world. G. T.

The brightness on the face of Moses faded away and left no trace. It effaced none of the marks of sorrow and care, and changed none of the lines of that strong, stern face. But, says Paul, the glory which we behold sinks inward, and changes us; as we look, into its own image. The power to which is committed the perfecting of our characters lies in looking upon Jesus. It is not the mere beholding, but the gaze of love and trust that molds us by silent sympathy into the likeness of his wondrous beauty. Love makes us like. We learn that even in our earthly relationships, where habitual familiarity with parents and dear ones stamps some tone of voice or look, or little peculiarity of gesture, on a whole house. And, when the infinite reverence and aspiration which the Christian soul cherishes to its Lord are superadded, the transforming power of loving contemplation of Him becomes mighty beyond all analogies in human friendship. A. M.—There is a subtle law of assimilation whereby man, in his deepest life, receives an impress from the object on which his gaze is habitually fixed. Those who gaze heavenward are, as the apostle tells us, changed by the image of perfect beauty from one to another degree of glory. Those who look downward and earthward receive as certainly the stamp and likeness of the things beneath them; they lose their hold by a progressive declension on all that sublimates and ennobles human life. They sink downward and deeper, till at length they positively can see before them nothing but the animal, gifted doubtless with strange accomplishments, yet, after all and at bottom, only the self-seeking, perishing animal. H. P. L.

Judaism had the one lawgiver who beheld God, while the people tarried below. Christianity leads us all to the mount of vision, and lets the lowliest pass through the fences, and go up where the blazing glory is seen. Moses veiled the face that shone with the irradiation of Deity. We with unveiled face are to shine among men. He had a momentary gleam, a transient brightness; we have a perpetual light. Moses’s face shone, but the luster was but skin deep. But the light that we have is inward, and works transformation into its own likeness. So there is here set forth the very loftiest conception of the Christian life as direct vision, universal, manifest to men, permanent, transforming. A. M.

Section 280.

2 CORINTHIANS iv. 1-14.

1 THEREFORE seeing we have this ministry, as we have received mercy, we faint not; but 2 have renounced the hidden things of dishonesty, not walking in craftiness, nor handling the word of God deceitfully; but by manifestation of the truth commending ourselves to 3 every man's conscience in the sight of God. But if our gospel be hid, it is hid to them that 4 are lost: in whom the god of this world hath blinded the minds of them which believe not, lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ, who is the image of God, should shine 5 unto them. For we preach not ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord; and ourselves your 6 servants for Jesus' sake. For God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the 7 face of Jesus Christ. But we have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellency of 8 the power may be of God, and not of us. We are troubled on every side, yet not distressed;
 9 we are perplexed, but not in despair; persecuted, but not forsaken; cast down, but not 10 destroyed; always bearing about in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus, that the life also 11 of Jesus might be made manifest in our body. For we which live are always delivered unto death for Jesus' sake, that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in our mortal 12 flesh. So then death worketh in us, but life in you. We having the same spirit of faith, 13 according as it is written, I believed, and therefore have I spoken; we also believe, and 14 therefore speak; knowing that he which raised up the Lord Jesus shall raise up us also by Jesus, and shall present us with you.

Nor only will our fellowship with Christ show itself in our characters, and beauty born of that communion "shall pass into our face," but we are also called on, as Paul puts it here, to make direct conscious efforts for the communication of the light which we behold. God hath shined in our hearts, that we might give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Christ Jesus. Away with all veils! No reserve, no fear of the consequences of plain speaking! Our power and our duty lie in the full exhibition of the truth. We are only clear from the blood of men when we make sure that if any of it be hid it is hid, not by reason of obscurity or silence on our parts, but only by reason of the blind eyes, before which the full-orbed radiance gleams in vain. All this is as true for every one possessing that universal prerogative of seeing the glory of Christ as it is for an apostle. The business of all such is to make known the name of Jesus; and, if from idleness, or carelessness, or selfishness, they shirk that plain duty, they are counteracting God's very purpose in shining on their hearts, and going far to quench the light which they darken. Then, Christian men and women, you are bound to manifest what you believe, and to make the secret of your lives, in so far as possible, an open secret. Show Him forth, not your own emotions about him. Self-respect and reverence for the sanctities of our deepest emotions forbid our proclaiming these from the house-tops. Let these be curtained from all eyes but God's, but let no folds hang before the picture of your Saviour that is drawn on your heart. See to it that you have the unveiled face turned toward Christ to be irradiated by His brightness, and the unveiled face turned toward men, from which shall shine every beam of the light which you have caught from your Lord. A. M.

1-4. The first two verses of this chapter contain the principles of the Christian ministry; they embrace its motives—a sense of mercy and a sense of hope; they declare its straightforwardness, its scorn of craft and secrecy, its rejection of pious frauds and adroit casuistry. The connection of these two verses with the third is through the word "every." For a reply suggested itself to Paul's mind from some objector: "Every man's conscience has not acknowledged the truth of the message, nor the heavenly sincerity of the messengers." To which the apostle answers, The exceptions do not weaken the truth of the general assertion; to every man whose heart is in a healthy state, to all but the blinded, the gospel is God's light; and those to whom it is not light are themselves dark, for the obscurity is in themselves and not in the truth. And then, having replied to this objection, Paul proceeds with the same subject, the apostolic ministry. F. W. R.

2. To every man's conscience. In the original structure of the soul there is an unwritten revelation which accords with the external revelation of Scripture. Within the depths of the heart there is a silent oracle which needs only to be rightly questioned to elicit from it a response in accordance with that voice which issues from the lively oracles of God. In one word, the appeal of Scripture to the unbiased conscience or consciousness of man is, in great part, direct, immediate, irresistible. Caird.—It can not be that the ministrations of the truth are powerless upon the conscience, or the appeals of the gospel without effect upon the mind. It can not be that the providence of God in vain seconds these ministrations, or to no purpose adds its enforcements to the truth. Experience has proved that uniformly in these circumstances thought is awakened, and feeling more or less deep is kindled, and that men have evidence within them of the reality of that mighty agency which works upon the mind and heart in connection with a preached gospel. E. M.

3. Here the same image of the veil is again recurred to. It ought to stand, "And even if our gospel is veiled, it is veiled to them that are perishing." A.—Instead of reading, "But if our gospel be hid, it is hid to them that are lost," we may read, without violating any of the rules of the language, "But if our gospel be hid, it is hid by these perishable objects, by which," etc. The same word is used by Christ when he urges that we labor not for meat which perisheth. There is no veil on the gospel as in the days of Moses. If there is any veiling, it is done by the god of this world interposing those "perishable objects" that he may secure the destruction of the soul. W. A.

4. These are strong words, but they are those of the Holy Ghost; and no words are too strong to represent the absence of all spiritual light in most of those who live amid the clear shining of Christian day. It is an incantation, and the illusory process is ascribed to the evil one. Part of the malady, and its most fearful symptom, is that the blind man does not know that he is blind. J. W. A.—An awful thought! "The light of the glorious gospel" is shut out by ourselves from our lives, apart even from immortality. For worldliness does not consist merely in distinct acts, nor in thoughts of transgression, but it is the spirit of a whole life, which hides all that is invisible, real, and eternal, because it is devoted to the visible, the transient, and the unreal. Christ and the world can not exist in the same heart. Men who find their all in the world—how can they, fevered by its business, excited by its pleasures, petrified by its maxims, see God in his purity, or comprehend the calm radiance of eternity? F. W. R.

5. A rush for your praise or dispraise of us! only receive Jesus Christ, and esteem highly of him, and it is enough. We preach not ourselves, says the apostle, but Christ Jesus the Lord. That is our errand, not to catch either at base gain or vain applause for ourselves, but to exalt our Lord Jesus in the hearts of men. L.—What Paul taught was not simply "God, man, nature, law, Supreme will, benevolent purpose, all right, right for everybody." Nor was it a sentimental Theism: "God, man, nature; love, beauty, trust, song; all safe, or very few having anything to fear." Nor was it a pure, simple, Christian Theism: "God, man, law, sin; a great prophet; a loving message; a verbal assurance; something said, taught; uttered in words, confirmed and ratified by miracle and martyrdom; a declaration and promise; repentance on one side, securing of itself forgiveness on the other." It was not these, or anything like these things. It might include something belonging to them all, but in itself it was something more. It was the assertion of a Divine act, not merely the assurance of the Divine disposition; a work done, not a thing said; something transacted, not uttered; something embodied in a person and a fact, not merely breathed forth and clothed in speech. It was a supernatural something, something done by God in raising up and sending forth a Christ; something done by the Christ as the sent of God. It was the manifested might of a Messiah, not merely the word or wisdom of a prophet, however inspired, and whatever he might reveal! T. B.

6. A more powerful figure of illustration could not be employed. The mind goes back to the sublime days of creation; to periods when no sun, moon, or stars beamed upon our chaotic globe, and then to the moment when light was born out of dread obscurity. Such was the utter darkness of the unrenewed soul; such is the work of grace. J. W. A.—The Gospel did not make God our Father; it revealed what He had ever been, is, and ever shall be; it disclosed him as a Father; and in the life of Christ the love of God has become intelligible to us. The Gospel threw light on God: light unknown before, even to the holiest hearts among the Jews. "Clouds and darkness are the habitation of his seat," spoke the Old Testament; "God is light, and in him is no darkness at all," declared the New. For out of Christ our God is only a dark, dim, and dreadful mystery. There is only an awful silence, which is never broken by an articulate voice. But all is brightness in the Redeemer's life and death. The Gospel threw light, too, upon man's own nature. Man—a dark enigma, a contradiction to himself, with Godlike aspirations and animal cravings—asks his own heart in terror, "Am I a god or beast?" And the Gospel answers: "You are a glorious temple in ruins, to be rebuilt into a habitation of God and the Spirit, your soul to be the home of the High and Holy One, your body to be the temple of the Holy Ghost." It threw light upon the grave; for "life and immortality" were "brought to light through the gospel." The darkness of the tomb was irradiated, and the things of that undiscovered land shone clear and tranquil then to the eye of faith; but not until then, for immortality before was but a mournful perhaps. F. W. R.

Shined in our hearts. The first touch is that of God. While he does no violence to freedom; while he conducts his greatest marvel in new creation according to the laws he has impressed on the human mind; while he draws by the bands of a man; while he allows the soul to move agreeably to vision of truth—it is God who begins. It is the same God who commanded the light to shine out of darkness that hath shined in our hearts. In the first motion our hearts have no activity. The irradiation is of God. The glory of God. A phrase which in Hebrew idiom brings along with it ideas of surpassing light, such as transfigured the high priest within the veil when it radiated from the cherubic propitiatory throne. Such splendor demands a curtain or a mirror to dim and modify the blaze of godhead, and this has been afforded in the humanity of the Son of God. From amidst the central and consuming disk of insufferable deity there smiles and weeps on us a brother's countenance. It is "the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ." Our eye confronts, not the absolute godhead, but the mirrored and subdued glory of incarnation. Let that face, in that glory, by that light, be once beheld, and sight melts into believing, faith expands into salvation. J. W. A.—If Christ and heaven do not fill the heart, the world and self will; no man can get self out but by letting Christ in; you can not possibly remove the darkness but by letting in the light; and where this heavenly light is not admitted to reign spiritual depravity and darkness will reign. G. B. C.

7. The great Head of the Church has ordained three grand repositories of his truth. In the Scriptures he has preserved it by his providence against all hostile attacks. In the hearts of Christians he has maintained it by the almighty energy of his Spirit, even under every outward token of general apostasy. And in the Christian ministry has he deposited "the treasure in earthen vessels" for the edification and enriching of the Church in successive ages. Bridges.—Christ's ministers are no more than earthen vessels, which derive their whole importance from the preciousness of the treasure which they contain; and this treasure has been put in such frail receivers for the very purpose of making it thereby the more manifest that the whole excellency of the power felt in preaching the gospel is of God and not of us. J. S. S.

8-10. On the one side we see feebleness, trembling, ignorance, perplexity, a dying body, earthen vessels; on the other side, strength, courage, the demonstration of the Spirit, the excellency of the power, the immortal life of Christ. In that contrast, made a personal experience in our Christian discipline, lie the trial of character, the ministry of temptation, the shame and splendor of the cross, and the victory of faith which overcometh the world. Something like this we are continually seeing, as the common working of God's Spirit, in the characters of men. Not one in fifty of those who have their hearts made alive and earnest for Christian service are led that way by increased prosperity, by high health, by having their own way, by any personal advantages whatever. How many there are who first take firmly hold of the everlasting Hand, when they have felt all around them in the dark and could find no other hand! F. D. H.

10. It is in vain for us to say that we are relying on Christ, unless Christ be in us, slaying the old man and quickening the new. The one test of true faith is the inward possession of the Lord's Spirit; and between the sacrifice on the cross and me the sinful man there is no real union effected, nor any imputation and transference of merits, unless with it, proof of it, and consequence of it—and proof of it because consequence of it—there be likewise the flowing over from the cross to me of the life that was in him and of the death that he died. A. M.

11. Paul could bear to look on his own decay; it was but the passing of the human; and, meantime, there was ever going on within him the strengthening of the Divine. Thus his own contracted, isolated existence was gone; it had been absorbed into communion with a higher life; it had been dignified by its union with the life of lives. Pain was sacred, since Christ had also suffered. Life became grand when viewed as a repetition of the life of Christ. The apostle lived, "always bearing about in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus, that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in" his "mortal flesh." F. W. R.

13. Spirituality is always fresh, always vital, always real. No soul that has been touched with the simple majesty of the Sermon on the Mount, that has sat at the feet of the truthful Jesus, that takes its spiritual draughts from that fountain of which if a man drink he shall never thirst again, can consent to affront the eternal veracity by offering as a plea for piety, or a prayer to the Father, a hollow phrase, a sanctimonious manner, a technical expostulation, a language caught from the ancient lips of faith, but emptied of all its living significance and dwindled now into the drivel of make-believe. Paul's justification of his apostleship, "I believed, and therefore have I spoken," is the only decent pretext for any preaching or any prayer. F. D. H.

Strong belief makes strong characters. We see this in common life. The man who clings to some great conviction, even though it be of error, becomes a man of energy. He has a hidden fire perpetually urging him to act. His motive power is sometimes wonderful to all beholders. Genuine belief propels its subject to a degree far beyond all that can be imitated by simulation and hypocrisy. The fixed idea is always driving on the wheels of fervid action. Men are strong and influential just so far as they have some immovable conviction, some urgent belief. And their strength lies in the precise direction of this their inward judgment. It ought to encourage every believer who has a strong conviction. Let the truth which lies within his breast be raised to a red heat, and its influence becomes decisive. Where the truths which animate him are grand truths—where he holds them with a grasp that nothing can disengage or relax—where his soul is steeped in them day and night—where he delights in them—communication follows spontaneously. Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh, the manner speaketh, the behavior speaketh, the very visage speaketh. A man full of faith and of the Holy Ghost sends forth influence at every pore. His whole body is full of light, which he radiates on every side. J. W. A.

Section 281.

2 CORINTHIANS iv. 15-18 ; v. 1-10.

15 For all things are for your sakes, that the abundant grace might through the thanksgiving of many redound to the glory of God. For which cause we faint not ; but though our 16 outward man perish, yet the inward man is renewed day by day. For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us 'a far more exceeding and eternal weight of 17 glory : while we look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen : for the things which are seen are temporal ; but the things which are not seen are 18 eternal. For we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have 1 a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. For in this we 2 groan, earnestly desiring to be clothed upon with our house which is from heaven : if so be
3 that being clothed we shall not be found naked. For we that are in this tabernacle do
4 groan, being burdened ; not for that we would be unclothed, but clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life. Now he that hath wrought us for the selfsame thing
5 is God, who also hath given unto us the earnest of the spirit. Therefore we are always confident, knowing that, whilst we are at home in the body, we are absent from the Lord : (for 6 we walk by faith, not by sight :) we are confident, I say, and willing rather to be absent
7 from the body, and to be present with the Lord. Wherefore we labour, that, whether present
8 or absent, we may be accepted of him. For we must all appear before the judgment seat 9 of Christ ; that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he 10 hath done, whether it be good or bad.

BEFORE every man, on his right hand and on his left, thronging, clamorous, and importunate, are the things "seen and temporal" ; those single facts, those special occasions which urge themselves upon his regard, but always with a false argument, because it is a partial argument. But there are also within the knowledge of every man more or less distinctly the things "unseen and eternal," or those universal and unalterable truths which must in the end rule his destiny for the better or the worse. To follow and to comply with the solicitations of the things "seen and temporal" is, in all cases, and with an infallible certainty, to go on toward damage, overthrow, misery. Nothing can avert the ruin, nothing dissolve the connection between the course and its issue, if that course be persisted in. But, on the contrary, to draw our motives from those principles that are universal, "unseen and eternal" is to follow a road which, by a like infallible necessity, leads to perfection and felicity. The line of truth and virtue is always (find it where we may) a line drawn from the circumference to the center ; and to no other center than that of the divine purity and blessedness. Scriptures, by a multitude of intelligible decisions, adapted to all occasions, distinguish between the things seen and temporal and those that are unseen and eternal ; and to take them always as our directory is to walk upon a path which, whether rugged or smooth, overshadowed or illuminated, shall bring us at length to immortality and joy. I. T.

15. The teaching of Christ contemplated the coming of a day for his disciples in which many things should be said to them which they could not bear then. In the later teaching that day is come. At first they are taught as those who are with Jesus, afterward as those who are in Christ. They know now that he is in the Father, and they in him, and he in them. When that consciousness is given, a standing-point is reached from which new worlds of thought may be surveyed. They are surveyed in the Epistles, and there the chosen teachers spread before us the unsearchable riches of Christ. They say to us, "Of him are ye in Christ Jesus"; and they show us what that state implies, of capacities, possessions, responsibilities, duties, and destinies; of relations to God and man, of connection with things in earth and things in heaven. They show that to produce and to perfect this state are the ends of the preaching of the word, of the institution of the sacraments, of the ordinance of the ministry, of the life and order of the Church; yea, of the divine government of the world, and of all that bears on human history: "All things are for your sakes." T. D. B.

16. By "the outward man" is meant the body—the body with its physical, organic, natural life. "The inward man" is not the soul merely—the spiritual part of our constitution as distinct from the material—it is that, as animated by that new and divine life which belongs to the regenerate. "The inward man is renewed day by day." This language not only implies that daily or regular renewal is needed, but that it can be had, and that it is the will of Christ that it should be had. There is a daily waste of spiritual energy which makes necessary to us a daily renewal. The Christian is not only called to duty and service which may in one sense invigorate while in another they exhaust; he is exposed to temptations which may suddenly take him at an advantage, to perils and dangers which he may not always pass through unhurt. All this occasions a sense of exhaustion, which needs to be met by a fresh supply of Divine strength. Every new day brings with it its demand for service, and its exposures to peril. The grace of yesterday will not do for to-day; the strength of yesterday was needed for itself, and was expended, we may hope, in doing whatever the day required. It will not be possible to meet the demands of a new morning in the wasted condition in which the man may have been left on the preceding night. Hence the force of the apostle's expression, and its beauty also, in presenting us with the idea of the renewal of the inward man day by day. T. B.

As a man does not make himself spiritually alive, so neither can he keep himself so. He can feed on spiritual food, and so preserve his spiritual strength;

he can walk in the commandments of the Lord, and so enjoy rest and peace; but still the inner life is dependent upon the Spirit as much for its after existence as for its first begetting. C. H. S.—That divine fire kindled within them is daily refining and sublimating them. Life from their Lord is still flowing and causing them grow, abating the power of sin, strengthening a fainting faith, quickening a languishing love, teaching the soul the ways of wounding strong corruptions and fortifying its weak graces; yea, in wonderful ways, raising them by their falls, and strengthening them by their very troubles; working them up to humility and vigilance, and sending them to Christ for strength by the experience of their weaknesses and failings. L.—This remains the law of life: daily renewal. Where no renewal of the Holy Ghost takes place, there the hand of faith is a withered hand, which can neither hold the old grace nor grasp the new; there tears of repentance are at best but tears of duty, or of a self-righteous deception of the soul. Ye who go about with the withered hand of faith and the dying fire of love, ye have neglected the law of life—daily renewal. A. C.

17. Paul recounts his manifold trials as things that had done him good, wherein he only gloried. In the full strength and at the lofty height of his joyous Christian life he speaks of these tribulations as working out present Christian graces and future Christian glories—as if from the very gate of heaven, casting a brief glance downward upon all that troublous sea of conflict and agony, "These light afflictions which are but for a moment!" and then lifting his eyes upward, crying, "That far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." C. W.—These sufferings are but temporary, nay, but momentary, this glory eternal. What heart is big enough to comprehend the full sense of these words? How might I dwell upon every syllable, light affliction, weighty glory, exceeding weight; affliction for a moment, eternal weight of glory! Howe.—The glory above is true real glory, and bears weight, and so bears aright the name of glory, which in the Hebrew signifies weight; and the apostle's expression seems to allude to that sense. Speaking of this same glory to come, he calls it a far more excellent weight of glory. It weighs down all labor and sufferings in the way, so far that they are not worth the speaking of in respect of it. Other glory is over-spoke, but this glory, over-glorious to be duly spoke, it exceeds and rises above all that can be spoke of it. L.

Afflictions speak convincingly. Many a poor Christian is sometimes bending his thoughts to wealth, or flesh-pleasing, or applause, and so loses his relish of Christ and the joy above, till God break in upon his riches, or children, or conscience, or health, and break down his mountain which he thought so strong. And then, when he lieth in Manasseh's fetters, or is fastened to his bed with pining sickness, the world is nothing, and heaven is something. If our dear Lord did not put these thorns under our head, we should sleep out our lives, and lose our glory. Baz.—Our afflictions work out blessing for us, not only because there is laid up a reward for the afflicted according to the measure of affliction, but because afflictions make the heart more deep, more experimental, more knowing and profound, and so more able to hold and contain more. Bun.

18. Not at the things seen. The apostle looks not on the things that are temporal, even while admiring the display in them of God's invisible and eternal realities. He looks on them only as seeing through ; uses them only as a medium of training, exercise, access unto God. Their value to him is not in what they are but in what they signify. Thus it is a true use of things temporal, that they are to put us under the constant all-dominating impression of things eternal. And we are to live in them, as in a transparency, looking through, every moment, and in all life's works and ways, acting through, into the grand reality-world of the life to come. H. B.—At the things not seen. The man like Paul that admits and believes in a world of truth and duty and spiritual reality, who converses daily with the invisible and the eternal ; a man to whom all the material universe is but a glass through which the soul reads lessons of hope and faith and love ; one whose eye ranges beyond the horizon of time and sense, and takes in an infinite prospect ; one who sinks the body into subservience to the spirit, and who makes all the experience of life, its pains and pleasures, toil and rest, trials and triumphs, help to the development of a holy life and preparation for final blessedness : such a one is carrying out God's plan in his education. He looks to things that are unseen. E. H. G.

Things not seen are eternal. If there be anything in the world eternal, then that which is perishable, even though it may last for many years or many ages, must become infinitely insignificant in comparison. Conceive of things eternal, and we are at once in the presence of God. There is a love and there is a work which shall not pass away—a love which may be felt daily ; a work which may be done daily. Surely we do not live without loving some one ; but all our love, pure as it is, will certainly pass away if we do not love God. Certainly there will be a time when those who do not love God will love no one at all, nor be loved by any one. Nor do we live without doing something ; nor yet, even the happiest of us, without having something to bear. A work of infinite vanity, a suffering of endless increase, unless we work in Christ, and bear with Christ and for Christ and through Christ ; but a work never to perish, a suffering yielding a multiplied harvest of blessing, if we work and suffer as the heirs of life eternal ; if we firmly believe that there are things which shall not pass away. T. A.

1. "House of this tabernacle" should be "tabernacle wherein we dwell." The introduction of the word "house" here sadly mars the imagery. The apostle was a tent-maker ; and the tents were made of the Cilician haircloth, which was also used for clothing. Hence the mingling of the images of dwelling and clothing, which in our version is unintelligible, because we do not wear the materials of which houses are built. "Of God" should be "from God." And after "eternal" a comma should be placed. A.

1-4. Is it not as easy to raise the dead as to make heaven, and earth, and all—of nothing ? Look not on the dead bones, and dust, and difficulty, but at the promise. Let us lie down in peace and take our rest ; it will not be an everlasting night nor endless sleep. If unclothing be the thing thou fearest, it is that thou mayest have better clothing. If to be turned out of doors be the thing thou fearest, remember that when the earthly house is dissolved thou hast a building of God, eternal in the heavens. Baz.—If these things were apprehended and laid hold on, Christ made ours, and the first resurrection manifest in us, were we quickened by his Spirit to newness of life, certainly there would not be a more welcome and refreshing thought, nor a sweeter discourse to us, than that of death ; and no matter for the kind of it. Welcome shall that day be, that day of deliverance ! To be out of this woful prison, I regard not at what door I go out, being at once freed from so many deaths, and let in to enjoy Him who is my life. L.—Let dissolution come when it will, it can do the Christian no harm ; for it will be but only a passage out of a prison into a palace ; out of trouble into rest ; to an innumerable company of true, loving, and faithful friends ; into exceeding great and eternal glory. Bun.

If the grave is becoming populous, so is the region of life and light beyond its confines. That better land in one sense is becoming less and less unknown. The distance diminishes as the avenues are multiplying, along which throng holy desires, earnest sympathies, longing aspirations. That is not the world of doubts and phantoms. It is by eminence the land of life and of conscious existence. Its happy shores are even now thronged by earthly natures, perfected in love, happy in final exemption from sin ; who still, from the very necessity of the sympathizing remembrances with which their bosoms overflow, cast down looks of loving solicitude to their old friends and companions, and would, if it were possible, break the mysterious silence, and utter audible voices of encouragement, and reach forth signals of welcome. These, in the view of faith, are undoubted realities, facts which have a stable foundation, truths most comprehensive and fruitful. The contemplation of these realities serves to give new vigor to faith, a fresh reality to that communion of which Christ is the source and the center; to enable one to feel that, however weak and unworthy he may be, he is still a citizen of a mighty commonwealth, an inmate of an imperial household, connected by bonds over which chance and time and death have no power, with those who are now pillars in the temple of God. B. B. E.

6. Absent from the Lord. If you have indeed laid Christ, God-man, for your foundation, then you do lay the hope of your felicity and joy on this, that the Son of Mary is now absent from his children in his person and humanity, making intercession for them and for thee in the presence of his Father. And the reason that thou canst rejoice hereat is, because thou hast not only heard of it with thine ear, but dost enjoy the sweet hope and faith of it in thy heart; which hope and faith are begotten by the Spirit of Christ. Bun.

7. We all of us either live by faith or by sight; either upon things heavenly or things earthly. If upon the former, let us go forward; on the word of a God, everlasting glory is before us. But if upon the latter, alas, our store will be soon exhausted! A. Fuller.—Not by sight. Not yet, not yet can we behold face to face! Few eyes have seen deeper into God's majestic disclosures than those piercing ones that looked out from under the dark Hebrew brow of the Christian historian, Neander. But this was the motto that he kept inscribed on his study wall, making his library to open upward into heaven: "Now we see through a glass darkly, but then face to face." F. D. H.—After all, faith is life. Sight is royalty; but in order to reign, and before reigning, it is necessary to live; and sight is glory and felicity only to him to whom long before seeing it has been given to believe. A. V.—We read that death shall be swallowed up in victory, but never that faith shall be swallowed up in sight. So far is this from being the case, that in reality the sight which the soul shall enjoy in heaven will only prepare it for the exercise of still greater faith, and faith must continue to be the life of the soul for ever. Faith will indeed cease in regard to certain things, of which there will be experience. But that absolute knowledge, for which the soul is prepared by a life of faith here, is to be the ground, in connection with this precious discipline, of still higher faith hereafter. G. B. C.

8. We are confident. There is such a thing as Christian assurance. We may not feel it; but we must not lower the standard of Christian attainment to suit our narrow lives. To Paul, ever on the brink of that world to come, his own immortality of blessedness was no peradventure. It was not a matter of doubt with him whether he was Christ's or not. F. W. R.—Surely the walk through the earthly life is very calm and peaceful when one has nothing to fear, but everything to hope; when by faith the sting is taken from death, by the fear of which countless men are slaves for their whole life; when the natural dread of this great, wondrous event is swallowed up in the joyful courage of Christian hope, which sees in death only a birth into a more perfect life. Those who long for home know that to them beyond death life is made sure, in communion with Him who says to his disciples: "Because I live, ye shall live also." Yes, "we are always confident," whether in life or in death. With calm longing, our glance rests upon the blessed home which lies before us, and life appears to us peaceful, and death sweet. The thorns of our pilgrim-path no longer wound us, and the entrance to the Father's house is no more narrow and fearful. The waste blooms into a garden of the Lord, and the dark valley becomes a light, lovely path. With refreshing peace within, praising God with heart and mouth, we joyfully walk toward the beloved home. Muller.

9. Wherefore we labor. Men intensely conscious of their own heavenly immortality, and profoundly in love with it, will act with an inextinguishable earnestness in behalf of fellow-men destined also to live for ever; in behalf of fellow-men under an eternal government; invested with eternal duties; constructed for eternal purity; susceptible of eternal happiness; exposed to eternal woes. What ardor of zeal and action, what pressure of responsibility attends the man who knows he is doing now, and is constantly to do hereafter, eternal deeds in behalf of eternal spirits. He is in fact, and he feels himself to be, an associate worker with the Deity, in a sphere crowded with objects immeasurable and interests unending and infinite. His whole great soul is given to the Lord's service. White.

10. We must all appear. The words should be rendered, "we must all be manifested before the judgment-seat of Christ"—a far more searching thought. If we were to employ a homely expression and say, "turned inside out," it would exactly express the intention of Paul: all that is inward now, and thus hidden, becoming outward then; all secret things searched out; every mask stripped off; every disguise torn away; whatever any man's work has been, that day declaring it; for it shall be eminently a day of unveiling, or drawing back the veil which now covers and conceals so much. It shall be a day of revelation, in respect of the hidden things of glory and of shame. T.

In the body. It is not for what we have done (taking the word in its literal meaning) that we shall be judged, but for what we have willed, in other words, done internally; that is, for the actions of our soul. It is not said that we shall receive according to what we have done with our body, but according to what we shall have done being in the body. But in every case it is the internal action which will be judged, the heart which will be sifted. A. V.

Good or bad. As sin is sin, everywhere and in all forms, the respectable and the unrespectable, the same in principle, and, when the appearances are different, the same often in criminality, the world of future retribution must, of course, be a world of strange companionships. We are expressly told, and it seems a matter of reason also to suppose, that the spirits of guilty men will not be assorted there by their tastes, but by their character and demerits. Death is the limit and end of all mere conventionalities. The fictitious assortments of the earthly state never pass that limit. Rank, caste, fashion, disgust, fastidiousness, delicacy of sin—these are able to draw their social lines no longer. Proximity now is held to the stern, impartial principle of inward demerit, that all may receive according to the deeds done in the body. This is the level of adjustment, and there appears to be no other. H. B.— If the government of Jesus Christ over men is to be revealed on that day, it is clear that all men without exception must be judged. So linked, indeed, is the history of each man with that of others; so necessarily is each man's condition and character affected by that of all who have gone before him, up to his first parents; so truly do all human beings make up one race, one family, from the life of each being more or less connected with that of all, that the knowledge of the real history of even one man almost implies an examination into the real history of the whole human race. N. M.

The Scriptures do not deal much in elaborate descriptions of that great Day of reckoning, or of the sufferings beyond. What they are earnest to have us all know, and feel, and remember, is, that there is a reckoning, and that the justice and love of the Son of God and Son of man will control and guide it. What they would make certain to us is that our everlasting life is in actual peril from our daily temptations, that the Judge is just, and that there can be no change in his judgment. Grounded in these certainties, their one entreaty is, "Be ye ready." F. D. H.

Section 282.

2 CORINTHIANS v. 11-21.

11 KNOWING therefore the terror of the Lord, we persuade men; but we are made manifest 12 unto God; and I trust also are made manifest in your consciences. For we commend not ourselves again unto you, but give you occasion to glory on our behalf, that ye may have 13 somewhat to answer them which glory in appearance, and not in heart. For whether we 14 be beside ourselves, it is to God: or whether we be sober, it is for your cause. For the love of Christ constraineth us; because we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were 15 all dead: and that he died for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him which died for them, and rose again. Wherefore henceforth know we 16 no man after the flesh: yea, though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now hence-17 forth know we him no more. Therefore if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature:
 18 old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new. And all things are of God, who hath reconciled us to himself by Jesus Christ, and hath given to us the ministry of 19 reconciliation; to wit, that God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself, not im-puting their trespasses unto them; and hath committed unto us the word of reconciliation.
 20 Now then we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us: we pray 21 you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God. For he hath made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in him.

To be reconciled to God! It is necessarily the first and greatest want of all his intelligent and immortal creatures who are in any way alienated from him. It is, as human history testifies, the vague, but real and imperative, longing of human nature itself, underlying all others more permanent than they. All systems of heathenism, with their sacrifices and penances, their instituted priesthoods, their costly offerings, their destroying pilgrimages, their smoking piles and bloody immolations, are built at the base on this desire: to be reconciled to God! A sense of severance and remoteness from God, a vague impression of responsive repellency and condemnation on his part—this is at the bottom of all the unrest, the fearful apprehension, the dark anticipation, the swaying back and forth of religious opinion, oscillating for ever between skepticism and superstition, which confront us in history. And this each man will find for himself, in his own moral consciousness, as he calmly considers it, or lets it frankly and freely speak. It is, then, the instant suggestion of reason, it is the imperative mandate of prudence, that we should seek in some way at once, and in some sufficient and authorized way, to be "reconciled" to God. It is death to be at war with him! death certain, remediless, perfect, fearful! and, as it is the one infinite evil and mischief to be in any way dis severed from him, so to be in heart affiliated with God, to feel his strength, wisdom, and grace flowing in upon us, and filling our souls as with rivers of peace, every mind must instinctively recognize that as the highest possible attainment of our nature, in which that nature is consummated and crowned, made free of the world, supreme above chance, and ready for immortality! R. S. S.

In these verses the conclusion is drawn which the earlier verses had introduced—the high and self-denying position of the Christian ministry, and the nature of its work as a reconciliation of man to God. A.

The terror of the Lord. God hates sin as much as his awful threatenings say he does; and they who deny it deny the God of heaven. They deny his holiness, his real abhorrence of sin. They exhibit a false God to the human mind—a God without principle, a God without character. Such a God on the throne of the universe, and every angel would drop his harp, every devil shout in ecstasy. The bands of God's moral dominion would be broken, the pillars of eternal justice would fall, and heaven fall with them; the fires of hell burst forth unchecked, and rebellion stand triumphant on the ruins. Such is not the God of heaven. N. W. T.

Persuade men. We should expect that this loving Lord and Master, who knows so well what is in man, would present not a part but all of the grand motives that constrain men to newness of life, to repentance and faith, to the conquest of self, and the glory of goodness; and therefore that he would sometimes take away the veil from the misery and horror that belong to the second death; that he would bid his servants sometimes call men to "flee from the wrath to come," and by "the terrors of the Lord"—of the Lord—to persuade men; that he would show that God has not forgotten to be just, because he has not forgotten to be gracious, but that he governs the world by law—blessed and righteous law—which is "the mother of our peace and joy," just as truly now as before the gospel pity and redemption came. So He came, testifying of the judgment to come, of the sifting and separating, and shutting doors, and sundering of soul from soul, and opening of the house of torment, and punishment everlasting. Let us at least receive our Master's words as they stand. And, since we must all stand before his judgment-seat, he has told us beforehand, so that, repenting and believing, we might stand there with joy—not with grief—to pass from it to the right hand, and not the left, of the Son of man in his glory, our Shepherd and our King. F. D. H.

To speak efficaciously of the holiness and justice of Almighty God and of its future consequences—to speak in modesty, tenderness, and power of the approaching doom of the impenitent—must be left to those whose spirits have had much communion with the dread majesty on high. As the punishment of sin springs by an ineffable harmony from the first principles of the Divine Nature, and infringes not at all upon benevolence, so must he who would rightly speak of that punishment have attained to a far more intimate perception of the coincidence of holiness and love than language can convey, or that can be made the subject of communication between man and man. As often as we set foot upon the region which sin has replenished with terrors, we have need of all the strength we can derive from the very firmest convictions. Fatal to his influence as reprovcr of sin must be a lurking skepticism in the breast of the public teacher. No care will avail to conceal the inward misgiving of the mind. The tongue of the speaker will falter, and the reserve, the indecision, the vagueness of his manner, or, still more, his artificial vehemence, will betray the secret of his doubts; and the infection of these doubts will pass into the heart of the hearer, and will serve to harden each transgressor in his impenitence. Not less necessary to the minister of truth is an unaffected, sensitive compassion toward his fellow-men—a compassion of that efficient kind which nothing has ever produced in the world but the gospel. The servant of heaven can execute his commission only so far as he gains access to the human heart; and there is no other path of access, no other law of affinity, no sympathy, but that of love. The compassions of man have a special property, which imparts pathos and persuasion to the awful announcement of God's displeasure against sin. The end of all reproof is mercy. If there were no redemption at hand, it were idle or cruel to talk of judgment. But the reprovcr is the very same as the herald of peace, and must draw his arguments, whether of terror or entreaty, from his own blended conviction of the certainty of the future punishment, and the reality of the means of escape. I. T.

12. The false teachers gloried "in appearance," in outward demonstration, such as eloquence, or they prided themselves in a superabundance of spiritual gifts. Paul says that the true apostolic credentials are those of the heart; and accordingly the proofs he had given were his truth, his sufferings, his persuasiveness, his simplicity, his boldness, and his life as being an image of Christ's. F. W. R.

14. "The love of Christ" should have been expressed "Christ's love." It is not our love to Christ, but His to us which is spoken of. "The love of Christ" may mean this, but is ambiguous. "Then all were dead" should be "then all died." It does not follow, because one dies for another, that that other was dead, but it does follow that that other died by substitution, virtually died, inasmuch as one died for him. And thus we all died in Christ's death for us. A.—Under the law the great argument for obedience was God's sovereignty: "Thus and thus ye shall do"; "I am the Lord." Now, the argument is gratitude—God's love—God's love in Christ. "The love of Christ constraineth us." Paul often persuades by that motive, "Be God's servants for Christ's sake." T. M.—It is not our limited and weak love to God which gives us confidence, which casts out all fear, which begets hope, that maketh not ashamed, and which is the constraining power of our life; it is God's love to us which dwells in us, the infinite and eternal love of the Father through the self-sacrifice of the Son, revealed and imparted by the coequal Spirit. A. S.

15. Shall we think that faith will leave him who by it has received Christ to be as unconcerned as a stock or stone, or that its utmost excellency is to provoke the soul to a lip-labor, and to give Christ a few fair words for his pains and grace? No, no; the love of Christ to us constraineth us thus to judge that it is but reasonable since he gave his all for us that we should give our some for him. Bun.—To gaze on the great Sufferer must be for all hearts that are not utterly hard and dull to learn a higher unselfishness, a lowlier humility, a severer standard of Christian life. Jesus Christ did not die upon the cross that we might lead a self-seeking life, whether by indulging our lower appetites, or by wasting intellectual power upon subjects which, however gratifying to ourselves, achieve nothing for the honor of God or for the good of men. Only when we devote ourselves according to our measure to God's glory, and to the enlightening or cheering or supporting our brethren, do we enter into the practical spirit of our Lord's death. Self-renouncement is the temper of which his death was the highest expression. H. P. L.—His cross teaches us, not that each one is to be looking out for a selfish salvation, but that self is to be forgotten in hearty consecration to Him, and in free service to our brethren. It carries us clear of the belittling notions of escaping hell as a punishment or earning heaven as a reward. It makes the lofty sentiment of gratitude the mainspring of piety, faith the pure inspiration of righteousness, love the sacred secret of beneficence. F. D. H.

16. Though He was "of the seed of David," by genealogy a Jew, that he might be the Messiah ("for salvation is of the Jews"), now that he is "declared to be the Son of God with power," and

"appears in the presence of God for us," henceforth we know him as a Jew no more. He is of no nation, for "he died for all." The world is redeemed. The Christ of God was "a ransom for all." All nations are equal. "In him let the Gentiles trust." T. B.—"If I go not away," said the Saviour before he ascended, "the Spirit can not come"; if he be away, then, the Spirit is in the Church; the absence of the one is the presence of the other. Let me rather say that there is no absence, no distance, no departure, no separation! Christ Himself is one with his own Spirit, and with him templed in the heart of his mystic body. As Paul declares, we "know him no longer after the flesh"—we know him not by sensible perception or miraculous vision, but by a deeper, a better, an inward and abiding sense. W. A. B.

17. In Christ a new creature. When it is said that in Emmanuel God is with us, it is meant that his very nature is wrought into our nature, if in faith we receive Him, and ours into His. F. D. H.—Wherever the birth is, the life will more or less follow, and wherever the new life shows itself, the new birth must in some way have preceded it. Repentance is the look which such a man casts backward, contrition is the turning of his eye within, and the setting of his life upon a new basis, or what is termed sanctification, is his aim as he looks forward. Humility, and self-distrust, and dependence on God, and endeavor after an obedience not of the letter but of the spirit, and not of fear but gratitude, will be some of the features which mark this life. Ker.

18. Reconciled us to himself. It is by personal faith in his Son; a faith which each is competent to exercise; a faith which hath in it submission and sympathy; which leads us to devote ourselves entirely to Christ, and which carries us spontaneously into all such actions as we know will be dear and beautiful to him. This is the power, this the act, by which, through Christ, we are "reconciled to God." We are thenceforth, whether we ourselves are at once and fully aware of it or not—from that moment onward, if the faith has been a real one, the submission complete, we are the friends, the children of God; his children and heirs; partakers of his favor, and expectants of his home! R. S. S.

19. The Redeemer's work took its peculiar form as much to meet the feelings of the human heart as to meet the requirements of God's justice and truth. Our feelings toward God are naturally those of distrust and opposition, and that simply because we are sinners; and these feelings must be mastered before we can be saved; and they must be mastered by an unequivocal, overwhelming demonstration of love; and we have it in the cross, for there "God is in Christ, reconciling man unto Himself." E. M.—Christ crucified is voluntarily devoted and accursed. He is paying the penalty which sin inevitably merits. He is reconciling sinful man to a holy, loving, but offended God. The truth which underlies and illuminates the apostolical language is the truth of our Saviour's Godhead. "It is," says Hooker, "the Son of God condemned, the Son of God, and no other person, crucified; which only one point of Christian belief, the infinite worth of the Son of God, is the very ground of all things believed concerning life and salvation, by that which Christ either did or suffered as man in our behalf." H. P. L.—God in Christ reaches down to help, save us; only asking that we, by love and faith to the Saviour, and corresponding or outflowing faithful moral effort, will let ourselves be saved. The gospel is an offer from above us. It is a divine interposition of deliverance embodied in a Divine Redeemer. If Christ were only man, he could not mediate between man and God. If he were only God, he could not mediate between God and man. Here is the eternal, inherent necessity of the mystery of the Incarnation, reaching back before Abraham was, into the bosom of the Everlasting Father, and there deriving the purchase-power to lift humanity to heaven. The vital point of the whole Christian system is the inspiring contact it establishes between the life of God and the life of man by a mediating Christ; a Christ qualified to mediate by bringing over the forces of the almighty Spirit to reinvigorate the wasted spirituality of the race, to restore and comfort the individual soul that will receive him. F. D. H.

20. The gospel may be described in two sentences: GOD IS RECONCILED, FOR MAN IS REDEEMED. God is reconciled, not because sin is made light of or forgotten, but because it has been expiated at an infinite cost in the person of his only-begotten Son. The gospel is the good news of the reconciliation to all men everywhere; and the men who are commissioned to declare it to their fellows convey the word of reconciliation, praying men in Christ's stead to be reconciled to God. A. W. T.—It was Christ's work to reconcile God to man. That is done, and done for ever. "By one offering He hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified." So far, then, as we represent anything besides this as necessary, so far do we frustrate it, and turn the Christian ministry into a sacrificial priesthood. We are doing as did the Galatians of old. Therefore the whole work of the Christian ministry consists in declaring God as reconciled to man, and in beseeching with every variety of illustration, and every degree of earnestness, men to become reconciled to God. F. W. R.

This is the marvel, that peace has been made by

God himself, though justly offended, yet beseeching us. "For we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us." What is this? Has He been outraged, and yet does He beseech us? Yes, for he is God, and therefore he beseeches us as a benignant Father. And see what happens; the Son of Him that beseeches us—not a man, not an angel, nor an archangel, nor a servant of any kind, is the Mediator Chrys.—God is suppliant to his creature. He who agonized beneath created hands—still, in the perpetuated spirit of that miraculous love, as it were protracts his own humiliation, and beseeches the beings he has made to make him happy by making themselves blessed. It is his highest glory to conciliate divine omnipotence with the unimpaired freedom of man, that "his people" should be "willing in the day of his power." His offer is universal, for he would be absolved before heaven and earth when that offer is despised. W. A. B.

21. Made sin for us. As we stand in spirit by the side of the sleeping disciples, and watch their suffering Lord; as we hear him cry from the cross, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? we feel we are entering into the communion of a deeper and more mysterious sorrow than the world has ever known, which becomes bright with an awful meaning then, and only then, when we recognize in it the reality of a Divine sacrifice for the sins of the world; the offering up of Him, who "though He knew no sin, yet was made sin for us, that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him." Tulloch.—How was Christ made sin? There is no other explanation conceivable than that of saying that the sin of the world was imputed to Him, or, which amounts to the same thing, that the word sin is here, as elsewhere, equivalent to sin-offering: Christ was made a sin-offering for us. This sin-offering turns away that wrath of God which had thrown sinners to an infinite distance from him. It is called a propitiation: "If any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous; and he is the propitiation for our sins." E. M. G.

Made the righteousness of God in him. What is ours passes over to him; what is his passes over to us. We become righteousness! As if, from the moment that we believe God's testimony to the righteous one and his work, we and righteousness become one and the same thing. So completely are we justified, and lifted up into the same righteous level or standing which the righteous one himself occupies in the sight of God. Thus are we "complete in him," "found in him," recognized as one with him in righteousness, and entitled to possess all he possesses. Bonar.

19-21. This is one of the happiest summaries on record of the gospel; of the true character of the ministry; and of the manner in which this ministry should be exercised. Precious gospel ! a reconciling God in Christ. Solemn ministry ! ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech by us. Touching discharge of our high function ! pleading with men, for Christ's sake, to be reconciled to him, against whom they have rebelled, but who yet seeks to cover them, through faith in the Crucified, with the rich robe of his own perfect righteousness. 2 CORINTHIANS vi. 1-18 ; vii. 1.

- 1 WE then, as workers together with him, beseech you also that ye receive not the grace 2 of God in vain. (For he saith, I have heard thee in a time accepted, and in the day of salvation have I succoured thee : behold, now is the accepted time ; behold, now is the day of salvation.)
- 3 Giving no offence in any thing, that the ministry be not blamed : but in all things approv-
4 ing ourselves as the ministers of God, in much patience, in afflictions, in necessities, in dis-
5 tresses, in stripes, in imprisonments, in labors, in watchings, in fastings ; by 6 pureness, by knowledge, by longsuffering, by kindness, by the Holy Ghost, by love un-
7 feigned, by the word of truth, by the power of God, by the armour of righteousness on the 8 right hand and on the left, by honour and dishonour, by evil report and good report : as de-9 ceivers, and yet true ; as unknown, and yet well known ; as dying, and, behold, we live ; as 10 chastened, and not killed ; as sorrowful, yet always rejoicing ; as poor, yet making many rich ; as having nothing, and yet possessing all things.
- 11 O ye Corinthians, our mouth is open unto you, our heart is enlarged. Ye are not strait-12 ened in us, but ye are straitened in your own bowels. Now for a recompense in the same,
13 (I speak as unto my children,) be ye also enlarged. Be ye not unequally yoked together 14 with unbelievers : for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness ? and what 15 communion hath light with darkness ? And what concord hath Christ with Belial ? or 16 what part hath he that believeth with an infidel ? And what agreement hath the temple of God with idols ? for ye are the temple of the living God ; as God hath said, I will dwell in 17 them, and walk in them ; and I will be their God, and they shall be my people. Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean 18 thing ; and I will receive you, and will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and 1 daughters, saith the Lord Almighty. Having therefore these promises, dearly beloved, let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God.

HAVING glanced from the earthly tabernacle to the "house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens," from the "light affliction" befalling the "outward" man that faints and perishes to the "eternal weight of glory" yet invisible, showing how, in every soul that is new-created in Christ Jesus, "mortality is swallowed up of life," because that "inward man is renewed day by day," and then setting forth the mighty motive to that conversion, viz., that "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself," he comes at last to that close point in the process where he defines the essential contradiction between the spiritual and the earthly man. By a succession of quick, sharp questions, the sword of his doctrine cuts asunder the sophistry which would mix up worldly self-will with Christian consecration, and shows the world to be made up of two sorts of persons. "What fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness ? What part hath he that believeth with an infidel ?" And then, the crowning conclusion : "Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, and touch not the unclean thing, saith the Lord" ; for it is this, "Thus saith the Lord," that seals the promise. "And I will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty." . . . In order to a Christian position there must be a special act—an act so personal, positive, and comprehensive, that it determines on which side of one fixed line the rest of our actions shall stand. You may call it by whatever name bears most significance to your own mind. The Scriptures furnish as great a variety as you can desire : "renewal of the mind," "conversion," "believing on the Lord Jesus Christ," "getting a new heart and spirit," "putting off the works of darkness and putting on the armor of light," "forsaking idols," "coming out and being separate"—these are the Biblical terms for a single fact. What is essential is that conscious choice of the soul by which it gathers up its powers and resolves—God's grace helping it, as He ever will help—to be on Christ's side in this fronting of armies and this awful battle of our life. F. D. H.

1. Workers together with him. These words seem to express the idea of true labor, such as God calls us to, and in the doing of which there is a great reward. They imply that the living God has a work to do on earth, in men and by men; that in this work he has—if I may so express it—a deep personal interest, because it is one worthy of himself, and for the advancement of his own glory, and the good and happiness of man. And it is only when we know God's work on earth, and when, from a will and character brought into harmony with his, we see how excellent the work is, that we can be, not laborers only, but "fellow-laborers" with God; not workers only, but workers together with him. N. M.—God does not need our help. Why then does he put us to the trouble of working for him, why put us to the strain of giving for him, why put us to the long endurance of patiently planning and waiting that we may accomplish his design? Because thus he develops us. The man who has wrought and planned and endured for the accomplishment of God's plan in the world sees the greatness of it, the divinity and glory of it, and is himself more perfectly assimilated to it. R. S. S.

There is a special ministry of the word, beginning with the apostles, descending from them to those who are now preachers of righteousness, and destined to endure to the end of time. But there is also a wider ministry of the universal brotherhood of believers. We are all of us ambassadors of Christ. Just so soon as we are brought, by the grace of God, to a saving knowledge of the gospel, we are called to be dispensers of it to others; taking first those who are nearest to us, but pausing not till we have touched the farthest boundaries of the globe. In these Christian cities there is a frightful waste of heathenism weltering at our very feet. We must subdue it to the cross of Christ. Over the seas are millions of heathen, darkening the continents. To them also must we send the light of life. Such is the commandment of our Lord. Such is the service laid upon us, to be the test and measure of our faith. R. D. H.

Grace of God in vain. As long as thou hast but good resolutions thou art still fostering a secret confidence in thine own strength. As a naked and unprotected sinner, who can bring to our dear God nothing that is good, and as one who is unable to answer Him in anything, must thou entreat for grace and forgiveness of sins, and as a sinner must thou suffer thyself to be pardoned. Hollaz.

2. The accepted time is the time of bounty, the time of grace, when we are not called upon to answer for our sins nor to suffer punishment; but besides being released from it, to enjoy innumerable blessings, righteousness, sanctification, and everything else. Let us draw near at such a time as this, in which such exuberant bounty is poured forth.

Chrys.—The word of life is in your dwellings and in your hands; the lamp of salvation shines on your way. There will be no new prophet sent into the world; there will be no new miracle; no voice will be uttered from heaven to remove your perplexity; and the dead will not be raised to resolve your doubts. You have Moses, and the prophets and the apostles, and the Redeemer; and were the dead to rise, if you will not hear the risen Son of God, you would not be persuaded though a man should come now from the tomb. A. B.—The question is not, "How long may I put off being blessed with peace and glory in Christ Jesus, and then have it after all?" but it is, "How soon may I make sure of that power and that peace, and let that glory fall in on my saved and thankful heart?" It is a present command; not for yesterday, not for to-morrow; not a message of despair that the great work was not done sooner; not a message of delay, as if it could as well be done later. It is for the passing hour. F. D. H.—The only moment of duration in which our Sovereign promises and pledges himself to exert his mercy and his power is the present moment. Concerning the next instant, or the morrow, he has given no assurance or certainty whatever. Shedd.

3-10. Throughout three most memorable chapters, the 3d, 4th, and 5th, the apostle expatiates on the ministry which he had received, and which sustained him in every place, so that he fainted not. It was of the New Testament excelling the Old Covenant in life and glory. It was a dispensation of light and clearness, not of veiled faces. Paul was intrusted with a manifestation of the truth in men's consciences—a message of reconciliation to their hearts. Invested with such a ministry, he bore all things for Jesus' sake. D. F.

10. A believing man is a man of large possessions. Silver and gold he may have none; but not the less on that account are his possessions great. "Having nothing, and yet possessing all things," is the apostle's description of him. There is no end, no measure of his possessions, for they are summed up in the fullness of him that filleth all in all. Bonar.

11-13. They were his "children." How could he resent even unmerited reproach from them, bound as they were to him by so dear a tie? He had suffered for them; he pardoned them, for they did it ignorantly. His spirit sought for them the only excuse it could. How worthy a successor of his Master's spirit! What a well-spring of love, inexhaustible in its freshness as in its life! And this is the true test of gracious charity. Hold fast to love. If men wound your heart, let them not sour or embitter it; let them not shut up or narrow it; let them only expand it more and more, and be able always to say with Paul, "My heart is enlarged." F. W. R.

15. On one side we must be, Christ's or Belial's. Righteousness refuses fellowship with unrighteousness. Light offers no hospitality to darkness. If idols have our heart's secret worship, the true temple of God shuts its doors upon us. We must touch and handle the unclean thing or let it alone. We do assort with the unbelievers, or come out from among them and be separate; and the Judge knows which we do. F. D. H.—The atheist is not merely he who professes unbelief, but, strictly speaking, every one who lives without God in the world. And the heretic is not merely he who has mistaken some Christian doctrine, but rather he who causes divisions among the brethren. And the idolater is not merely he who worships images, but he who gives his heart to something which is less than God; for a man's god is that which has his whole soul and worship, that which he obeys and reverences as his highest. F. W. R.

We take our names from Christ and the Scriptures; but we take our views from the world, i. e., from that class of people among whom our lives are spent. We are "disciples," but we do not follow Christ at any inconvenience. We are soldiers, but we do not run any risks in fighting for him. We are a priesthood—where are our sacrifices? We are fellow-workers with God—what are we doing with God? Many of us hardly ever think of the obligation to labor for the Lord. Fashion can command us. Pleasure can command us. Money can command us. Society can command us. God speaks to us, and we are deaf. J. Hall.—Is there a new heart; a new life; a new conversation? Are there new hopes; new joys; new objects of pursuit? Or is there some plan for compromising matters with God, and an inquiry how the hold on the world may be continued? Is there still a purpose, while the decencies of the Christian profession shall be maintained, to grasp still as much of the world as possible; to be as gay and as happy in the world as may possibly consist with the Christian profession? I tremble when I think of such an endeavor to make a compromise with God, and a league with the world; attempting to make light and darkness meet. A. B.

17. Come out, be separate. Both a beginning and a continuing; both a revolution and a habit; both a new principle and a new life is this great decisive act of the Christian. A coming out from irreligious associations is one part; it implies energy of purpose kindled by faith. Being separate implies the maintenance of the ground thus taken against all opponents, whether they frown or laugh, sneer or slight, reason or threaten. "Come out" from the bonds of vicious compliance and ungodly habit is a call to the courage and faith of the awakened heart. "Be separate" from sin is a command to the persevering will. "Touch not" the renounced pollution is an adjuration to the sanctified conscience. And these are the three daily heroisms in the discipline of the soldier of Jesus Christ.

18. Sons and daughters! What a power of personal endearment is lodged in that particularity of speech! Not "children" merely, losing individual consolation in the generality of the family! God uses names that come nearer to personal affection, and meet a personal want. F. D. H.—Meditate often and deeply on his Fatherhood, and on the filial relation in which we stand to him. This of itself is sufficient to stir in the heart an emotion of love toward him. But when God is presented to us as the gospel presents him—when we are assured that his love was so true, so clinging, that even when we were in the depths of our degradation and ruin, fighting against him with all the force of our will, he gave his Only-begotten Son to be the propitiation for our sins, then indeed the sentiment of love to him begins to claim for itself a supremacy over the will, and to establish itself as a principle of action. E. M. G.—Then you will put your faith into honest and faithful work, and, being in the world, will not be of the world. The stamp of another loyalty will be upon you. The spring of another joy and liberty will be in you. And then, not till then, will the great end and object of your creation as a spiritual being, a son or daughter of God, begin to be realized in your life. F. D. H.

1. The real Christian is not merely satisfied with outward reformation, but pants also for inward purity. His desire is not only to keep the flesh and body free from the show of sin, but the heart pure from the guilt of sin. Paul dissuades his converts from sin by reminding them of the promises of God; which promises are, that he will work with them by his Spirit and give them "a new heart and a new spirit"; and "renew them in the spirit of their minds." "Having, therefore," he says, "such promises, let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit." T. M.—Observe the gospel principle of action. It is not, Separate yourself from all uncleanness in order that you may get a right of sonship; but, Because ye are sons of God, therefore be pure. It is not, Work in order to be saved; but, Because you are saved, therefore work out your salvation. It is not, Labor that you may be accepted; but, Labor because you are accepted in the beloved. F. W. R.

Those who do not mourn under their imperfections, and unfeignedly desire and endeavor to be better, were never really good. It is a perfect contradiction for any man to think he is sincere in his choice, and prepared in his affections for the pure glorious felicity in heaven, that does not labor to "cleanse himself from all pollutions of flesh and spirit, and to perfect holiness in the fear of God." Bates.

Section 284.

2 CORINTHIANS vii. 2-16.

- 2 RECEIVE us; we have wronged no man, we have corrupted no man, we have defrauded
3 no man. I speak not this to condemn you: for I have said before, that ye are in our hearts
4 to die and live with you. Great is my boldness of speech toward you, great is my glorying
5 of you: I am filled with comfort, I am exceeding joyful in all our tribulation. For, when 6 we were come into Macedonia, our flesh had no rest, but we were troubled on every side;
7 without were fightings, within were fears. Nevertheless God, that comforteth those that 8 are cast down, comforted us by the coming of Titus; and not by his coming only, but by 9 the consolation wherewith he was comforted in you, when he told us your earnest desire,
10 your mourning, your fervent mind toward me; so that I rejoiced the more. For though 11 I made you sorry with a letter, I do not repent, though I did repent: for I perceive that 12 the same epistle hath made you sorry, though it were but for a season.
- 9 Now I rejoice, not that ye were made sorry, but that ye sorrowed to repentance: for ye 10 were made sorry after a godly manner, that ye might receive damage by us in nothing.
11 For godly sorrow worketh repentance to salvation not to be repented of: but the sorrow
12 of the world worketh death. For behold this selfsame thing, that ye sorrowed after a 13 godly sort, what carefulness it wrought in you, yea, what clearing of yourselves, yea, what 14 indignation, yea, what fear, yea, what vehement desire, yea, what zeal, yea, what revenge!
15 In all things ye have approved yourselves to be clear in this matter. Wherefore, though I 16 wrote unto you, I did it not for his cause that had done the wrong, nor for his cause that 17 suffered wrong, but that our care for you in the sight of God might appear unto you. There-18 fore we were comforted in your comfort: yea, and exceedingly the more joyed we for the 19 joy of Titus, because his spirit was refreshed by you all. For if I have boasted any thing to 20 him of you, I am not ashamed; but as we spake all things to you in truth, even so our 21 boasting, which I made before Titus, is found a truth. And his inward affection is more 22 abundant toward you, whilst he remembereth the obedience of you all, how with fear and 23 trembling ye received him. I rejoice therefore that I have confidence in you in all things.

Godly sorrow is an inward moral force which produces a real transformation of life and conduct. It does not expend itself in the tears, the moans, and the nervous excitements of a barren pietism. As the Scripture saith, "It worketh effectual reformation not to be repented of." "Fruits meet for repentance," or a course of life and action congruous with this interior moral change, must surely follow this ingenuous sorrow under the light of a gospel which reveals the fullness of the divine mercy set forth by an all-sufficient atonement. For to the sorrowing heart the gospel reveals free pardon as the gift of God's munificence; reveals the Divine Spirit as waiting to impart strength; reveals the sympathetic love of angels as waiting to break forth into songs of welcome, that shall hail the converted soul's accession to the ranks of the redeemed ones. When the heart is touched with healthful grief for sin, these revelations reach its deepest springs of action, and awaken sentiments of love and gratitude which must express themselves in acts of joyous obedience. Deliverance, emancipation, redemption, freedom, salvation—these are the words which fall like heavenly music upon the listening ear, and furnish an adequate supply of motive-power to meet the soul's most urgent wants. Hague.

The simplest way in which the sorrow of the world works death is seen in the effect of mere regret for worldly loss. There are certain advantages with which we come into the world. Youth, health, friends, and sometimes property. So long as these are continued, we are happy; and because happy, fancy ourselves very grateful to God. But, when these blessings are removed, we count ourselves hardly treated, as if we had been defrauded of a right; rebellious, hard feelings come; then it is you see people become bitter, spiteful, discontented. At every step in the solemn path of life, something must be mourned which will come back no more; the temper that was so smooth becomes rugged and uneven; the benevolence that expanded upon all narrows into an ever-dwindling selfishness—we are alone; and then that death-like loneliness deepens as life goes on. The course of man is downward, and he moves with slow and ever more solitary steps down to the dark silence—the silence of the grave. This is the death of heart; the sorrow of the world has worked death. F. W. R.

5. Without, fightings; within, fears.

The great trials of faith and patience find themselves represented in miniature in the little crosses, ruggednesses, unpleasant collisions of one day's walk. Temptations in the heat of conversation to overstate things, or to use acrimonious language, or to throw out (for the sake of amusement) words bordering on the profane—temptations to lose one's temper, to indulge appetite in eating, to resign one's self to calls of ease and sloth, or to harbor thoughts of impurity—all this is the miniature crucible, in which day by day the faith and patience of God's children are tried and approved. There are fightings without and fears within, oppositions, vexations, annoyances, anxieties, apprehensions. It is painful to thwart natural inclinations, as a Christian must do several times in each day; it is called in Scripture "crucifixion of the flesh," and crucifixion can not but be painful. But comfort thee, faithful soul! the night is coming when, if thou wilt endure patiently at present the fever-fit of passion or excitement, thy anxiety shall have worn off, and the Saviour shall fold thee under his wing, and thou shalt sit down under his shadow with great delight. E. M. G.

To say that doubts and fears are sinful, is not the way to remove them, but to increase them; inasmuch as the sincere soul will fear more and more, by thinking it has more sin to answer for. The very doubts and fears of weak believers evidence that they are in covenant with God, and have already the faith of his own elect, though they want such a degree of it as to make them comfortable in their own consciences. If there was no faith, there would be no doubting; for these two are at once working in the heart, the one opposing the actings of the other; so that my very fears that I have not faith prove that I have it. If doubts are traced to their origin, no culpable unbelief, no consent of the will, can ever be found at the bottom of them, but real faith will always be discovered at their root. For why does the soul doubt? Not because it disbelieves the promises therein contained; but because, seeing its own sin and depravity, and God's holiness and purity, and not having clear views of the Lord's method of justifying the ungodly without money and without price, it distresses and perplexes itself with the notion that its great vileness is a bar to the mercy of God. Nature must, in a manner, be reversed, before this great Scriptural truth will be received, viz., that sin, not goodness, qualifies every person for the gospel salvation. The verity of the promises, then, is not questioned by the feeble, doubting Christian; but what he doubts and fears is, that he himself has no interest in them; and so far is Christ from being displeased with such weaklings, that he yearns with a more than common tenderness over them. Hill.

6. He that comforteth "those that are cast down" really shows that he is aware of his servant's great need. Not through the coming of an angel with radiant wings, but through that of a fellow-laborer with favorable tidings, He raises the cast-down heart from the dust. Van O.

7. So that I rather rejoiced. The Corinthians had given a hearty welcome to Titus, and on receiving the first Epistle had been grieved and sorry for the evil which they had previously connived at. As to the particular case of which the apostle had written, they had subjected the man "who had done the wrong" to a discipline severe yet not inexorable. On hearing these tidings, Paul feels renewed confidence in the Corinthians, and, with his characteristic generosity of temper, tells them so. D. F.

8. The beautiful law is, that in proportion as the repentance increases the grief diminishes. "I rejoice," says Paul, that "I made you sorry, though it were but for a time." And few things more signally prove the wisdom of this apostle than his way of dealing with this grief of the Corinthian. He tried no artificial means of intensifying it—did not urge the duty of dwelling upon it, magnifying it, or even of gauging and examining it. So soon as grief had done its work, the apostle was anxious to dry useless tears. A proud remorse does not forgive itself the forfeiture of its own dignity; but it is the very beauty of the penitence which is according to God, that at last the sinner, realizing God's forgiveness, does learn to forgive himself. What is meant by the publican's going down to his house justified, but that he felt at peace with himself and God? F. W. R.

9. Sorrow may produce two kinds of reformation, a transient or a permanent one; an alteration in habits which, originating in emotion, will last so long as that emotion continues, and then, after a few fruitless efforts, be given up—a repentance which will be repented of; or again, a permanent change, which will be reversed by no after-thought—a repentance not to be repented of.

10. Godly sorrow. Sorrowing according to God. God sees sin, not in its consequences, but in itself; a thing infinitely evil, even if the consequences were happiness to the guilty instead of misery. So sorrow, according to God, is to see sin as God sees it. It is not a microscopic self-examination, nor a mourning in which self is ever uppermost; my character gone; the greatness of my sin; the forfeiture of my salvation. The thought of God absorbs all that. And the Christian—gazing not on what he is, but on what he desires to be—dares, even when the recollection of his sin is most vivid and most poignant, to say with Peter, thinking less of himself than of God, "Lord, thou knowest all things, thou knowest that I love thee." F. W. R.

Repentance. The simple meaning of this word, which was so familiar to the lips of the first preachers of the gospel, is "a change of mind." Whosoever the term metanoia, which was usually employed by the apostles to designate this change, fell upon the ear of a Greek, it was always understood to denote some kind of conversion. His idea of the nature of the change intended would be naturally modified by the connection in which the word occurred; but whosoever it was used by a Christian teacher, in connection with the startling narrative of his master's life, death, and resurrection, it always denoted such a change in one's habits of thought, feeling, and conduct, as constituted a necessary preparation for the heartfelt reception of Christ as the true Teacher, the only Saviour, and the rightful Sovereign of the soul. Hague.

Not to be repented of. Coming to Christ is the crown of repentance. It is the only kind of repentance that really gives rest and peace. It is the only repentance that stills the tumult of the soul, and makes repenting sweet instead of bitter. We must endeavor, not merely to see that we have done wrong—much grievous wrong—but to come to Christ himself to be forgiven. We must think of him as of one who deeply loved us, who still yearns after our love, whom we have not thought of as we ought. We have done wrong, but let all other wrong be swallowed up in the thought of the pain that we have given, that we are giving, to the soul of the most loving Friend of ours that ever lived. That only will give us rest. All other repentance is hard work; wearisome, cheerless; at the best it gives a sort of relief from pain. But coming to Christ gives real joy to the heart and life. F. T.

The sorrow of the world worketh death.

There is a sorrow for past transgressions which proves no more in our favor than a fever in the brain or a whirlwind in the air. No holy effects follow it; it may break our hearts, but it will never subdue them. No gracious dispositions produce it: a troubled conscience, a dread of shame, a fear of punishment—these are its sources. Death is its end. C. B.—It is the principal distress of extreme bodily hunger, that the organs of digestion begin themselves to be gnawed and digested, in place of the food on which the digestive power is accustomed to spend its energy. Remorse, in the same way, is a moral hunger of the soul. It is the bitter wail of a famished immortality. It is your conscience lashing your perverse will; your defrauded, hungry love weeping its dry, pitchy tears on the desert your evil life has made for it. It is your whole spiritual nature famished by sin, muttering wrathfully, and growling like a caged lion at the bars which shut him up to himself. And as bodily hunger sometimes causes the starving man to see devils in his ravings, so this hunger of remorse fills the soul with angry demons and ministers of vengeance, waiting to execute judgment. Sleep vanishes not seldom, or comes only in dreams that scare the sleeper. The day lags heavily, and the man carries a load of selfish regret and worldly sorrow that worketh death. H. B.

11, 12. The criminal had undergone public shame and public humiliation; his had been private grief, and many searchings of heart; and all this had not only taught him a lesson which never could be forgotten, and strengthened him by terrible discipline against future weakness, but also had set up for the Corinthians a higher standard, and vindicated the purity of Christian life and the dignity of the Christian Church. This was the pain, and these were its results. Seeing these results, Paul steadily contemplated the necessary suffering. Let us now infer from this a great truth—the misfortune of non-detection. They who have done wrong congratulate themselves upon not being found out. A sin undetected is the soil out of which fresh sins will grow. The worst misfortune that can happen is to sin and to escape detection: shame and sorrow do God's work, as nothing else can do it. F. W. R.

11. What indignation, desire! A heart that becomes soft beneath the cross of Christ, how earnest, burning, pure, are the tears it weeps! For the sufferings which the Holy One of God endured on account of our sins, teach us in what light they are regarded by God, and open up the deepest fountains of our sorrow. Sorrow without Christ is death. But to repent at the cross of Christ, that is resurrection, that is life. There is pleasure in every pang into which the thought of love enters, and therefore in every such pang there is strength. One love deserves another! cries the soul, when she has dried her weeping eyes, and goes forth and works. And the work which she then has done, it was for her Lord, and from love to him that she did it. A. T.

What zeal. True zeal will hate sin, yet love the sinner. True zeal will hate heresy, and yet love the heretic. True zeal will long to break the idol, but deeply pity the idolater. True zeal will abhor every kind of wickedness, but labor to do good, even to the vilest transgressor. True zeal will speak truth boldly, like Athanasius, against the world; but true zeal will speak the truth in love. Ryle.

12. No other system except the Christian system of grace could thus afford to honor penitence, because no other gives such testimony against sin. It is because Christianity is so holy, that it can take hold of the fallen to lift them out of the mire in which they have sunk, and can make use of those even who have dishonored Christ, as promoters of his cause before a censorious and Pharisaical world. The man who had disgraced Christianity at Corinth, when he evinced thorough repentance, was taken back into a holy body, to be a blessing again, and to be blest in that sacred circle. But if the gospel had been another kind of religion, if external purity of morals had been its highest aim, then doubtless every marked lapse would have been visited with hopeless exclusion, lest the white, or rather the white-washed, robes of the pure should be soiled by the contact of the unclean. But Christ came to call sinners to repentance, and so his Church is a blessed sort of hospital, where the faulty and guilty can be cured; where bitter, ineffaceable memories, instead of overwhelming the soul in sorrow, can be the starting-point of a new life, can be a motive to new fidelity, a warning against return to sin; where the sympathies aroused by a common experience can greet the penitent on his return; and where those whose sin-malady has been of a more hidden sort, knowing that they too belong to the class of the recovered, can welcome him as a fellow in suffering, a fellow in salvation. T. D. W.

13-16. This chapter is one of the most impassioned utterances in all literature. Now he glories in the Corinthians. They fill him with comfort to overflowing, with joy to painful excess. And, again, he grieves that he should ever have grieved them, and can only console himself with the happy effects of their grief—that it was a sorrow to repentance and life. Yet, beneath all this intense sympathy with the Corinthians, there runs and heaves an under-current of feeling for Titus hardly less intense. The mere coming of Titus had been a great comfort to him; and not only his coming, but the assurance that the Corinthians had been kind to Titus, and had comforted him. "I was comforted in your comfort: yea, and exceedingly the more I rejoiced for the joy of Titus, because his spirit was refreshed by you all." In the frankness of confidential talk, Paul had often boasted to Titus of the Corinthians; and now it is an inexpressible happiness to him that his boasts have been verified: "If I have boasted to him of you, I am not ashamed"; and that Titus has learned to love them "with a deep, inward affection." And thus throughout the chapter he makes much of the Corinthians and much of Titus, till we can not say whether we more admire the apostle or love the friend. Coz.

Section 285.

2 CORINTHIANS viii. 1-24.

1 MOREOVER, brethren, we do you to wit of the grace of God bestowed on the churches of 2 Macedonia; how that in a great trial of affliction the abundance of their joy and their deep
3 poverty abounded unto the riches of their liberality. For to their power, I bear record, 4 yea, and beyond their power they were willing of themselves; praying us with much in-
5 treaty that we would receive the gift, and take upon us the fellowship of the ministering 6 Lord, and unto us by the will of God. Insomuch that we desired Titus, that as he had 7 begun, so he would also finish in you the same grace also.

7 Therefore, as ye abound in every thing, in faith, and utterance, and knowledge, and in 8 all diligence, and in your love to us, see that ye abound in this grace also. I speak not by 9 commandment, but by occasion of the forwardness of others, and to prove the sincerity of 10 your love. For ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that, though he was rich, yet 11 for your sakes he became poor, that ye through his poverty might be rich. And herein I 12 give my advice: for this is expedient for you, who have begun before, not only to do, but 13 also to be forward a year ago. Now therefore perform the doing of it; that as there was 14 a readiness to will, so there may be a performance also out of that which ye have. For if there be first a willing mind, it is accepted according to that a man hath, and not according 13 to that he hath not. For I mean not that other men be eased, and ye burdened: but by 14 an equality, that now at this time your abundance may be a supply for their want, that 15 their abundance also may be a supply for your want: that there may be equality: as it is written, He that had gathered much had nothing over; and he that had gathered little had no lack.

16 But thanks be to God, which put the same earnest care into the heart of Titus for you. 17 For indeed he accepted the exhortation; but being more forward, of his own accord he 18 went unto you. And we have sent with him the brother, whose praise is in the gospel 19 throughout all the churches; and not that only, but who was also chosen of the churches to travel with us with this grace, which is administered by us to the glory of the same Lord, 20 and declaration of your ready mind: avoiding this, that no man should blame us in this 21 abundance which is administered by us: providing for honest things, not only in the sight 22 of the Lord, but also in the sight of men. And we have sent with them our brother, whom we have oftentimes proved diligent in many things, but now much more diligent, upon the 23 great confidence which I have in you. Whether any do enquire of Titus, he is my partner and fellowhelper concerning you: or our brethren be enquired of, they are the messengers 24 of the churches, and the glory of Christ. Wherefore shew ye to them, and before the churches, the proof of your love, and of our boasting on your behalf.

If we would be as Christ is in this world, if we would follow his steps as our loving Master, there is but one way, one straight, narrow way; the way of self-denying charity. Shall we go on speaking of His atoning sacrifice, but ourselves sacrifice nothing; of His poverty for us, but have ourselves no thought except for this world's riches; of His humiliation for us, but ourselves seek only how to exalt ourselves and our families in this world; of His having "emptied himself" of his inherent majesty, and ourselves remain "full"? Not in words but in deeds did He love us, when he came down amid our sin and shame and sufferings, to be hated, scorned, crucified, to bear our sins. Not in words then but in deeds must be the love which we meanwhile show to Him in his poor; learning, slowly it may be, but day by day, to forego things which tempt the eyes, the taste, the senses; looking not at what we can afford to spend upon self, but what we may lawfully deny self; not what additional comforts we may keep around us, but what indulgences we may part with, that we may give the more unto Him; seeking how our habits may become more simple; parting with luxuries which perish in the using, and which soon must part with us, in order to win the love of God; parting with things temporal for things eternal, with fading enjoyments for everlasting glory; with things without us, that Christ (as He has promised to those who love) may make his abode in us. F. D. H.

THE second division of the Epistle occupies the eighth and ninth chapters, and forms the only specimen extant of apostolic teaching on the duty and privilege of giving money to God and the poor. It is well to mark how much attention the foremost of all the apostles gave to such a matter as the collection of money. It is not right to let the money of the Lord's house be collected and managed on mere earthly principles. The treasury of his temple is holy. Those who put money into it should be reminded that Christ sits over against the treasury. Those who give contributions ought to regard them in the light here thrown around them by Paul, exercising liberality under the grace of God, making an offering with the same reverence as belongs to prayer and praise, and with such an overwhelming sense of the Lord's goodness as will lead them, not to speak of their own gifts, but to repeat with humble joy the words which close this second part of the Epistle: "Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift." D. F.

1. "Make known to you" would now be better understood than the obsolete "do you to wit of." A.

2. It was not the splendid donations of the rich which drew forth the praises of the Son of God, but the more than royal munificence of that indigent widow who gave "all that she had, even all her living." So the apostle tells us here of "the churches of Macedonia." . . . In every section of the Christian Church, a spirit of self-denying benevolence is the exception, and a spirit of worldly self-indulgence, which leaves little for God, is the rule. Nor can a thoughtful Christian reflect on the growing necessities of the kingdom of Christ, and the imploring attitude of the heathen world, and then remember how insignificant a proportion of the vast pecuniary resources of the Christian Church is at present appropriated to the demands of that kingdom and the salvation of that world, without feeling that, among the revolutions which must precede the universal reign of Christ, one must be a revolution in the economy of Christian benevolence.

5. First gave their own selves to the Lord. The gospel heightens benevolence into one of the most spiritual and improving duties the Christian can perform. For, by imbuing his heart with the love of God, it enables him to taste the godlike enjoyment of doing good; and, by teaching him to refer all his acts of benevolence to Christ, to perform them as expressions of gratitude to him, to hope for their acceptance through him, and to pray that they may tend to his glory, it keeps him near to the cross, in an atmosphere of spiritual and elevated piety. J. H.

9. Christ is the reference for everything. To Christ's life and Christ's spirit Paul refers all questions, both practical and speculative, for a solution. It is in spirit and not in letter that Christ is our example. The Corinthians were asked to give money for a special object, and Christ is brought forward as their example. But Christ did not give money; he gave himself. His riches were perfect happiness; his poverty was humiliation; and he humbled himself that we, through his poverty, might be made rich. He gave himself to bless the world. This, then, is the example; and it is the spirit of that example which the Corinthians are urged to imitate. It was giving, it was love, that was the essence of the sacrifice. The form was a secondary thing. It was life in His case, it was money in theirs; the one thing needful was a love like His, which was the desire to give and to bless. F. W. R.

The mere circumstance of His assuming our nature was to him an unutterable humiliation. We can not measure the depth of it, for we can not measure the height of his original greatness. All we can say is, he was God, the self-existent, boundless Jehovah; no lofty angel, no inferior deity, but "very God of very God," possessing in himself all the fullness of the divine perfections, sharing with his eternal Father in all he was and enjoyed. Nay, he was the eternal Father, one with him in essence as well as in glory. C. B.—He took on himself our manners and our poverty that he might bestow on us his own riches. For his passion is our relief from suffering, and his death is our immortality, and his tears are our joy, and his burial is our resurrection, and his baptism is our sanctification, and his stripes are our healing, and his chastisement is our peace, and his ignominy is our glory. Athanasius.

You know the height from which he stooped. You know the depth of humiliation to which he descended; that he found no resting-place between his throne and the cross. You know for whom he did this—for his enemies, his destroyers. You know that he did this voluntarily; that his own love was the only obligation; that he welcomed each indignity, invited each pang; made them a part of his plan of condescension. You know how earnestly he prosecutted the work of our salvation; that in every step he took he was only gratifying the compassionate yearnings of his own heart; that he assumed life for the express purpose of laying it down. You know the object for which he did it all—for your salvation; that he might pour his fullness into your emptiness, his riches into your poverty; that he might raise you to heaven, and share with you the glories of his own throne. And will you withhold from him any thing in your possession? Will you not freely contribute of your worldly substance to diffuse the knowledge of his grace? J. H.

11. Now therefore perform the doing of it. True though it is that willingness is accepted where the means are not, yet where the means are, willingness is only tested by performance. Test yourself by action; test your feelings and your liberal words by self-denial. Do not let life evaporate in slothful sympathies. You wish you were rich, and fancy that then you would make the poor happy, and spend your life in blessing? Now—now is the time—now or never. Habituate your heart to acts of giving. Habituate your spirit to the thought that in all lives something is owed to God. Neglect this now, and you will not practice it more when rich. 'Charity is a habit of the soul, therefore now is the time. F. W. R.

Out of that which ye have. It is plain that the little and the much are to be estimated by the quantity of the means. Such was our Lord's judgment in the case of the widow's mite. This virtual or moral estimate claims the special consideration of that portion of the religious community which Providence has more largely favored. It is not for them to be well satisfied with themselves for rendering only a little larger share of aid than what is expected from those in much inferior condition. J. F.—Let us proportion our alms to our ability, lest we provoke God to proportion His blessings to our alms. Beveridge.

12. I give no alms only to satisfy the hunger of my brother, but to fulfill and accomplish the will and command of God. I draw not my purse for his sake that demands it, but His that enjoined it. I relieve no man upon the rhetoric of his miseries, nor to content mine own commiserating disposition; for this is still but moral charity, and an act that oweth more to passion than to reason. He that relieves another upon the bare suggestion of pity, doth not this so much for his sake as for his own; for by compassion we make other's misery our own; and so, by relieving them, we relieve ourselves also. Brown.—You go into the Church to obtain mercy: first, show mercy. Make God your debtor, and then you may ask of Him, and receive with usury. We are not heard barely for the lifting up of our hands. Stretch forth your hands not only to heaven but to the poor. If you stretch out your hands to the poor, you touch the very height of heaven; for He that sits there receives your alms. But if you lift up barren hands, it profits nothing. Chrys.—Alms should come out of a little purse as well as out of a great sack; but surely where there is plenty charity is a duty, not a courtesy; it is a tribute imposed by Heaven upon us, and he is not a good subject who refuses to pay it. Feltham.—Defer not charities till death. He that doth so is rather liberal of another man's than of his own. Bacon.—A life of benevolence ending in a munificent bequest is like a glorious sunset to a summer's day; but he who withholds his hand from deeds of benevolence till his last hour, surrenders his property to death rather than devotes it to God. J. H.

13. "For I mean not that other men be eased and ye burdened"; as if the benefit of the poor were the main end; as if God cared for the poor, and not for the rich; as if to get from those who have, and bestow on those who have not, were the object of inciting to liberality. Paul distinctly denies this. He takes the higher ground: it is a grace of God. He contemplates the benefit to the soul of the giver.

15. The principle laid down is, that the abundance of the rich is intended for the supply of the poor, and the illustration of the principle is drawn from a miracle in the wilderness. There, by a miraculous arrangement, if any one through greediness gathered more manna than enough, it bred worms, and became offensive; and if, through weakness, or deep sorrow, or pain, any were prevented from collecting enough, still what they had collected was found to be sufficient. In this miracle Paul perceives a great universal principle of human life. God has given to every man a certain capacity and a certain power of enjoyment. Whatsoever he heaps or hoards beyond that is not enjoyment but disquiet. If a man piles up wealth, all beyond a certain point becomes disquiet. Thus thought James: "Your gold and silver is cankered." You can not escape the stringency of that law of the daily manna. F. W. R.

16. Titus does not, like Timothy, appear at intervals through all the passages of the apostle's life. He is not mentioned in the Acts at all, and this is the only place where he comes conspicuously forward in the Epistles, and all that is said of him is connected with the business of the collection. If we put together the notices, scanty as they are, of the conduct of Titus, they set before us a character which seems to claim our admiration for a remarkable union of enthusiasm, integrity, and discretion. C.

20, 21. It was in order to preserve his own reputation that Paul shielded himself from censure by consulting appearances, for if so large a sum had been intrusted to him alone, an opening would have been left for the suspicion of appropriating a portion to himself. In this is to be observed Paul's wisdom, not only as a man of the world, but as a man of God. He knew that he lived in a censorious age, that he was as a city set on a hill, that the world would scan his every act and his every word, and attribute all conceivable and even inconceivable evil to what he did in all honor. F. W. R.

Section 286.

2 CORINTHIANS ix 1-15.

1 For as touching the ministering to the saints, it is superfluous for me to write to you:
2 for I know the forwardness of your mind, for which I boast of you to them of Macedonia,
3 that Achaia was ready a year ago; and your zeal hath provoked very many. Yet have I
4 sent the brethren, lest our boasting of you should be in vain in this behalf; that, as I said,
5 ye may be ready: lest haply if they of Macedonia come with me, and find you unprepared,
6 we (that we say not, ye) should be ashamed in this same confident boasting. Therefore I
7 thought it necessary to exhort the brethren, that they would go before unto you, and make 8 up beforehand your bounty, whereof ye had notice before, that the same might be ready,
9 as a matter of bounty, and not as of covetousness.

6 But this I say, He which soweth sparingly shall reap also sparingly; and he which soweth 7 bountifully shall reap also bountifully. Every man according as he purposeth in his 8 heart, so let him give; not grudgingly, or of necessity: for God loveth a cheerful giver.
9 And God is able to make all grace abound toward you; that ye, always having all suffi-
10 ciency in all things, may abound to every good work: (as it is written, He hath dispersed 11 abroad; he hath given to the poor: his righteousness remaineth for ever. Now he that 12 ministereth seed to the sower both minister bread for your food, and multiply your seed
13 sown, and increase the fruits of your righteousness;) being enriched in every thing to all

12 bountifulness, which causeth through us thanksgiving to God. For the administration of this service not only supplieth the want of the saints, but is abundant also by many thank-
 13 givings unto God ; whiles by the experiment of this ministration they glorify God for your professed subjection unto the gospel of Christ, and for your liberal distribution unto them, 14 and unto all men ; and by their prayer for you, which long after you for the exceeding 15 grace of God in you. Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift.

CHRISTIAN liberality puts itself in sympathy with that great tide of universal mercy, which, flowing forth from the throne of God and the Lamb, encompasses every island, washes every shore, and proffers its life-giving waters to every individual of the race. It is prompted by sympathy with Christ in his love for universal man. It recognizes Christ as the Saviour of universal man. It recognizes the kingdom of Christ as spiritual and universal. Prompted by the spirit of love to God, enveloping and sanctifying the loves and the liberalities of earth, Christian liberality forces the stream of its bounty upward, far, far above them all, and pours it forth into the treasury of that universal empire of which it is written : "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ, and he shall reign for ever and ever." Here only does Christian liberality become pure, because here only does Christian love become pure. Unmixed with the loves and the liberalities of earth, it exhibits itself, like the water of the river of life, clear as crystal, and flowing, like that blessed river, in unstinted bounty all over the world. H. Smith.

What we wait for, and are looking hopefully to see, is a consecration of the vast money power of the world to the work and cause and kingdom of Jesus Christ. For that day, when it comes, is the morning, so to speak, of the new creation. That tide-wave in the money power can as little be resisted when God brings it on as the tides of the sea ; and like these also it will flow across the world in a day. And such a result we are to look for largely to the merchant class of disciples. Trade expanding into commerce, and commerce rising into communion, are to be the outline of the story. When the merchants seeking goodly pearls—all the merchant race—find the precious one they seek, and sell their all to buy it, they will make it theirs. H. B.

LET this dignify wealth in your eyes ; value it henceforth on this account, that the Lord will accept it at your hands as an offering of love. Be thankful, though you may have but little with which to present him. Seek out the right objects for it, the objects which you deem to be the dearest in his sight. Give to them all you can. Give under a grateful sense of your obligations, and you will feel that giving itself is a benefit, that it is an act in which you receive more than you render. J. H.—A liberal heart will have a liberal hand, be it full or empty. The most beautiful examples of charitable living are found alike among the rich and the poor. None are so low or so destitute but that they may equal the princes of the earth in charity. Their mites may even outstrip, in their beauty and reward, the largest bestowing of the wealthy. If riches make us proud and forgetful of our ill-deservings, they will harden the heart ; but if they be received as the largesses of heaven, and our unworthiness be deeply tasted in them, we shall delight to use them for the good of others. H. H.

4. Observe the delicacy of the mode in which the hint is given : "We (that we say not, ye) may not be ashamed." Paul makes it a matter of personal anxiety, as if the shame and fault of non-payment would be his. Thereby he appealed not to their selfish, but to their most unselfish feelings ;

he appealed to their gratitude, their generosity, to everything which was noble or high within them. This is a great principle—one of the deepest you can have for life and action. Appeal to the highest motives ; appeal whether they be there or no, for you make them where you do not find them. Arnold trusted his boys, avowing that he believed what they affirmed, and all attempt at deceiving him ceased forthwith. Let men say what they will of human nature's evil, a generous, real, unaffected confidence never fails to elicit the Divine spark. F. W. R.

6. "No man is thoroughly converted till his piety reaches his pocket." So said a Christian layman who had earned the right to say it. Let the words ring in men's ears. For few, how very few, have learned the blessedness of noble, bountiful, cheerful giving. Paul, who everywhere urged and organized the charity of the churches, has told us how "the Lord loveth a cheerful giver" and blesseth "him that soweth bountifully." He warns us against the "covetousness which is idolatry"—which makes money our God. And he urgently enjoins upon the rich the duty of a bountiful liberality. The New Testament doctrine of human ownership, and the foundation of giving, is summed up in one word—STEWARDSHIP. An.

7. The duty of the preacher to preach, of the scholar to teach, is no more imperative than the obligation which lies upon the wealthy to give—to consecrate a similar proportion of the particular forms of power which they wield to benevolent ends. If we would ascertain, then, the right use of wealth and the extent of the obligation which binds men who control it, we should recur to the New Testament, and there study the precepts and example of Christ and his immediate followers. Whatever of self-denial, whatever of self-sacrifice, whatever of consecration of power to the salvation of men and the glory of God marked the career of these exemplars of our faith, is binding to-day upon the Christian teacher, the Christian preacher, and the Christian merchant. M. B. A.—The Gospel of Christ, in harmony with its great design of establishing a reign of love, leaves its followers to assess themselves. It puts into their hands, indeed, a claim upon their property, but leaves the question, how much? to be determined by themselves. In assisting them to fill up the blank with the proper assessment, the only step which it takes is to point them to the cross of Christ; and, while their eye is fixed there in admiring love, to say, “How much owest thou unto thy Lord?” “Freely ye have received, freely give.” J. H.—Christian charity is a calm, wise thing; nay, sometimes it will appear to a superficial observer a very hard thing—for it has courage to refuse. A Christian man will not give to everything; he will not give because it is the fashion; he will not give because an appeal is very impassioned, or because it touches his sensibilities. He gives as he “purposeth in his heart.” F. W. R.

8. No soul was ever yet, or ever will be, generous in its dealings with God, which has not first formed a large estimate of God's generosity. Oh for a juster conception of the intensity of His love and tenderness for us, of His unspeakable willingness to give us day by day, and hour by hour, all things which are requisite for the spiritual life! E. M. G.—Spiritual prosperity is inseparable from Christian liberality. For “God loveth a cheerful giver: and God is able to make all grace abound toward you.” As often as you practice this duty in an evangelical spirit, you must be conscious that the best part of your sanctified nature is called into exercise; your heart is partially discharged of its remaining selfishness; your mind is braced more for Christian activity; your sympathy causes you to feel afresh your alliance with man; your beneficence enables you to rejoice in your union of spirit with Christ, and adds a new bond to that power of affection which binds you to his cause. And while other duties bring you nearer to Christ, this may be said at once to place you by his side, and to exalt you into a real though humble imitator of his divine benevolence. J. H.

9. A habit of benevolence must be contracted and kept alive, as all other habits are, by constant exercise. There is not a day passes over our heads but we might contribute something to lessen the uneasiness or promote the happiness of those with whom we have to do, and, by studying to promote their happiness, we mold ourselves into those habits which are productive of our own, both here and hereafter. Seed.

11. Paul urges all these motives for giving: emulation; self-esteem; gratitude, or sense of infinite benefaction; prudence, common sense, and a reasonable regard to what is fair and equitable; a sense of honor before men and God; ambition—a noble desire to obtain for ourselves, and to turn to account the largest and most liberal supplies of the divine bounty; and lastly, zeal for the glory of God—a feeling of what redounds to His honor in this whole matter, He being first, middle, and end in it all. Ross.

12. By the practice of Christian liberality, the glory of God and the credit of religion are promoted; and what object should be of more precious and abiding concern to the believer than this? The new-born liberality of the first Christians for the support of their needy brethren was bringing the benevolent power of Christianity to the test; and the result of “the experiment of this ministration” was such as to call forth songs of exultation to the glory of God. It displayed the gospel in a new aspect, brought to light its benevolent energies, showed them that much as they knew of its virtues, it contained hidden excellences which it would require time and circumstances to evolve and display; it filled the Church with a chorus of praise to the glory of God. J. H.

13. What are the rewards of liberality which Paul promises to the Corinthians? They are, first, the love of God (v. 7); secondly, a spirit abounding to every good work (v. 8); thirdly, thanksgiving on their behalf (vs. 11-13). A noble harvest! but all spiritual. Comprehend the meaning of it well. When you give to God sacrifice, and know that what you give is sacrificed, and is not to be got again, even in this world; for if you give, expecting it back again, there is no sacrifice; charity is no speculation in the spiritual funds, no wise investment, to be repaid with interest either in time or eternity! No! the rewards are these: Do right, and God's recompense to you will be the power of doing more right. Give, and God's reward to you will be the spirit of giving more; a blessed spirit, for it is the Spirit of God Himself, whose life is the blessedness of giving. Love, and God will pay you with the capacity of more love; for love is heaven—love is God within you. F. W. R.

15. “Herein is love!” “Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift!" And while you are standing in the presence of this matchless display of love, "what doth the Lord require of thee?" For yourself, he invites you to accept that love and be happy. And in relation to your fellow-men, he only requires that the stream of gratitude which his great love has drawn from your heart should be poured into that channel in which a tide of mercy is rolling through the world, and bearing blessings to the nations. He who for your sake gave his Son asks you for his sake to give of your worldly substance to the cause of human happiness. He asks you to cast into that treasury into which he hath given his Son, and poured all the blessings of his grace. The office to which God designates every man from the moment of his conversion is meant to be a new donation to the world. The relation in which he places him to the world is meant to be a fresh expression of the same infinite love which prompted him to give Christ; it is to be viewed as nothing less than a symbolical representation to the world of that unspeakable gift. He is not that gift, but is sent to bear witness of that gift; not merely to announce it with his lips, but to describe and commemorate its fullness and freeness in his own character. Like his blessed Lord he is to look upon himself as dedicated to the cause of human happiness.

Muse on the prophetic paintings of the latter-day glory, that day without a cloud: the enemies of man subdued, the disorders of the world hushed, all its great miseries passed away; Christ on his throne in the midst of a redeemed, sanctified, happy creation; all things sacred to his name; all tongues rehearsing for the last great chorus of the universe; all hearts united in holy love, and in that love offering themselves up as one everlasting sacrifice ascending before him in its own flames; new heavens, and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness. All things are waiting for it. All things are ready but the Church of Christ; and until its prayers, its wealth, all its energies and resources are laid at the feet of Christ, all things must continue to wait. Then, by the mercies of God; by the richness of his goodness toward you in nature, providence, and grace; by the sacredness of the commands which he has laid upon you; by a legitimate regard for your own well-being; and by the credit of that religion whose honor should be dearer to you than life; above all, by Christ's painful self-denial and deep humiliation; by his obedience unto the death of the cross; by that mystery of love which led him to become poor that he might make you eternally rich—O Christian soul, dedicate your property as you dedicate your soul to God! J. H.

2 CORINTHIANS X. 1-18.

- 1 Now I Paul myself beseech you by the meekness and gentleness of Christ, who in presence 2 am base among you, but being absent am bold toward you: but I beseech you, that I may not be bold when I am present with that confidence, wherewith I think to be bold against 3 some, which think of us as if we walked according to the flesh. For though we walk in 4 the flesh, we do not war after the flesh: (for the weapons of our warfare are not carnal, 5 but mighty through God to the pulling down of strong holds;) casting down imaginations, and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God, and bringing into 6 captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ; and having in a readiness to revenge all disobedience, when your obedience is fulfilled.
- 7 Do ye look on things after the outward appearance? If any man trust to himself that he is Christ's, let him of himself think this again, that, as he is Christ's, even so are we 8 Christ's. For though I should boast somewhat more of our authority, which the Lord hath 9 given us for edification, and not for your destruction, I should not be ashamed: that I may not 10 seem as if I would terrify you by letters. For his letters, say they, are weighty and power-11 ful; but his bodily presence is weak, and his speech contemptible. Let such an one think this, that, such as we are in word by letters when we are absent, such will we be also in deed when we are present.
- 12 For we dare not make ourselves of the number, or compare ourselves with some that commend themselves: but they measuring themselves by themselves, and comparing them-13 selves among themselves, are not wise. But we will not boast of things without our measure, but according to the measure of the rule which God hath distributed to us, a measure 14 to reach even unto you. For we stretch not ourselves beyond our measure, as though we reached not unto you: for we are come as far as to you also in preaching the gospel of 15 Christ: not boasting of things without our measure, that is, of other men's labours; but having hope, when your faith is increased, that we shall be enlarged by you according to 16 our rule abundantly, to preach the gospel in the regions beyond you, and not to boast in 17 another man's line of things made ready to our hand. But he that glorieth, let him glory 18 in the Lord. For not he that commendeth himself is approved, but whom the Lord com-mendeth.

It may only be by a long-protracted process of holy discipline, by many a weary hour of inward conflict, fainting, striving, falling, reviving, yet ever, on the whole, growing in conformity to the will of God, that the soul attains at last to the complete mastery over self, the perfect inward harmony of a spirit in which every thought and feeling and desire are "brought into captivity to the obedience of Christ." But when that glorious end is gained, when self is quelled, and duty reigns supreme within the breast, when "the immortal soul becomes consistent in self-rule," then the "weary strife of frail humanity" is at an end, and a repose, oh, how deep, how tranquil, how sublime! diffuses itself throughout the spirit—a repose in which there is at once calmness and power, the sweet serenity of an infant's slumbers, yet the strength of an angel of God. Caira.

With this chapter begins the direct personal defense of Paul against his rivals and adversaries; and with it the delicate and intricate alternations of gravity and irony, earnest pleading and rallying, which make this portion of the Epistle so exceedingly difficult. It is hardly needful to say that the whole of these last four chapters is very precious, both as letting us into the personal character and ways of the apostle and as abounding with rich gems of faith, hope, and Christian charity. A.

1. Here, again, according to his custom, the apostle refers to the example of Christ. He besought the Corinthians "by the meekness and gentleness of Christ." He vindicated his authority, because he had been meek, as Christ was meek; for not by menace nor by force did He conquer, but by the might of gentleness and the power of love. Remember, fine words about gentleness, self-sacrifice, meekness, are worth very little. Talking of the nobleness of humility and self-surrender is not believing in them. Would you believe in the cross and its victory? then live in its spirit—act upon it. F. W. R.

4. It is the living piety of the Church—back of all sermons however studied, all creeds however orthodox, all rites however simple—that gives them force. Not the great names of her eminent ministers, not the increase of her numbers, not the outward respect which she receives from statesmen, and poets, and politicians, but the living, active piety of her members, their exemplary and devoted spirit, their prayerfulness, humility, and Christlikeness: these are the weapons of her warfare, not carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of strongholds. These bring down to her aid the omnipotence of God. E. H. G.

Here is an apostle of the Lord Jesus who speaks the language of a soldier. He is planning a campaign; nay, rather, he is making war; he glows with the fire of a genuine military enthusiasm. But the weapons of his warfare are not carnal; the standard under which he fights is a more sacred sign than that of the Cesar; the operations which he projects are to be carried out in a territory more difficult of conquest than any which kept the conquerors of the world at bay. He is invading the region of human thought; and, as he fights for God, he is sternly resolved upon conquest. He sees rising before him the lofty fortresses of hostile errors; they must be reduced and razed. Every mountain fastness to which the enemy of Light and Love can retreat must be scaled and destroyed; and all the thought of the human soul which is hostile to the authority of the Divine truth must be "led away as a prisoner of war" into the camp of Christ. Truly a vast and unaccountable ambition; a dream—if it were not, as it was, a necessity; a tyranny—if anything less vigorous and trenchant had been consistent with the claims of the truth of God, or equal to the needs of the soul of man. Only that truth has an indefeasible right to reign in the intellect of man. The apostle asserts that right, when he speaks of bringing the whole intelligence of man into the obedience of Christ. H. P. L.

5. Casting down everything that exalteth itself against God. This is that bitter root of all enmity in man against God, and against one another—self; man's heart turned from God toward himself. And the very work of renewing grace is to annul and destroy self, to replace God in his right, that the heart and all its affections and motions may be at his disposal. So that, instead of self-will and self-love that ruled before, now the will of God and the love of God command all. Captivity to Christ. His matchless love hath freed me from the miserable captivity of sin, and hath for ever fastened me to the sweet yoke of his obedience. Let him alone to dwell and rule within me; and let him never go forth from my heart who for my sake refused to come down from the cross. L.

12. Men observe each other's actions and principles; and taking the general character of each which they find prevailing around them, erect it into a standard of morals to which they conform, and by which they try their own lives. Hence, the opinion of the world, the law of honor, the conventional usages of society, become tests by which men learn to judge of right and wrong—crooked rules, which, false in themselves, can but mislead those who apply them to the decision of their conduct. J. J.—A simpler and heartier reception of Christ within would expel this eternal self-reference, self-measurement, self-inspection. There was a grand thought in that saying of a believer of the primitive stamp: "I do not want to possess a faith; I want a faith that shall possess me." The safest strength of the heart is the feeling of complete dependence. There is something in a self-renouncing and trusting temper that makes piety fragrant with the air of Gethsemane. You find it only where you find the life hid with Christ in God, F. D. H.

15, 16. These words suggest these three important principles: the great general duty of extending and maintaining the ministry of the gospel beyond the more central, and prominent, and favored districts of its domain; the blessedness of that charity which voluntarily supports a distant ministry, even while maintaining its own; and the propriety of prosecuting the work in strict adherence to a settled distribution of ministerial labor, and especially—for on this the apostle eminently insists—with a careful recognition of the rights of the ministry previously located in each district of the Church. W. A. B.—Paul was now fettered in his plans of benevolence, and it was from the Corinthian disciples that he expected his release. The fulfillment of his hope depended upon their progress to higher attainments in faith. There is involved, then, in these words of an inspired and most successful missionary, a principle, that the missionaries of the Church require at her hands, for the extension and success of their efforts, an increase of faith. If we look to the period when the limits of the Church were most rapidly and widely extended, it will be found not the era when the worldly power, the learning, and the wealth of the Church were at their highest elevation, but in the age when, though lacking all these, by the energy of an overmastering faith, she rose superior to every impediment, and, destitute of all earthly aid and encouragement, dared to hope in God. Wise in his wisdom, and strong in his might, she devised her plans of conquest upon the broad and magnificent basis of the Saviour's promises, and then, in humility, diligence, and simple devotion, called upon the Saviour's faithfulness to accomplish the plans his own word had warranted and his own Spirit incited. And in most of the great revivals of faith and godliness in the modern Church, it will be discovered that the rising flood of religious feeling has opened anew, or found and followed the already open channel of missionary enterprise. Section 288.

2 CORINTHIANS xi. 1-33.

1 WOULD to God ye could bear with me a little in my folly: and indeed bear with me.
 2 For I am jealous over you with godly jealousy; for I have espoused you to one husband,
 3 that I may present you as a chaste virgin to Christ. But I fear, lest by any means, as the serpent beguiled Eve through his subtilty, so your minds should be corrupted from the simplicity that is in Christ. For if he that cometh preacheth another Jesus, whom we have not preached, or if ye receive another spirit, which ye have not received, or another gospel, which ye have not accepted, ye might well bear with him. For I suppose I was not a whit behind the very chiefest apostles. But though I be rude in speech, yet not in knowledge; but we have been thoroughly made manifest among you in all things. Have I committed an offence in abasing myself that ye might be exalted, because I have preached to you the gospel of God freely? I robbed other churches, taking wages of them, to do you service. And when I was present with you, and wanted, I was chargeable to no man: for that which was lacking to me the brethren which came from Macedonia supplied: and in all things I have kept myself from being burdensome unto you, and so will I keep myself. As the truth of Christ is in me, no man shall stop me of this boasting in the regions of Achaia. Wherefore? because I love you not? God knoweth. But what I do, that I will do, that I may cut off occasion from them which desire occasion; that wherein they glory, they may be found even as we. For such are false apostles, deceitful workers, transforming themselves into the apostles of Christ. And no marvel; for Satan himself is transformed into an angel of light. Therefore it is no great thing if his ministers also be transformed as the ministers of righteousness; whose end shall be according to their works. I say again, Let no man think me a fool; if otherwise, yet as a fool receive me, that I may boast myself a little. That which I speak, I speak it not after the Lord, but as it were foolishly, in this confidence of boasting. Seeing that many glory after the flesh, I will glory also. For ye suffer fools gladly, seeing ye yourselves are wise. For ye suffer, if a man bring you into bondage, if a man devour you, if a man take of you, if a man exalt himself, if a man smite you on the face.

21 I speak as concerning reproach, as though we had been weak. Howbeit, whereinsoever 22 any is bold, (I speak foolishly,) I am bold also. Are they Hebrews? so am I. Are they 23 Israelites? so am I. Are they the seed of Abraham? so am I. Are they ministers of Christ? (I speak as a fool) I am more; in labours more abundant, in stripes above measure, 24 in prisons more frequent, in deaths oft. Of the Jews five times received I forty stripes 25 save one. Thrice was I beaten with rods, once was I stoned, thrice I suffered shipwreck, 26 a night and a day I have been in the deep; in journeyings often, in perils of waters, in perils of robbers, in perils by mine own countrymen, in perils by the heathen, in perils in the 27 city, in perils in the wilderness, in perils in the sea, in perils among false brethren; in weariness and painfulness, in watchings often, in hunger and thirst, in fastings often, in 28 cold and nakedness. Beside those things that are without, that which cometh upon me 29 daily, the care of all the churches. Who is weak, and I am not weak? who is offended, 30 and I burn not? If I must needs glory, I will glory of the things which concern mine 31 infirmities. The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which is blessed for evermore, 32 knoweth that I lie not. In Damascus the governor under Aretas the king kept the city of 33 the Damascenes with a garrison, desirous to apprehend me: and through a window in a basket was I let down by the wall, and escaped his hands.

HAVING given himself to God, Paul desired to bring with himself the whole world as an offering. To this end he traversed sea and land, Greece and the barbarous countries, everywhere plucking up the thorns of sin, that he might sow the seed of the gospel, and everywhere transforming men into angels. Chrys.—We see him, in the prosecution of his purpose, traveling from country to country, enduring every species of hardship, encountering every extremity of danger, assaulted by the populace, punished by the magistrates, scourged, beaten, stoned, left for dead; expecting, wherever he came, a renewal of the same treatment and the same dangers; yet, when driven from one city, preaching in the next, spending his whole time in the employment, sacrificing to it his pleasures, his ease, his safety; persisting in this course to old age (through more than thirty years); unaltered by the experience of perverseness, ingratitude, prejudice, desertion; unsubdued by anxiety, want, labor, persecutions; unwearied by long confinement, undismayed by the prospect of death. Paley.—Full of impassioned efficiency and yet full of cool discretion, he is restlessly at work for a spiritual object; he couples vigorous earnestness and manly strength with the tenderest mildness; his deep spirit overflows with love, yet without becoming soft and weak; he is able to accommodate himself to all conditions, bear all things, hope for all things, joyfully deny himself all things, even such as are lawful; he lets his own personal interest fade entirely from his view, so that he may labor for the invisible kingdom of God, and live for a crucified man, who was rejected by the world, and yet in the knowledge of whom he had found the highest good, and would willingly impart this good to all men. Ullmann.—The world may be challenged to find his superior in simple power of soul. Judged by the thought in his writings, he stands unsurpassed. There is nothing like them in iron logic, in profound insight, in comprehensive breadth, in all-embracing grandeur of view. There is nothing like them in their expression of a great human heart, in its compassion for man, in its love for God, in its devotion to Jesus Christ—bearing the burden of the apostate and perishing Jew, reaching out after the dying Gentile, and in visions of the ineffable glory anticipating the ecstasy of heaven. Where in all the centuries has there ever appeared another such indomitable will? D. S. G.

No longer is Timothy associated. The writer is, "I, Paul, myself." And the tone becomes very firm, sometimes even stern and sarcastic. A strong anti-Pauline party had arisen at Corinth, headed by certain teachers, here designated "false apostles." In reply to their objection that he had brought no commendatory letters, Paul maintains that he needed none, and that the converts under his ministry formed for him a sufficient testimonial. In knowledge, in labors, and in sufferings, he was not a whit behind the very chief of the apostles. It was painful to him to be obliged to make such statements. "I am become a fool in glorying; ye have compelled me." The brethren at Corinth were being misled by men who envied and calumniated the very founder of their Church. In such circumstances Paul was bound to vindicate himself, and to show how fully his apostolic position was evidenced by his apostolic life, his fruitful labors, patient sufferings, and abundant revelations. D. F.

3, 4. Paul told them that better far than grace of language or eloquence was the fact that the truth he had preached was the essential truth of the gospel; and this truth he gives in a very few words, as Christ the risen and the crucified; Christ held in the heart and life, the spirit of the Cross and of the Resurrection: the spirit of the Cross sundering the heart, no matter how painfully, year by year, from the evil within us; the spirit of the Resurrection raising us to all things high and pure and noble, leaving in the grave behind us all despondency, sadness, and sin, and raising us up, as on angels' wings, to contemplate, and gradually to have formed within us, the purity of Him who sitteth on the right hand of God. F. W. R.

3. Simplicity: "the simplicity that is in Christ." It is a beautiful word. To speak what we think! to live what we believe! to seem what we are! to be far more anxious to stand well with our own conscience than in the opinions of others about us, and to be supremely anxious to please God, and to live in his love, and according to his laws. Such is the life of Christian "simplicity," which, however, is at the same time a life as beautiful as the morning, and as grand as the mountains, and "as it were the body of heaven in its clearness." A. R.

5. For "the very chiefest apostles" should stand "those over-much apostles"; i. e., those men who pretend to be more than the Apostles themselves. He means the false and rival teachers, not the apostles (see 12: 11). A.

9. I wanted. We have been accustomed to think of his life as full of pains, toils, dangers, calamities; but we have also been accustomed to attribute his perils and sufferings to the persecutions which befell him as an apostle of Christ. It is pathetic, it touches us close home, to learn that some of these sufferings came upon him as a working-man; that he knew what it was to have an empty purse and a bare cupboard. Weary with his rough work, knowing that he must come back to labors that would extend far into the night, he dragged himself evening by evening to the synagogue, or to the house of Justus, that he might teach and argue of the things of Christ. Never was he more constant or more ardent in the ministry of his apostleship than during the eighteen months he spent at Corinth; yet it was in these very months that he "wanted." Paul's utter devotion to his Master is a rebuke to us all; but it is the very gravest of rebukes to those who, professing and calling themselves Christians, can encounter any toils of business or pleasure, but are always too weary or too occupied to serve the Church; who usually find the means for schemes of recreation and gain, but are as generally too poor to contribute to the wants of their neighbors. For here was a man, often in want, yet forward to help and to give. Here was a man worn with handicraft toils, yet always fresh and vigorous for the ministration of truth and charity, always delighted to lavish his energies in any endeavor to teach men wisdom or to do them good. Cox.

13. We must consider that it is quite possible for some to deceive and others to remain true, and that the discovery of occasional hypocrites does not make all religion a pretense. If there were no reality, there could be no counterfeits. When hypocrites do startle us where we little expected them, our hearts must learn to fall back on the sincere who have fully approved themselves, the guileless and the good on whose foreheads the God of Truth has written his name in life and death—the beloved on earth and the blessed in heaven. Ker.

14. The Bible account of the fall in paradise gives us a key to the whole secret of the way and the power of temptation. Sin besieged the human heart, and carried it, and made its fatal entrance into the world, not as sin, but as the means to the knowledge of good and evil: Satan transformed into an angel of light.

Satan does not march his victim up to face perdition point-blank. He leads him to it by easy stages, and through a labyrinth that shows no danger. Round and round go those circling currents of the northern sea that swallow the ship; and by the same winding coil goes the spiritual decline that ends in spiritual death. It is gayety, not the grave, that youth is seeking when it steps inside the circle of forbidden pleasure. It is for social cheer, for good companionship, because he would not be morose, because he would scatter his despondency, that the drunkard drinks damnation, not for damnation's sake. A worldly life is begun for the more decent uses that wealth may be put to; but it is followed afterward in servitude to that unscrupulous taskmaster, avarice. Tempting men imitate their great leader and prototype. They never go directly and openly to their object. If they would weaken the holy restraints that gird in, with their blessed zone, the innocence of childhood, they will urge some sly argument to an honorable pride, or else to a friendly sympathy, or else to a praiseworthy love of independence; and the first battery that has been plied against many a boy's virtue has been the cunning caution that bade him not be afraid of his elders.

F. D. H.—In harmony with the viewless operations of the Holy Spirit are the subtle and impalpable agencies which Satan now wields. If Christ is concealed by the cloud, so is Satan. He no more appears in visible shape on earth; he no longer permits his spirits to torment the bodies of men. He has withdrawn his oracles, his sorceries, his magic, his outward signs, and tempts those who have laid aside the worship of graven images with the idolatries of the heart and mind—with covetousness and worldliness. Macmillan.—The business of our moral vigilance, and the test of our moral strength, is to penetrate the delusion, to tear off the mask, to recognize Satan even through his transformations. We should know our tempters, as the sure instincts of innocent hearts know hypocrites, “through the disguise they wear.” F. D. H.

23-27. All elements of danger, all details of adventure, all anxieties and toils, seemed summed up in his one person. Europe and Asia are full of him. “From Jerusalem round about unto Illyricum” is but his note of journey made half way. The deserts have seen him struggling with their sandstorms; the rivers have been breasted by his arm; the deep has held him, hour after hour, drifting solitary on its surface. Again and again ocean has cast him shipwrecked to land, and land has yielded him, full of fresh, holy enterprise, to ocean. Disputing in the synagogue, working at the hair-cloth loom, singing at midnight in the prison, kneeling, and mingling his tears with his farewell prayers on the Syrian or Milesian shore, preaching amid the marble temples on Mars’ Hill at Athens, thanking God and taking courage on the broad stones of the Appian Way, clanking his chain as he writes in his hired house at Rome—where, and in what employ, do we not find this strange, fervent man, this vessel of God’s election for the second founding of his Church? Such, then, was he whom the Lord grasped with His own hand, and rescued from the ranks of foes and persecutors for His own service. A.

The five Jewish scourgings, two of the three Roman beatings with rods (one being at Philippi), and the three shipwrecks, are all unrecorded in the Acts. The stoning was at Lystra. What a life of incessant adventure and peril is here disclosed to us! And when we remember that he who endured and dared all this was a man constantly suffering from infirm health, such heroic self-devotion seems almost superhuman. C.

29. Who is offended, and I burn not? If you add innumerable miracles to this, you will say nothing so grand. If he even glories, it is in weaknesses, in outrages, in his intense sympathy with the injured; just as here he also says, “Who is weak, and I am not weak?” These words are greater than dangers; and hence, when increasing the emphasis of his discourse, he places them last of all. Both soul and body did he give up that the men who stoned and beat him might attain a kingdom. “For thus,” says he, “has Christ taught me to love, who left that new commandment of His about love, and himself fulfilled it by his own actions.” Chrys.—Paul does not glory in what he had done, but in what he had borne; he does not speak of his successes, of his converts, of the heresies he had subdued, but he speaks of the manifold trials which he had undergone for Christ. He had “filled up that which was behind of the afflictions of Christ in my flesh, for his body’s sake, which is the Church.” This marks all his conduct and sufferings as being in the spirit of the cross, that it was for the sake of others. F. W. R.

Section 289.

2 CORINTHIANS xii. 1-21.

1 It is not expedient for me doubtless to glory. I will come to visions and revelations of the 2 Lord. I knew a man in Christ above fourteen years ago, (whether in the body, I cannot tell; or whether out of the body, I cannot tell: God knoweth;) such an one caught up to 3 the third heaven. And I knew such a man, (whether in the body, or out of the body, I 4 cannot tell: God knoweth;) how that he was caught up into paradise, and heard unspeak-5 able words, which it is not lawful for a man to utter. Of such an one will I glory: yet of 6 myself I will not glory, but in mine infirmities. For though I would desire to glory, I shall not be a fool; for I will say the truth: but now I forbear, lest any man should think 7 of me above that which he seeth me to be, or that he heareth of me. And lest I should be exalted above measure through the abundance of the revelations, there was given to me a thorn in the flesh, the messenger of Satan to buffet me, lest I should be exalted above 8 measure. For this thing I besought the Lord thrice, that it might depart from me. And 9 he said unto me, My grace is sufficient for thee: for my strength is made perfect in weakness. Most gladly therefore will I rather glory in my infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon me. Therefore I take pleasure in infirmities, in reproaches, in necessities, in persecutions, in distresses for Christ's sake: for when I am weak, then am I strong.

11 I am become a fool in glorying; ye have compelled me: for I ought to have been commended of you: for in nothing am I behind the very chiefest apostles, though I be nothing. Truly the signs of an apostle were wrought among you in all patience, in signs, 13 and wonders, and mighty deeds. For what is it wherein ye were inferior to other churches, 14 except it be that I myself was not burdensome to you? forgive me this wrong. Behold, the third time I am ready to come to you; and I will not be burdensome to you: for I seek not your's, but you: for the children ought not to lay up for the parents, but the parents 15 for the children. And I will very gladly spend and be spent for you; though the more 16 abundantly I love you, the less I be loved. But be it so, I did not burden you: never- 17 theless, being crafty, I caught you with guile. Did I make a gain of you by any of them 18 whom I sent unto you? I desired Titus, and with him I sent a brother. Did Titus make a gain of you? walked we not in the same spirit? walked we not in the same steps? 19 Again, think ye that we excuse ourselves unto you? we speak before God in Christ: but 20 we do all things, dearly beloved, for your edifying. For I fear, lest, when I come, I shall not find you such as I would, and that I shall be found unto you such as ye would not: lest there be debates, envyings, wraths, strifes, backbitings, whisperings, swellings, tumults: 21 and lest, when I come again, my God will humble me among you, and that I shall bewail many which have sinned already, and have not repented of the uncleanness and fornication and lasciviousness which they have committed.

TILL the death of Christ, the strong man was the man strong with his sinews and his hands, or, at best, with the cunning and calculation of his brain. Bodily "weakness" was either to be simply deplored as a calamity or despised as a shame. No spiritual illumination, shining through, transfigured the sick face; no submission of faith dignified the poor frame prostrate with pain. The men, and even the women, looked on disease with a kind of dry disgust. Virtue consisted in keeping up the animal vigor as long as possible, and when it failed, all that the most faithful friendship could do was to draw back in helpless embarrassment, just where Christian sympathy is most eager to press forward and reach out its merciful hands. It was imbecility gazing at infirmity in despair. We see the apostle of Christ standing in the presence of such a proud civilization as that, and quietly saying to it, "When I am weak, then am I strong." The meaning is that, in order to get very near to God, or to let the glorious attractions of almighty love and light lay hold of us and lift us up, we must somehow be impoverished first, belittled, disappointed, baffled, weakened. Obstacles, sicknesses, losses, defeats of our plans, the breakings up of our securities, are God's opportunities; and he knows how to use them. We watch the course of our lives, and we see that what is best has generally come by self-subjection. And at last our experience answers to this mystical account given of the heroes of the Bible: "Out of weakness they were made strong." F. D. H.

2. "I knew a man" should be "I know a man." The apostle is not speaking of one whom he once knew, but of one whom he now knows. Fourteen years ago is the date, not of the knowledge, as our version makes it, but of the vision. The same is the case in verse 3 also. A.

4. Caught up. The Spirit loveth to do what he does in private: that man to whom God intendeth to reveal great things, he taketh him aside from the lumber and cumber of this world, and carrieth him away in the solace and contemplation of the things of another world. Dun.

5. He speaks of a divided experience, of two selves, two Pauls: one Paul in the third heaven, enjoying the beatific vision; another yet on earth, struggling, tempted, tried, and buffeted by Satan. The former he chose rather to regard as the Paul that was to be. He dwelt on the latter as the actual

Paul coming down to the prose of life to find his real self, lest he should be tempted to forget or mistake himself in the midst of the heavenly revelations. F. W. R.

7. A thorn in the flesh, the messenger of Satan. That this was some permanent infirmity which troubled and hindered the apostle through his subsequent career, seems plain from his expression of resignation to it, after his thrice-repeated prayer for its removal had been answered only by an encouragement to submission. It is best to believe that in this, as in other cases, the silence of Scripture is intentional; to the end that men of natures more ardent than their strength, whose spirit is willing but whose flesh is weak, may learn from Paul's example to acknowledge and bow beneath the hand of God in those impediments but for which they would become boasters; nay, to re-joyce, that the glory of what they can yet do is not their own but God's. S.—The Bible calls trials evils, recognizes them as messengers from Satan, though often blessed by God—to be got rid of if possible. The Christians rejoiced in tribulation—in God; but that in spite of, not because of, tribulation. And here God does not command Paul to think the throb of his thorn enjoyable. He only bids him bear it, because he says, "My grace is sufficient for thee." F. W. R.

Paul tells us "there was given him a thorn in the flesh" for this very reason, lest "he should be exalted above measure through the abundance of the revelations." There was then in his case a danger to be guarded against in the consciousness of what God had wrought in him and for him. The most privileged "experience" is not now more secure in the same direction. O. E. D.—Notwithstanding so many promises made to faith, we are always more or less enfeebled by a remainder of our own strength, as we are always more or less troubled by remains of our own righteousness, which even the most humble bear with them everywhere. This wretched strength of our own, this talent of our own, this eloquence of our own, this knowledge of our own, this inducement of our own, forms in us a little cherished sanctuary, which our jealous pride keeps closed against the strength of God, in order to reserve for itself a last retreat. But if we could finally become weak in good earnest, and despair absolutely of ourselves, the strength of God, diffusing itself throughout our entire inward man, would fill us "with all the fullness of God"; and thus the strength of man being exchanged for the strength of God, "nothing would be impossible for us," because "with God nothing is impossible." Such is the incalculable service which his weakness confers on Paul, and which no strength could ever have rendered him. Monod.

God takes the most eminent and choicest of his servants for the choicest and most eminent afflictions. They who have received most grace from God are able to bear most afflictions from God. Affliction doth not hit the saints by chance, but by direction. God doth not draw his bow at a venture. Every one of his arrows goes upon a special errand, and touches no breast but that against whom it was sent. It is not only the grace but the glory of a believer when he can stand as a butt-mark and take affliction quietly. Caryl.

8. Paul besought God thrice that the thorn might be removed, when the answer came, not in the removal of the trial, but "my grace is sufficient for thee." Was this to deny the petition? No! it was to grant it in greater fullness. Here lies the difference between God's way and man's: man keeps the word of promise to the ear, but breaks it to the hope; God keeps the promise to the hope, though he may seem to break it to the ear. F. W. R.—Paul's case teaches us that the precept of our Lord, "Ask, and it shall be given you," must not be understood as promising a direct answer to every prayer, but as expressing the certainty that He who knows our infirmities before we ask, and our ignorance in asking, will, in the end, supply our needs with all that we require, though not with all that we desire or think that we require. The apostle prayed simply that a great impediment to his usefulness might be removed; and even this was not granted. And, in like manner, a greater than the apostle had "offered up prayer and supplications, with strong crying and tears," and yet the prayer was not granted. If the prayer of Paul and the prayer of Christ were refused, none need complain or be perplexed. A. P. S.—When you ask of God what God praises, what God commands, what God promises in the life to come, then ask fearlessly, and put your whole force, as far as you can, into your prayers, that you may obtain. For such things are granted by God in his gracious mercy; such things are bestowed by him, not in anger, but in compassion. But when you are asking for things temporal, ask with qualifications, ask with fear; commit them to him that he may give them if they are profitable, and may not give them if he knows them to be harmful. What is harmful, and what is profitable, the physician knows and not the patient. Aug.

My grace is sufficient for thee. That is, my free love will communicate to thee all that is needful; rest satisfied with it. It is to his own free love that the Lord points the eye of his struggling saint—to this alone, as being all he needs to meet his case. He pledges nothing beyond this; nor administers any comfort, save in connection with his own character as "the God of all grace." There is but one treasure-house of blessing, one well-spring of strength and gladness: the grace of the infinite Jehovah. God says to us, Here is righteousness, divine and perfect righteousness; use it as if it were your own; come to me with it as if it were your own. Here is strength; use it as if it were your own; use it to its full extent; count upon its availability for you to the full stretch of its almighty compass. Thus is the grace of Christ so placed within our reach that we may use it just as if all its good things were within us, not without us—as if they were really ours, not his. All this fullness is so at our disposal that we are actually responsible for the use of it all.

My strength is made perfect in weakness. That is, my strength finds its full scope, its proper development, in the weakness of its object. It is just those very things that constitute us helpless, worthless, lost, that make us suitable objects of this grace. It is those very things that would lead us to despond and turn away and remain aloof from Him that should lead us to be of good courage to arise and betake ourselves at once to God. It is the ignorance of the child that fits it for the teacher's skill and wisdom; so is it our ignorance that fits us for Him who can have compassion on the ignorant, and who has said, "Learn of me." It is the infant's helplessness that fits it for the father's strong or the mother's tender arm; so it is our feebleness that fits us for the strength of the mighty Saviour. Bonar.—We hang from hour to hour on God. When we know ourselves aright, we shall feel that we have nothing of our own that is good—that we are strengthless, powerless, and must depend entirely on His all sufficient grace. F. W. R.

10. Therefore I take pleasure in infirmities. Strength will be poured into our breasts from God, provided only the bars that keep it out are taken down. Only one thing is wanting, that the two bolts—self-will and self-indulgence—be weakened till they give way. Weaken them, then, in every way—by self-reproach, by discipline, by taking up a cross, by doing duties that you dislike to do, by disinterested work for other men—and the blessed energy of the Spirit will flow in. In your weakness God's strength will be made perfect, and then you will know, with Paul, what it is to glory in tribulations; then you will learn to entertain sickness and sorrow in your houses as the royal ambassadors of the King of Peace. At first Paul called his thorn a messenger of Satan buffeting him. After he found out why it came, he called it a gift, a love token, a sign of heavenly favor from his master. If Satan's angels are sometimes clothed as angels of light, why not God's angels in shadows? If it keeps you humble, the thorn is finally woven into the crown of rejoicing. Oh, blessed infirmities, blemishes, ugliness, pain, poor success, mortified ambition, ye are prophets and heralds of salvation, ye are our securities from deeper and more lasting shame! To accept bodily pain, or an insignificant reputation, or a ruined plan, even after having prayed against it, as the veiled minister of mercy, and heartily to give thanks for the scourge—this is to have Christ formed by faith within. F. D. H.

For Christ's sake. That is the main point. The apostle took pleasure in pain, not as pain, but for Christ's sake. Sorrow is not naturally sanctifying. It is only in afflictions borne for Christ's sake—that is, in Christ's name and with Christ's spirit—that we can rejoice. He only can rejoice in infirmities, in reproaches, in suffering, who, taking the cup gently, lovingly, humbly into his hand, can drain it to the dregs, and say, as did his Master, "The cup which my Father hath given me, shall I not drink it?" F. W. R.

11. For "an I behind," read "came I behind." For "the very chiefest apostles," read as above (11 : 5), "those over-much apostles." This is absolutely required here. Paul challenges them to compare him with his rivals among them, and states that in no particular did he come behind them. This could not apply to the Twelve, whom the Corinthians had never seen. A.

12. The grounds of apostleship alleged here are all spiritual; none are external. "Truly the signs of an apostle were wrought among you in all patience, in signs and wonders and mighty deeds." Thus Paul does not graft his right of appeal on any proud, priestly assumption, but on an inward likeness to Christ. Therefore, the true apostolical succession is and must be a spiritual one. He is a true minister who is one from sharing in the spirit of an apostle, not from the ordination and descent from an apostle. F. W. R.

Section 290.

2 CORINTHIANS xiii. 1-14.

1 This is the third time I am coming to you. In the mouth of two or three witnesses shall 2 every word be established. I told you before, and foretel you, as if I were present, the 3 second time; and being absent now I write to them which heretofore have sinned, and to 4 all other, that, if I come again, I will not spare: since ye seek a proof of Christ speaking
5 in me, which to you-ward is not weak, but is mighty in you. For though he was crucified
6 through weakness, yet he liveth by the power of God. For we also are weak in him, but 7 we shall live with him by the power of God toward you. Examine yourselves, whether ye 8 be in the faith; prove your own selves. Know ye not your own selves, how that Jesus 9 Christ is in you, except ye be reprobates? But I trust that ye shall know that we are not 10 reprobates. Now I pray to God that ye do no evil; not that we should appear approved, 11 but that ye should do that which is honest, though we be as reprobates. For we can do

9 nothing against the truth, but for the truth. For we are glad, when we are weak, and ye 10 are strong: and this also we wish, even your perfection. Therefore I write these things being absent, lest being present I should use sharpness, according to the power which the 11 Lord hath given me to edification, and not to destruction. Finally, brethren, farewell. Be perfect, be of good comfort, be of one mind, live in peace; and the God of love and peace 12 shall be with you. Greet one another with an holy kiss. All the saints salute you. The 14 grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all. Amen.

THE grace of the Lord Jesus Christ is not merely the center, but the beginning and foundation, of all that Christians are already here below, and shall become in eternity. Only through the grace of the Son men come to the full experience of the Father's compassion. Therefore the love of God is not mentioned by Paul in the first place, but in the second, and without the addition of the name of Father. This is silently understood, and in the most absolute sense the name of God given inclusively to the Father, because in the Divinity of the Father that of the Son and of the Spirit has its immovable basis. Not before, but only after men have personally understood and experienced the grace of the Lord Jesus, can they be certain of the love of God, in a measure belonging to no one who is not a Christian. How do we continue, nevertheless, in the midst of so much temptation in and around us, in the permanent possession of both? Only in the fellowship of the Holy Ghost, which binds the Christian most closely to the Son and the Father, does this become possible, and just this, therefore, forms the crown and cope-stone of the apostolic blessing. Only through the Son do we become children of the Father, and temples of the Holy Ghost. Only through the Holy Ghost do we become partakers of the grace of the Son and the love of the Father. There are, as it were, three distinct circles which issue from the same center, and constantly return to it; a threefold cord of blessing which can not be broken. Van O.

THE last chapter contains a grave declaration of his resolution to come among them, and exhortations and denunciations, grounded on the certainty of that his approaching visit. The final salutation is cut off very short, in accordance with the serious and almost minatory tone of this conclusion; and the letter ends with that benediction in the express name of the Holy Trinity, which has become the accustomed formula of dismissal throughout the ages of the Christian Church.

1. The third time. This would of course imply that he had visited them twice before. But only one previous visit has been related, viz., that first one, during which he wrote the Epistles to the Thessalonians. Before his next recorded visit, viz., that mentioned in Acts 20 : 1, 2, both the Epistles to the Corinthians had been written. He wrote the first from Ephesus, at a time when he intended to stay there till Pentecost (1 Cor. 16 : 8); he wrote the second from Macedonia, at a time when he had recently left Asia (2 Cor. 9 : 1-4; 1 : 8; 2 : 12), after being there in danger of his life. All this agrees with the history of his sojourn in Ephesus related in Acts 19, and with his journey through Macedonia, related Acts 20 : 1, 2. We infer then that he must have gone over from Ephesus to Corinth at some time early in those three years of his Ephesian visit. Nor need we be in the least degree surprised that this journey is not recorded in the Acts. Long and important journeys are dismissed in a few words, or even altogether omitted, as that to Arabia, mentioned Gal. 1 : 17, and that in Syria and Cilicia, Gal. 1 : 21. Ephesus and Corinth were the usual points of transit to and from Asia and Europe, and a journey across and back might present very little for the sacred historian to dwell upon. A.

4. He was crucified through weakness; such was the extremity of his weakness that he died under it; he made no use of his divine strength, but gave himself to his enemies, to be by them crucified and slain; his crucifixion was the exhibition of weakness, not of strength; yet he was raised again from the dead by power, the power of God; in the extremity of his weakness, power came in from another quarter. God raised him up, and highly exalted him. And as in his cross we see this combination of weakness and strength—personal weakness and divine strength—so we see the same in ourselves. We are men utterly without power in ourselves, yet we have the power of God working in us and for us. Bonar.

5. The earnest force of this examination should fix on the points named by the apostle: "whether ye be in the faith," whether "Jesus Christ be in you." Let, then, the self-examiner's earnest inquisition be directed to this great point—"whether" he "be in the faith"; whether he is decidedly more than a cold, assenting believer in the Christian doctrines. That a man may be, and yet at the same time be in—vitality and actively in—a spirit opposite to all these heavenly truths. But—in the faith? so in it as to be powerfully withdrawn and withheld from the spirit and dominion of the world? encircled, separated, guarded? So in it as to have a habitual prevailing order of views, feelings, motives, preferences, purposes, created and animated by it? So in it as to be in a cordial and zealous league with its faithful adherents? The other form of expression for the same thing is, "that Jesus Christ is in you." He may be in the thoughts as a commanding object of contemplation. He may be in the affections—the object of love and of reverence. He may be in the conscience as an authority. He may, in short, be established in the soul—in vital interest, in exclusive reliance, and in hope—as its sole and all-sufficient and almighty Redeemer. Thus he shall be in the soul as an indwelling presence, without which it were lifeless and hopeless; by which it is alive to God, and looks forward to eternal felicity. Now, whether this be in some good measure the case is matter preëminently for self-examination. J. F.

The scriptural philosophy of Christian experience is very beautiful. If you would either excite or test the presence of any emotion in the heart, you must bring before the understanding the truth which tends to excite and call forth that emotion. You can never by mere act of your own will call these emotions into play. While the gospel religion is a religion of the heart, and lays all stress on the affections, it never assumes that sinners, by a mere volition, can make themselves love Christ and the Spirit and the Father. But it tells you the wonderful story of Christ's generous acts, and of the Spirit's kind movings, and of the Father's yearning compassion, that, as you listen, the affections of love shall be awakened in the heart. S. R.—The contemplation of ourselves, if it be not unceasingly purified by the contemplation of Jesus Christ, readily becomes egotistical. If not subordinated to the contemplation of Jesus Christ, it leads us step by step to our own righteousness, to salvation by works, and thence to pride if we forget ourselves, or to listlessness and despondency if we see ourselves as we are; so that, at last, the noble principle which salvation by grace should have placed in our hearts, that principle whose place can not be supplied, and out of which there is nought but falsehood, deceit, and rebellion—that principle, slowly undermined by self and curiosity, fades from our creed, which is then like an old tree standing with its bark after the wood and pith have wasted away. A. V.

In what is frequently understood by self-examination, there is something mistaken or deceitful, which needs to be carefully resisted. In the first place, it is a kind of artificial state, in which the soul is drawn off from its objects and works, and its calls of love and sacrifice, to engage itself in acts of self-inspection. The will is called off to be questioned, when of course it is out of that engagement where it otherwise would be found. So one falls to examining his affections, when of course his mind is introverted, and called off from God and Christ, where only right affections have their object and rest. And the result not seldom is accordingly, that persons who become thoroughly bent down upon this matter of examining their affections, are doomed to see them wither in the process. The wonder then is, that the more faithful they are—and surely they mean to be faithful—the darker they become. H. B.—In nine cases of ten the first question will be, What is your feeling? not, What are you standing on? not whether a holy Christ has your loyal and unflinching obedience; not how far you are practically pledged to a righteous Master—which are certainly the chief matters now, as they were in the days and the preaching of the apostles—but rather whether the sensibilities are lively and the devout emotions enthusiastic. Religious feeling is one of the fruits of the Spirit—one of them; it has much to do in kindling and sustaining religious exertion. But feeling is the most irregular element in our composition, and it so far depends on outward conditions that it makes one of the least trustworthy tests of the actual frame of a Christian soul before God. Feeling belongs to the passive part of our nature; principle to the active part. Feeling depends on a sensitive surface; principle on depths of moral purity. Feeling changes with temperament, with states of health and nerves, with a thousand fickle external influences; principle is independent of all physical or alterable circumstances, moves straight on through all moods and climates, sails by fixed stars, and is the same secure and glorious thing through all the shifting seasons, though the mountains of prosperity were torn up and cast into the sea. F. D. H.

It is by a displacement of truth that Christians painfully engage themselves in weighing, measuring every feeling within them, analyzing and noting it in order to growth in grace, applying to themselves the machinery which the word provides for detecting and exposing hypocrisy, when they would be better employed in believing the simple promises and doing the revealed duties—going out of themselves and concentrating their thoughts on the Saviour, whose righteousness covers and whose Spirit instructs in the way of peace. J. Hall.—True religion is all comprised in two precepts, Look into yourself to see your own vileness, Look out of yourself to CHRIST. Little enough health, comfort, peace, and satisfaction shall we derive from the first of these precepts unless we constantly couple with it the second. Live not too much with thyself in the close chamber of spiritual anatomy. Doubt and disquietude, and subtle metaphysical difficulties, and over-canvassing of motives, will be the least mischief resulting from such a system. The knowledge and deep consciousness of thy dark guilt is only valuable as a background on which to paint more vividly to thy mind's eye the rainbow colors of the love of Jesus. Walk abroad ever and anon, and expatiate freely in the sunlight of God's grace and love in Christ. E. M. G.

You will never "brighten your evidences" by polishing at them. To polish the mirror ever so assiduously does not secure the image of the sun on its surface. The only way to do that is to carry the poor bit of glass out into the sunshine. It will shine then, never fear. It is weary work to labor at self-improvement with the hope of drawing from our own characters evidences that we are the sons of God. To have the heart filled with the light of Christ's love to us is the only way to have the whole being full of light. A. M.—There are states of the soul when, instead of dwelling on his experience, the disciple's first need is to forget it altogether, to let the thoughts, jaded with this chafing in the prison-house of consciousness, spring away into healthful liberty, from deploring what self has left undone, to center a grateful praise on what Christ has done. Faith bids these groaning hearts not to toil for ever in the dungeon; but to swing the door wide open, and let the light of the Father's face shine down into the breast. For, as a searching writer has said, "After we are in peace and power, self-analysis is instructive, humbling, and bracing; but while we are cold and dead, it is a poisonous thing, like a draught of quinine while the ague fit is on." F. D. H.

We may be false to the moving of the Holy Spirit by a diseased inspection of our own minds in the act of communion with God. Self-examination is a suitable preliminary or after-thought to prayer, but is no part of it. Devotion is most thoroughly objective, in respect of the motives which induce its presence. It is won into exercise by attractions from without, not forced into being by internal commotions. It is an outgoing, not a seething of sensibility. The suppliant looks upward and around beyond himself; and devout affections grow in intensity with the distance which he penetrates, as the eye grows keen with far seeing. The Spirit invites to no other than such expansive devotion. We are never more like Christ than in prayers of intercession. In the most lofty devotion we become unconscious of self. Have you never observed how entirely devoid is the Lord's Prayer of any material which can tempt to this subtle self-inspection in the act of devotion? It is full of an outflowing of thought and of emotion toward great objects of desire, great necessities, and great perils. "After this manner, therefore, pray ye." A. P.

Christ is in you. Who shall dare pollute the body that Christ has honored by his adoption? Who shall dare stain the soul that Christ glorifies with his presence? We Christians dwell in Christ, and Christ in us; this is our world, we ask none else; this is the substance of our hope here, as it is to be the substance of our heaven hereafter. Heed then, earnestly heed, your high calling in Christ Jesus. Glory in it, for angels can not match it! Guard it, live in it, for it is the source and principle of your immortality! Remember, with trembling joy remember, that Christ, in all the power and majesty of the Godhead, "is in you, if ye be not reprobates"; "for ye are the temple of the living God, as God hath said, I will dwell in them, and walk in them; and I will be their God and they shall be my people!" W. A. B.

11-14. Nothing remains but a concluding counsel, salutations, and benediction. These form a sweet and graceful close, all the more welcome after the keen and indignant tone of some of the previous sentences. D. F.

14. A spiritual and cordial trinitarian faith we affirm to be the basis of the only virtue which deserves the name—a serious, reverential, happy, and affectionate devotion of the whole nature to God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. Christian virtue is the habit, the motive, and the act of the soul meditating upon "the love of God," and "the grace of the Lord Jesus," and enjoying "the communion of the Holy Spirit." I. T.—This grace of Christ leads into the love of God, and this love is central in benediction. In this home and rest of the human spirit believers are kept by the communion of the Holy Ghost. Therefore, this closes and perfects the blessing, "The communion of the Holy Ghost be with you all." D. F.

The doctrine of the Trinity is that doctrine that showeth us the love of God the Father in giving his Son, the love of God the Son in giving himself, and the love of the Lord the Spirit in his work of regenerating us, that we may be made able to lay hold of the love of the Father by his Son, and so enjoy eternal life by grace. The Father's grace saveth no man without the grace of the Son, neither do the Father and the Son save any without the grace of the Spirit; for as the Father loves, the Son must die, and the Spirit must sanctify, or no soul must be saved. But yet, as these three do put forth grace jointly and truly in the salvation of a sinner, so they put it forth after a diverse manner. The Father designs us for heaven, the Son redeems from sin and death, and the Spirit makes us meet for heaven, by his revealing Christ and applying Christ to our souls, by shedding the love of God abroad in our hearts, by sanctifying our souls and taking possession of us as an earnest of our possession in heaven. Bun.—The Apostolic Benediction, used so generally for all centuries since Christ's ascension, is a prayer to each person of the Divine Trinity for the maintenance and expansion of that sway of Christ over the nations, by means of Christ's churches. Here the work of the Atoner stands first; the parental love of the Divine Father follows in the second place; and to the third place is assigned the energy of the Divine Spirit, as maintaining the unity and brotherhood of the Church, cementing and assimilating the body of Christ, and rendering it aggressive and victorious in its influence over the world by a power of transmutation and assimilation shed forth upon them. And the Apostolical Benediction, sounded in so many tongues of the earth and through so many centuries, over such myriads on myriads of assembled Christians, reminds the whole sacramental host in whose name it is that they set up their banners; and bids them ever, in their plans and supplications, to remember that, as they are bought in one blood, and are the called of one Father, they need to receive, and cherish, and implore one Spirit. By Him shall ultimately all earth's discords be hushed. To "grieve" that Spirit of holiness and love is to rend Christ's mystic body. To "quench" that Spirit of light, truth, and life, is to install falsehood in the chair of verity, to bequeath despair to the world, and to work suicide as against the Church.

The Trinity is not, then, in the Bible a mere speculative mystery, too recondite to be practical. As a doctrine, each disciple avouches it on the church threshold. As an experience, it underlies the conversion of the individual. As a life, it pervades the collective churches through all lands and all ages. It is at once badge, history, and banner: a badge in baptism; a history as to the ransom, regeneration, and filial adoption of each separate disciple; and a banner as to the array and prospects of Christ's collected disciples, moving forward as churches to subdue the world to the obedience of the faith. The Zion of God welcomes each neophyte into her fellowship under this Triune Name, and speeds forth each dispersing assembly that quits her courts with the same significant invocation. She greets the coming, she bids farewell to the parting guest in the name of the Trinity. W. R. W.

Section 291.

GALATIANS i. 1-24.

1 PAUL, an apostle, (not of men, neither by man, but by Jesus Christ, and God the Father,
2 who raised him from the dead;) and all the brethren which are with me, unto the churches
3 of Galatia: grace be to you and peace from God the Father, and from our Lord Jesus
4 Christ, who gave himself for our sins, that he might deliver us from this present evil world,
5 according to the will of God and our Father: to whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen.
6 I marvel that ye are so soon removed from him that called you into the grace of Christ unto 7 another gospel: which is not another; but there be some that trouble you, and would per-
8 vert the gospel of Christ. But though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gos-
9 pel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed. As we said before, so say I now again, If any man preach any other gospel unto you than that ye have 10 received, let him be accursed. For do I now persuade men, or God? or do I seek to please 11 men? for if I yet pleased men, I should not be the servant of Christ. But I certify you, 12 brethren, that the gospel which was preached of me is not after man. For I neither received it of man, neither was I taught it, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ.
13 For ye have heard of my conversation in time past in the Jews' religion, how that be-14 yond measure I persecuted the church of God, and wasted it: and profited in the Jews' religion above many my equals in mine own nation, being more exceedingly zealous of the 15 traditions of my fathers. But when it pleased God, who separated me from my mother's 16 womb, and called me by his grace, to reveal his Son in me, that I might preach him among 17 the heathen; immediately I conferred not with flesh and blood: neither went I up to Jerusalem to them which were apostles before me; but I went into Arabia, and returned again 18 unto Damascus. Then after three years I went up to Jerusalem to see Peter, and abode 19 with him fifteen days. But other of the apostles saw I none, save James the Lord's brother.
20 Now the things which I write unto you, behold, before God, I lie not. Afterwards I came 21 into the regions of Syria and Cilicia; and was unknown by face unto the churches
22 of Judæa which were in Christ: but they had heard only, That he which persecuted 23 us in times past now preacheth the faith which once he destroyed. And they glorified 24 God in me.

EPISTLE TO THE GALATIANS.

THE Galatians, or Gauls, or Kelts, for the name is probably but one and the same under these different forms, are found at the earliest historic period inhabiting the greater part of Western Europe. When we first encounter them, they are a restless, migratory people, making incursions on their neighbors, and occupying new territories by conquest. In the fourth century before Christ, we see Rome itself sacked and plundered by them; shortly after, the famous temple at Delphi suffers their attack and witnesses their repulse. A detachment of this same invading body wandered away into the far east, and overran the lesser Asia. There eventually, after a series of vicissitudes, they became settled. The central portion of Asia Minor, known as Galatia, was their country; and at the time of the apostolic history gave its name to, and was itself part of, a Roman province slightly exceeding its own extent. Mingled with this invading people were a considerable number of the original Phrygian inhabitants; and, what is more important for our present purpose, a large and influential Jewish element (see map, page 94). Still, the character of the population in the main was that of the Gauls or Kelts. Its description by independent writers is full of interest for the readers of this Epistle. Cesar, the great conqueror of Gaul, describes himself as taking certain precautions, "fearing the weakness of the Gauls, because they are fickle in taking up plans, and ever fond of innovating, and therefore he thought that no trust should be put in them." But the main feature of their character with which we are in this Epistle concerned is their restless love of change. They had received the gospel at the hands of Paul with their usual fervor and impetuosity. But, at the time of his writing this letter, they were rapidly changing to another gospel, which was not another (ch. 1 : 6); and the nature of that change is not without its interest. It was being brought about by Jewish influence, and was in the direction of the Mosaic rites and ceremonies. Now Cesar's description of the Gauls is, that they are above all other people given to superstitious observances; so that here again we have a point of national character brought out.

In Acts 16 : 6 we read that the Apostle, who had, in company with Silas, revisited the churches previously founded by him in Lycaonia, "went through the Phrygian and Galatian country"; for so the words should be read. No more is here said. It would appear from Gal. 4 : 3 that his intention had been merely to pass through, but that he was detained by a sickness. He appears to have taken occasion by this detention to preach to them the gospel, and to found the Galatian churches, of which churches we have no particular account. But this was not his only visit. We find him in Acts 18 : 23 carrying out a more formal visitation, going through the whole country in order, confirming all the disciples. This was after an interval of at least three years; and it is to this second visit that some allusions of an instructive character, occurring in the Epistle, must be referred. In chapter 4 : 16 he asks them reproachingly whether he had become their enemy by telling them the truth? These words can not of course apply to that first visit; as little can they be interpreted of anything in the Epistle which the Galatians had not yet received; but their reference must be found in something that happened on the second presence of the Apostle among them. Then he must have found the evil beginning to be apparent, and have spoken to them his mind about it.
